None of the 12 Iranians that the State Department eventually singled out for potential bans on international travel and business dealings is believed by the CIA to be directly connected to Iran's most suspicious nuclear activities.

"There is nothing that proves involvement in a clandestine weapons program, and there is very little out there at all that even connects people to a clandestine weapons program," said one official familiar with the intelligence on Iran. Like others interviewed for this story, the official insisted on anonymity when discussing the use of intelligence.

What little information there is has been guarded at CIA headquarters. The agency declined to discuss the case in detail, but a senior intelligence official said: "There were several factors that made it a complicated and time-consuming request, not the least of which were well-founded concerns" about revealing the way the CIA gathers intelligence on Iran.

That may be why the junior State Department officer, who has been with the nonproliferation bureau for only a few months, was put in front of a computer.

An initial Internet search yielded over 100 names, including dozens of Iranian diplomats who have publicly defended their country's efforts as intended to produce energy, not bombs, the sources said. The list also included names of Iranians who have spoken with U.N. inspectors or have traveled to Vienna to attend International Atomic Energy Agency meetings about Iran.

It was submitted to the CIA for approval but the agency refused to look up such a large number of people, according to three government sources. Too time-consuming, the intelligence community said, for the CIA's Iran desk staff of 140 people. The list would need to be pared down. So the State Department cut the list in half and resubmitted the names.

In the end, the CIA approved a handful of individuals, though none is believed connected to Project 1-11 -- Iran's secret military effort to design a weapons system capable of carrying a nuclear warhead. The names of Project 1-11 staff members have never been released by any government and doing so may have raised questions that the CIA was not willing or fully able to answer. But the agency had no qualms about approving names already publicly available on the Internet.

"Using a piece of intel on project 1-11, which we couldn't justify in open-source reporting, or with whatever the Russians had, would have put us in a difficult position," an intelligence official said. "Inevitably, someone would have asked, 'Why this guy?' and then we would have been back to the old problem of justifying intelligence."

A senior administration official acknowledged that the back-and-forth with the CIA had been difficult, especially given the administration's desire to isolate Iran and avoid a repeat of flawed intelligence that preceded the Iraq war.

"In this instance, we were the requesters and the CIA was the clearer," the official said. "It's the process we go through on a lot of these things. Both sides don't know a lot of reasons for why either side is requesting or denying things. Sources and methods became their stated rationale and that is what they do. But for policymaking, it can be quite frustrating."

Washington's credibility in the U.N. Security Council on weapons intelligence was sharply eroded by the collapse of prewar claims about Iraq. A senior intelligence official said the intelligence community is determined to avoid mistakes of the past when dealing with Iran and other issues. "Once you push intelligence out there, you can't take it back," the official said.

U.S., French and British officials came to agree that it was better to stay away from names that would have to be justified with sensitive information from intelligence programs, and instead put forward names of Iranians whose jobs were publicly connected to the country's nuclear energy and missile programs. European officials said their governments did not rely on Google searches but came up with nearly identical lists to the one U.S. officials offered.

"We do have concerns about Iranian activities that are overt, and uranium enrichment is a case in point," said a senior administration official who agreed to discuss the process on the condition of anonymity. "We are concerned about what it means for the program, but also because enrichment is in violation of a U.N. Security Council resolution."

The U.S.-backed draft resolution, formally offered by Britain and France, would impose a travel ban and freeze the assets of 11 institutions and 12 individuals, including the commander of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, the directors of Iran's chief nuclear energy facilities, and several people involved in the missile program. It would prohibit the sale of nuclear technologies to Iran and urges states to "prevent specialised teaching or training" of Iranian nationals in disciplines that could further Tehran's understanding of banned nuclear activities.

The text says the council will be prepared to lift the sanctions if Mohamed ElBaradei, the IAEA's director general, concludes within 60 days that Iran has suspended its enrichment and reprocessing of uranium and has halted efforts to produce a heavy-water nuclear energy reactor.

Many Security Council members are uneasy about the sanctions. The Russians and the Chinese -- whose support is essential for the resolution to be approved -- have told the United States, Britain and France they will not support the travel-ban element of the resolution, according to three officials involved in the negotiations. Russia is building a light-water nuclear reactor in Iran and some people on the sanctions list are connected to the project.

"The Russians have already told us it would be demeaning for people to ask the Security Council for permission to travel to Russia to discuss an ongoing project," a European diplomat said yesterday.

U.S. and European officials said there is room for negotiation with Russia on the names and organizations, but they also said it is possible that by the time the Security Council approves the resolution, the entire list could be removed.

"The real scope of debate will be on the number of sanctions," one diplomat said. "Companies and individuals could go off the list or go on."

Arab Nations Plan To Start Joint Nuclear Energy Program (NYT)

By Hassan Fattah

New York Times, December 11, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Dec. 10 — Arab leaders, meeting in the Saudi capital, Riyadh, on Sunday, said they intended to start a joint nuclear energy development program, a move certain to heighten concerns over a possible race for nuclear power in the oil-rich Persian Gulf.

Leaders of the Gulf Cooperation Council concluded a two-day summit meeting in Riyadh on Sunday, agreeing to study how to proceed with development of such capacity.

At the same time, they called for a peaceful settlement of the crisis over Iran's nuclear program, which the United States and some other Western nations say is for nuclear arms.

"The states of the region have a right to possess nuclear energy technology for peaceful purposes," the summit meeting's closing communiqué said, echoing Iran's insistence that it, too, had the right to peaceful nuclear technology.

Publicly, officials of the gulf council said the development of a nuclear energy program would help meet their rising demand for electricity, despite the huge oil reserves.

"Nuclear technology is an important technology to have for generating power, and the gulf states will need it equally," said Prince Saud al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's foreign minister, speaking to reporters. "It is not a threat," he said. "It is an announcement so that there will be no misinterpretation for what we are doing."

But analysts and officials said the announcement had a different purpose — to warn the United States not to acquiesce to Iran's nuclear ambitions as pressure grows on the Bush administration to reach out to Iran for help in stabilizing Iraq.

A report released by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group last week recommended that the United States open negotiations with Iran.

The predominantly Sunni Arab states fear that the United States may abandon Arab concerns to gain assistance from Iran, which could confirm Iran as the regional hegemon.

"The message is that the gulf countries will develop their own nuclear program if Iran is rewarded with the terms of the Baker-Hamilton report," said Abdelaziz O. Sager, chairman of the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, who is familiar with the nuclear initiative. "They are trying to say that if the Iranian program continues, you will force us to become nuclear capable too."

At a Persian Gulf security conference in Bahrain on Saturday, Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, insisted that Iran was seeking only peaceful nuclear capacity.

"The time of nuclear weapons is over," Mr. Mottaki said. He added that if nuclear weapons served as an effective deterrent, they should have stopped the fall of the Soviet Union and Israel would not have had to go to war in Lebanon against Hezbollah this past summer.

Saudi officials have warned that a nuclear Iran could cause a regional arms race, suggesting that Saudi Arabia would be forced to acquire nuclear technology, too.

King Abdullah said Saturday that the region was increasingly becoming “a powder keg ready to explode,” citing conflict in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, as well as the continuing Iranian nuclear crisis.

At least six Arab countries have reportedly sought to develop nuclear power programs, including Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco and Algeria.

Ahmadinejad And Thin Ice (NSWK)

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - How gruesome was 2006? The year's most consequential person was Iran's president, who says the Holocaust did not happen and vows to complete it. Regarding his nuclear aspirations, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose manias are leavened with realism, treated the United Nations as a figment of the imagination of a fiction—the "international community."

Democrats, given control of Congress because of Iraq, vowed to raise the minimum wage. Nimble and graceful Barack Obama became the Democrats' Fred Astaire, adored because of, well, perhaps the way he wears his hat, the way he sips his tea. And the way he isn't Hillary.

Hundreds Of Thousands Protest In Lebanon (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas And Zeina Karam

AP, December 11, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah members and their allies flooded central Beirut on Sunday demanding changes in the government's makeup as soldiers strung more barbed wire around the offices of the Western-backed premier.

Buoyed by the big turnout after a week of street protests, the pro-Syria opposition gave Prime Minister Fuad Saniora an ultimatum of a "few days" to accept its demand to form a national unity government with a big role for Hezbollah or face an escalating campaign to oust him.

Saniora, who has been holed up in his fortified office downtown, rejected the demand and urged his foes to resume negotiations. The opposition should "return to the constitutional institutions to discuss differences and reach real solutions," he said in a written statement.

Political unrest has split the country along sectarian lines, with most Sunni Muslims supporting the Sunni prime minister and Shiite Muslims backing the militant Hezbollah. Christian factions are split between the two camps.

But despite the heated rhetoric of the political confrontation, Sunday's mass gathering remained peaceful and left the door open to the possibility of a settlement.

"Hopefully it won't be long. At the end, there will be no winner, no vanquished. We should all be winners," Saad Hariri, leader of parliament's anti-Syria majority and a Saniora supporter, told The Associated Press.

Police had no immediate crowd estimate, but the horde that jammed downtown plazas and many neighborhoods appeared one of the biggest in a country that has seen a string of mammoth demonstrations by both sides in recent years. A Hezbollah anti-government rally Dec. 1 drew 800,000 of Lebanon's 4 million people, according to police figures.

Pro-government groups staged a rival demonstration that drew tens of thousands in the northern port city of Tripoli.

Hezbollah's supporters streamed into downtown from all corners of Lebanon, waving Lebanese and Hezbollah flags as loudspeakers blasted anti-government speeches. Musicians pounded drums in a carnival-like atmosphere, while Hezbollah security agents fanned out in the crowd.

"We have come to show them how big our size really is," said Reem al-Zein, a 20-year-old philosophy student. "I think this lying government will not be able to last much longer after today."

Sheik Naim Kassem, Hezbollah's deputy leader, said the opposition was willing to stay on the streets for months to achieve its goal.

"Does Bush want popular expression in Lebanon? Do the West and the Arabs want to hear the voice of the people in Lebanon? Tell them 'Death to America!' Tell them 'Death to Israel!'" the crowd repeated behind him.

Michel Aoun, a Christian leader allied with Hezbollah, warned Saniora he had only "a few days" to accept a national unity government or face further action.

"What we hope for today is for them to understand that their era is over," he said in a video link shown on giant screens.

Aoun added that the opposition was committed to "to peaceful means, but even other means are legitimate."

Lebanese media have speculated the opposition's next steps could include civil disobedience, disruptions of public services and resignations from parliament.

The political crisis began after talks on a national unity government collapsed and six pro-Hezbollah ministers resigned from the Cabinet. Hezbollah is demanding that it and its allies hold a third of the Cabinet posts, which would allow them to veto government decisions.

Relations between the two camps deteriorated after the Israel-Hezbollah war last summer and a U.N. push for an international tribunal to try suspects in the 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Premier Rafik Hariri, which many people blame on neighboring Syria.

Hezbollah's fight against Israel sent its support among Shiites skyrocketing, emboldening it to push for more political power. The militant group also accuses Saniora and some elements in his government of working with Israel to destroy the guerrilla force.

Pro-government groups, in turn, resent Hezbollah for sparking the war by capturing two Israeli soldiers. Saniora's allies, along with the United States and others, accuse Hezbollah's Syrian and Iranian backers of seeking to overthrow the government.

If Saniora resigned, he would continue in a caretaker capacity until parliament named a new premier and formed a new Cabinet, but he has shown no sign of giving in. Soldiers and police sealed off major roads in Beirut and strengthened defenses around Saniora's downtown complex, where he has been living with other Cabinet ministers.

On Sunday, Saniora said he was open to dialogue and acknowledged the political crisis threatened Lebanon's security, economy and political system.

"We don't want Lebanon to be an arena of the wars of others," Saniora said, in a veiled reference to Syria and Iran. "Lebanon is a nation, not an arena."

Saad Hariri, son of the assassinated premier, said the government was open to meeting opposition demands but only as part of a broader deal.

Among those, he said, would a decision on the fate of President Emile Lahoud. Anti-Syria groups have repeatedly demanded his resignation, accusing him of being a front for Syria, whose army occupied Lebanon for nearly three decades.

Hariri said the opposition also would have to agree to support the international tribunal on his father's slaying and to implement all of the U.N. resolution that ended the summer war. One of the latter's requirements is for Hezbollah to disarm, something it has refused to do.

"Once we agree on the principles there is no problem," Hariri told AP.

Protest Crowds Surge As Beirut Braces For Next Step (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 10 -- Hezbollah and its allies turned out the biggest crowds yet in downtown Beirut, sending hundreds of thousands of followers to the gates of the government headquarters Sunday in a feat of mobilization and discipline described by some leaders as the last mass protest before the 10-day campaign escalates.

Legions of flag-waving protesters danced, blew horns and beat drums in a demonstration that, as in past days, was festive, swathed in a cool breeze on a sunny day. But its leaders stipulated only a few days before more measures were taken to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora. By nightfall, the city, suffused with a military presence, was rife with rumors over the next step. Hezbollah refused to confirm or deny that it planned to cut roads in the capital in a mounting campaign of civil disobedience, and Michel Aoun, a Christian ally, suggested a more forceful march on the government itself.

"All these actions become legitimate when the rulers start committing crime after crime, and refuse to step down, and find refuge in illegitimate actions," he told the crowd. "Legitimate actions are for rulers who respect the legitimacy of its people."

The crisis, Lebanon's worst since the end of the 15-year civil war in 1990, has relentlessly deepened since it erupted in October with the demand by Hezbollah and its allies for a greater say in Siniora's cabinet. Since then, it has escalated into deeply personal attacks between Siniora and Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah. Both communities have mobilized their supporters, sometimes along bluntly sectarian lines, sending a chill through a capital that still bears the civil war's scars. Both communities rule out a retreat in a confrontation that could decide the country's political culture, foreign policy and priorities for years to come.

In the broadest terms, the conflict pits Hezbollah, Aoun and an allied Shiite movement, Amal, against the government and a coalition that coalesced in protests last year after former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri was assassinated. But within the struggle is an array of some of the most deeply felt issues here: whether the government's ally, the United States, or Hezbollah's allies, Iran and Syria, will have greater influence; the power of the Shiite community that Hezbollah largely represents; frustration over corruption that Hezbollah and Aoun have framed as populist demands; and Lebanon's posture toward Israel.

"This is a coup against the state in the name of God," Samir Jisr, a parliament member and ally of Hariri's son, Saad, who inherited leadership of Lebanon's Sunni community, told tens of thousands at a counter-protest in northern Lebanon.

Two of Lebanon's most powerful television stations played to their crowds. Future Television, loyal to Hariri and his Sunni constituency, devoted extensive coverage to the counter-protests in Tripoli. Hezbollah's al-Manar, calling the protests here "an unprecedented popular flood," aired four scenes simultaneously of the crowds surging downtown. The broadcast was laced with the vocabulary of this summer's war with Israel: victory, steadfastness and salvation.

"People who survived 33 days of war in the south have no problem staying here for a year, or even two," said Nada Mroueh, joining protesters flying flags that denoted their affiliation -- yellow for Hezbollah, orange for Aoun, green for Amal. "Is it wrong to ask for our rights? Is Siniora more Lebanese than us? We are Lebanese, too."

The demonstrators filled a swath of downtown and backed up into the main arteries leading into the city. Hezbollah has sought to cast the protest as representative of what it calls the national opposition, and the crowd unfurled a sea of red, white and green Lebanese flags across downtown. Overlooking the main square, two banners were draped over a building. One showed Siniora embracing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"Thanks, Condy!" it read in English.

"Hold a news conference tonight or tomorrow, no rush, and announce your resignation as a gesture to preserve the unity of the Lebanese people and rejection of foreign tutelage," said Naim Kassem, the deputy leader of Hezbollah, addressing Siniora, as protesters in a tightly packed square strained their heads to get a glimpse of the turbaned leader.

At another point, he urged the crowd to repeat after him: "Death to America! Death to Israel!"

In the streets outside the square, some of the chants that followed were angry. "There is no fear! There is no fear! The blood of Shiites is a Kalashnikov."

But more often they were fitting for a carnival, the tone that the protests -- disciplined, organized and peaceful -- have hewn to since they began Dec. 1 with a similar but smaller crowd, followed by a round-the-clock sit-in in scores of tents. As Kassem led the crowd in chants, others down the road danced the traditional debke, and knots of youths beat drums. Women in tight jeans chatted, sometimes shouting over martial music blared from speakers, as Shiite clerics in robes passed by.

"Beirut is free!" some chanted.

"I want to send a small message," said Mohammed Ali Ghandour, a 17-year-old who has attended the protests five of the past 10 days. "The government doesn't respect us. They're not taking care of us. They say they do, but they don't."

Ghandour held a poster that read, "As with victory, change is coming, coming, coming."

"What's happening, it's us or them. And whoever wins receives the country. All of it," he said. "This is Lebanon."

Through the crisis, followers in the two camps have split into views that almost never intersect. The speeches of leaders like Nasrallah are echoed almost immediately in the streets. Siniora's contention that the protests amount to a coup d'etat is mentioned in almost every conversation with Hezbollah's opponents. After Nasrallah accused the government of complicity in Israel's waging war this summer, protester after protester mentioned it in interviews Sunday. The government, many claimed, was at best under the sway of U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey Feltman, at worst staffed by traitors.

"In the trash can of history, the government of Feltman," one sign read.

"The government walks as the Americans tell it to walk. It does what Feltman asks it to do," said Hussein Awadeh, a 17-year-old from the largely Shiite southern suburbs of Beirut. "Is it possible we'd accept a government like that?"

Aoun, who entered into an alliance with Hezbollah last year, said the demonstration Sunday would mark the last mass protest. Like Hezbollah, he was unclear about what might follow. Both he and Nasrallah have said they might demand a transitional government that would pave the way for early elections, but constitutionally, Hezbollah and its allies don't have the numbers in parliament to do so. Some here have read the call as a veiled threat of a coup, but so far, the military has strived to stay neutral.

"In the next few days, we expect to change the status quo," Aoun said.

Government officials, at least publicly, have struck a confident tone. So far, they say they have yet to lose anything in the confrontation, and Siniora has repeatedly ruled out resigning, while, like Nasrallah, leaving the door open for negotiations.

"No one ever had any doubt about Hezbollah's capacity to bring huge crowds to the street," said Wael Abou Faour, a parliament member and supporter of Siniora. But, he added, "they have reached a dead horizon."

He said Siniora planned to offer a compromise this week, though it would not diverge far from previous positions. Most talks have revolved around Hezbollah and its allies receiving just short of a third of the cabinet, with independents holding one or two posts. Hezbollah and its allies have pushed for just over a third, a number that would allow them to force the cabinet's resignation.

Lebanon Heading Toward A Breaking Point (MCT)

By Tom Lasseter

McClatchy, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Hundreds of thousands of demonstrators piled into downtown Beirut Sunday, demanding that the U.S.-backed government step down immediately or face an escalation in a siege on the prime minister's headquarters being coordinated by the Shiite Muslim Hezbollah militia.

While accounts vary of what the heightened tactics could consist of - a government worker's strike and a storming of the headquarters have both been mentioned - it's clear that the nation is headed toward a breaking point. Hezbollah and its allies have been camped in the center of the capital for more than a week, demanding that Sunni Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and his Cabinet step down.

The implications are profound for U.S. efforts to counter Syrian and Iranian influence in the Middle East.

The Bush administration counts the massive "Cedar Revolution" protests that expelled Syrian forces from Lebanon last year as a key victory for pro-western democracy. But now, as U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan face significant setbacks, it is Syrian and Iranian ally Hezbollah that is filling the streets of Beirut and calling for revolution.

Speaking in front of the crowd on Sunday, Hezbollah's second in command, Naim Qassim, said in a message to Saniora: "Have a press conference tonight or tomorrow to tell the Lebanese people that you are resigning. ... If you resign today, it would be a positive step, but if you don't it will be negative for the future" of Lebanon.

Qassim also led the crowd in a booming chorus of "Death to America" and "Death to Israel."

Michel Aoun, a Christian leader who has aligned himself with Hezbollah, went a step further.

"This must be the last big rally we'll call for, because in the next one there will be no room for all the protesters," Aoun said. "And the barbed wire will no longer protect the (government building) because people will move there naturally and without any instigation."

Sunni and Christian leaders have warned that a storming of the building could lead to large-scale unrest.

"You can control the people for one, two, maybe 10 days, but after that you cannot control the people; we will take down any fences between us" and the government building, said Ali Zein, one of the demonstrators. "The cup is full now, everything has its limits."

Both sides appear to have hardened their positions: Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah accused Saniora of working with the Israelis last summer during a 34-day war between Israel and the militia, and Saniora replied that Nasrallah's remarks were "an unnecessary fit of anger and rudeness."

Representatives from the Arab League have tried brokering a deal that would lead to an increased Hezbollah say in Cabinet decisions - a process marked by rumors of success that have yet to pan out. Hezbollah officials said Sunday night that they were working to find a solution to the impasse, but it was unclear if anything would come from the Arab League discussions.

Tensions between Lebanon's sects - particularly Sunnis and Shiites - have been moving toward a boil during the past week. With each story of a fight between men with pipes and rocks, each insult heard and repeated, the divide between the groups widens.

The Lebanese Army has blocked the entrances to many Sunni neighborhoods between downtown and the southern Shiite suburbs in an effort to prevent Shiite protesters from clashing with mobs.

Many in the Lebanese government are concerned that increased Sunni-Shiite violence could split the army along confessional lines.

"It will continue to be OK, unless there is a big clash between the two communities, this would put the army in a difficult position," said Joe Sarkis, a Cabinet member and a senior official in the Christian militia cum political party, the Lebanese Forces. "The army is telling us, please solve this soon, because if more time passes the situation might change for us."

Ahmed Fatfat, a Sunni Cabinet member and former Interior Minister, said he's gotten reports to that effect from officers in the army and other Lebanese security forces.

"It's risky," he said.

Asked how likely he thought it was that troops would abandon their posts and fight for their sect, Fatfat grimaced.

"It can happen," he said, and then paused for a moment: "Yes, it can."

The soldiers "go home at the end of the day," Sarkis said, "and there are politics in these neighborhoods."

The Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods are grouped closely together in the capital, a vestige of the 15-year civil war that drew battle lines between Christian and Muslim neighborhoods.

"There are going to be problems in the neighborhoods, the street is out of control, they fight here every night," said Ghazi al-Koush, who owns an electronics store in the predominantly Sunni neighborhood of Basta. "There is a lot of tension on the streets, and it's going to explode - things here are not going to end peacefully."

Al-Koush ran his hand across his face, and rested it for a moment near his glass eye. "During the civil war I lost my eye, I lost my house, I lost my shop, but I never saw Muslim brothers fighting brothers as they are now," he said. "This neighborhood stayed together during most of the civil war, but now it's falling apart."

He blamed most of the fighting on Shiites driving down the streets at night and yelling anti-Sunni slogans. But it was clear from interviews with residents across Beirut during the past week that members of both sects are picking fights.

"If the Shiites keep the siege on the (Cabinet building), the Sunnis will keep attacking the Shiites on the street," said Mohammed Saaidon, a local leader in the Sunni neighborhood of Aisha Bakkar. "You can't imagine how angry the Sunnis are ... we won't let the Shiites take Beirut."

That sense of Sunni rage is met in many Shiite neighborhoods with a confidence that at times borders on an eagerness to fight.

"If this continues there will be problems," said Mohammed Hussein, who was walking through the streets of Dahiya, a Hezbollah stronghold south of Beirut.

A friend piped up, cheerfully: "It will be civil war."

Down the street, Bassam Boulud was sitting with a group of men, including a Hezbollah security worker.

"If we want, we can control the whole country in 72 hours, according to the latest (Hezbollah) study," Boulud said.

The Hezbollah guard put his hand on Boulud's shoulder.

Boulud corrected himself: "But because of the wisdom of Hassan Nasrallah, this will not happen."

After the demonstration Sunday, a group of women were standing beside the bus that brought them up from their south Lebanon homes in the town of Tyre.

One of them, who gave only her first name, Ibtihal, said that she hoped another civil war wasn't coming, but that the time to act was drawing near. She said she knew that going into the government center downtown was a "redline" for the Sunnis and Christians, but that she hoped to be "the first one in the building."

"We have been patient until now," she said, "but after today, we are willing to cross all redlines."

Both Sides Appear Cornered In Beirut (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT — When hundreds of thousands of demonstrators choked downtown Beirut on Sunday to demand the ouster of the U.S.-backed government, their crushing show of political strength came carefully packaged with a harsh threat: Time for a political compromise is running out.

DOJ_NMG_0104315

At the podium, a menacing tone laced the speeches of party officials from Hezbollah and its allies. On the jammed streets, a fraying, frustrated tinge crept into the cries of demonstrators who washed over downtown in waves. The massive sit-in has moved into its second week without tangible results, and within the opposition, calls are mounting for an escalation in civil disobedience.

Gen. Michel Aoun, a powerful Maronite Christian leader and political ally of the Shiite Muslim movement Hezbollah, closed the demonstration with a threat. Cheers rose among the crowds as a fiery Aoun declared the people that "this stage has come close to its end."

"In the few coming days, we expect to change the status quo we're in. This must be the last big rally we'll call for, because in the next one there will be no room for all the protesters," he said. "And the barbed wire will no longer protect the [government offices] because people will move there naturally and without any instigation."

Aoun pledged to remain peaceful but, in the next breath, said that "other means" were also legitimate. He spoke admiringly of the seizure of government buildings in Serbia and Ukraine, and argued that extreme actions were legitimate when used to oust corrupt rulers.

From Arab diplomats to Christian clerics, negotiators are still struggling to broker a power-sharing compromise to bring Lebanon back from the brink of collapse.

Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa was expected to return to Lebanon this week to continue searching for a deal. Late Sunday, reports emerged that Hezbollah might be willing to accept the Arab League proposal. But the details weren't clear — and other flashes of optimism have repeatedly been squelched in weeks of contentious negotiations.

Dismissing the street protests as an attempted coup d'etat engineered by Hezbollah's main foreign backers, Syria and Iran, Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and his Cabinet ministers have clung resolutely to power.

But the rain of insults and criticism unleashed in recent days on Siniora, a Sunni Muslim, has stirred fury among the government's supporters and raised the ire of Sunnis.

Meanwhile, through its media, Hezbollah and its allies have stepped up warnings of impending eruptions of civil disobedience: a large-scale labor strike, the closure of roads and the airport, the storming of the government offices to oust Siniora. Such escalation would run the risk of sparking serious clashes by provoking the government and its supporters and, potentially, the army and security forces.

Largely because of the sectarian overtones of the crisis, both the government and its critics have found themselves in a delicate position, analysts say.

Despite a nuanced set of allegiances among religious sects on both sides of the divide, the demonstration is fundamentally viewed by Lebanese as a standoff between a Sunni-dominated government and Shiite-led street protesters.

The government can't give up too much power without raising questions of weakness among the Sunnis. Nor can Hezbollah go home, or accept too little, without accepting defeat on behalf of Shiites.

"You can't back off in Lebanon," said Hilal Khashan, a political science professor at the American University of Beirut. "If you do, it means an entire sect has been defeated."

And in a country where losing face is akin to ceding power, Hezbollah and its allies have staked their credibility on the pledge to oust the government.

"Everybody is in a corner now," Ibrahim Moussawi, editor of Hezbollah's newspaper and a de facto spokesman for the party, said Sunday. "If the government continues to be stubborn and not listen to the people, then there will be some kind of escalation, although not necessarily violent. This will come in the next few days, not more than that."

From the beginning, the protesters confidently predicted that the Siniora government would crumple in the face of their massive demonstrations.

But that hasn't happened.

Despite curses and cries from the streets outside, despite the crippling of downtown Beirut, a relatively unflappable government has continued to plug away at its business in a heavily fortified compound. International delegations come and go. Siniora appears on television every day, weary-looking but composed and nattily dressed. Police guard the streets; trash gets picked up.

Meanwhile, the nights are getting colder and longer and an eagerness to shatter the status quo is mounting on the streets. Among Hezbollah and its allies in the opposition, there is a growing fear that the first flush of revolutionary enthusiasm will soon sink into stagnation — or, worse, that their demonstration and, by extension, their political movements, will begin to appear irrelevant.

"We are not tired," Ali Hassan Khalil, a lawmaker for the Shiite Amal party, told the crowd Sunday. "They push us to adopt other options…. Let the whole world know, we do have other options."

Demonstrators poured into Beirut from around the country, many of them bused into the capital from predominantly Shiite hinterlands. They milled around the packed streets in a daze, shoving impatiently through the bodies, giddily chanting "Down with Siniora!" and buying gritty street food from vendors.

As young boys formed human pyramids and banged on drums, the mood was at times festive, but just below the surface, frustration was building up.

"It seems they don't want to step down so easily," said Mohammed Azwar, a 22-year-old protester who had been bused to the capital from the Bekaa Valley. "We did not expect this. But it's just because of all the support they're getting from abroad."

Azwar carried a cardboard poster bearing a picture of U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey Feltman meeting with Lebanese officials. It read, "We don't want Feltman's government."

Lebanon's Shiites are well acquainted with the experience of being brushed aside by those in power. Still, there was a sense of dawning surprise at the government's tenacity, and the bruised mood of being ignored in a mass endeavor that was specifically designed to blast through any attempts to overlook the people's demands.

"Hasn't he seen all these people? Hasn't he looked out the window of his castle?" an announcer said, his voice blaring from massive speakers. "What does he want, blood? Let this government fall! We want this government to leave us!"

As Crowd Demands Change, Lebanese Premier Is Puzzled (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 10 — The center of Beirut was packed Sunday with hundreds of thousands of pro-Hezbollah and allied demonstrators who, in a jubilant mass of protest and carnival, pressed their call for the government to resign.

The pounding of martial music and the roaring din of the excited crowd floated up a nearby hill to pierce the thick walls of the stately government building, the Grand Serail, as the prime minister, Fouad Siniora, entered a ceremonial room for a news conference. “I don’t understand what is this great cause that is making them create this tense political mess and stage open-ended demonstrations,” he said to a small group of reporters.

Over and over, the crowd, the speakers and the posters offered clear explanations. They did not want a government controlled by the so-called March 14 coalition, an amalgam of Sunni, Christian and Druse parties. They did not want a government aligned with Washington. In short, a very large number of Lebanese citizens said they did not want the present leadership.

A banner hung down the side of a building, showing a picture of the prime minister hugging Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. “Thanks Condy,” it said, just beneath an image of dead children, referring to Lebanese civilian casualties during Israel’s war with Hezbollah in the summer.

“There is no longer a place for America in Lebanon,” Hezbollah’s deputy leader, Sheik Naim Qassem, said in remarks that boomed through loudspeakers.

“Do you not recall that the weapons fired on Lebanon were American weapons?” he added.

Prime Minister Siniora’s somewhat surprising expression of bewilderment seemed to capture the spirit dividing this country of just four million people. There are government supporters who appear afraid and threatened, and there are opponents of the government, particularly those who support Hezbollah, who seem empowered and confident that they stand at the threshold of victory.

In a subdued ceremony that seemed a reverse image of the boisterous protests, several thousand people gathered to mark the anniversary of the assassination of Gibran Tueni, the anti-Syrian newspaper publisher killed in a car bombing last year. The front of the convention center was filled with Range Rovers, Jaguars and Mercedes-Benzes. Inside, the audience was dressed for a funeral, in suits and ties.

"Everyone is afraid," said Michel Khoury, a former governor of the central bank, as he left the memorial, a shiny new cellphone pressed to his ear. "The Shiite community is very important. It is the first time it is monolithic, the first time in the history of this country you have one of the communities united."

In Tripoli on Sunday, tens of thousands of pro-government demonstrators rallied.

This fight between Lebanese factions, defined primarily along sectarian lines, is a struggle for control of the government that will help determine Lebanon's future, and whether the nation eventually leans toward Iran and Syria, as the radical Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah would like, or toward the United States and Europe, as the governing alliance would like.

"We are today at the last phase of our struggle before we consolidate our independence, freedom and sovereignty, because the government has proven to be a failure at all levels," said Michel Aoun, a former general and a Christian leader, in a live video broadcast to the demonstrators in Beirut. "They have failed to isolate the Lebanese people from one another and we are here today to represent unity and we are leading this struggle together." He has aligned his Christian party, the Free Patriotic Movement, with Hezbollah.

He said that within a few days, the allied groups would press to form an interim cabinet and then for early parliamentary elections. There have been rumors flying around Beirut that the next step would be attempts to block roads, the airport and the ports, to grind the country to a halt. But there have been no official announcements.

Hezbollah and its allies have managed for 10 days to control the center of Beirut with a loud, peaceful, organized protest. In many ways, Hezbollah has adopted a strategy that has been cheered by the White House in the past, in places like Ukraine, and even Lebanon, leaning on large, peaceful crowds to force unpopular governments to resign and pave the way for elections.

But this time Washington and its allies have said the protest amounts to a coup d'état, fueling charges that the United States supports democratic practices only when its allies are winning.

"Does Bush want national expression in Lebanon?" Sheik Qassem said to the crowd. "Do the West and Arabs want the voice of the people in Lebanon? Tell them, 'Death to America.' Tell them, 'Death to Israel.' Tell them, 'Glory to a free Lebanon.' "

The Hezbollah alliance took its protests to the streets after the governing coalition refused its demands to give Hezbollah and its allies more power, including the ability to veto all government action.

The current demonstration began Friday, with hundreds of thousands of people pouring into the center of the city, many bused in from the poor, war-ravaged Shiite communities of the south. The government appeared to hope that the protesters would grow weary and go back to the negotiating table.

But on Sunday, there was the huge crowd, a vista of humanity pressed shoulder to shoulder, flying flags and calling for the government to resign.

"We want a clean cabinet," read one banner.

"Victory, change, is coming," read another.

The gravity of the situation was underlined by roads sealed by soldiers and razor wire, and the many shops and restaurants that remained closed.

But high spirits seemed dominant. "I am having fun overthrowing the cabinet," said Hassan Katteya, 10, as he walked with his mother, Reema, through the crowd.

"We feel that we are the strong party," Mrs. Katteya said. "The government is the weak party. They are hiding up there in the Grand Serail."

Hezbollah Steps Up Protests Against Lebanese Government (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson, Usa Today

USA Today, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT — Hezbollah and its allies stepped up their campaign to oust Lebanon's government Sunday by flooding downtown Beirut with hundreds of thousands of chanting protesters in a show of force.

Sunday's turnout appeared to be the largest since 800,000 protesters poured into downtown Dec. 1.

Since then, several thousand protesters have camped outside the offices of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. There were no official estimates of Sunday's crowd.

Pressure on the government could increase today. The anti-government newspaper Ad-Diyar said the opposition would call for a work strike. A strike could close Beirut's international airport and shipping ports and slow other public services.

"I support a strike and will (strike) if it is called," said protester Tony Khoury, 37, of suburban Beirut. "I'm willing to give blood to bring this government down."

Khoury was one of hundreds of flag-waving, slogan-chanting Lebanese from across the country of 4 million people to swamp Riad el Solh and Martyrs squares on the 10th day of protests Sunday. Protesters flooded streets and arteries feeding in to downtown for blocks, filled highway overpasses and climbed on nearby small buildings.

They roared approval as anti-government speakers alternately decried the government and urged peace among Lebanon's religious groups that are split over the political crisis.

Hezbollah, a political and militant Shiite group backed by Iran and Syria, and its allies launched the demonstrations to demand a third of the Cabinet posts in the government, which would give them veto control. If not, they want Saniora to resign. They vow to keep up the pressure until their demands are met.

Saniora, who leads an anti-Syrian majority ruling coalition, has refused to give in and has branded the demonstrations a coup attempt backed by Iran and Syria.

The United States, other Western governments and moderate Arab states support Saniora.

"Our political, security and economic lives, our whole system, is facing a major challenge," Saniora said Sunday. But, he said, the country and its democracy are strong enough to weather it.

The protesters say they won't give in. No solution to the standoff seems imminent.

"We are here, so the government will fall," said protester Ruwayda Dilbani, 29, who works for a trading company in Rayak, a town in Lebanon's Bekaa region.

Some speakers also decried the government as a puppet of the United States for not supporting Hezbollah when its guerrillas waged a 34-day war against Israel this summer.

"After the (Israeli) aggression … there is no place for America in Lebanon," Hezbollah deputy chief Naim Kassem told the crowds.

They responded, "Death to America! Death to Israel! Long live a dignified Lebanon!"

One Shiite Muslim youth was killed Dec. 3 in a Sunni Muslim neighborhood on his way home from a demonstration. Since then, there have been skirmishes between supporters of the two sides.

Whose War Crimes? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

A few scenes from modern warfare:

Mohammad Abd al-Hamid Srour moved missiles across southern Lebanon under cover of a white flag. Hussein Ali Mahmoud Suleiman used the porch of a private home to fire rockets. Maher Hassan Mahmoud Kourani dressed in civilian clothes, hid his Kalashnikov in a tote bag and stored anti-aircraft missiles in the back of a green unmarked Volvo. The three men, all members of Hezbollah, were captured by Israel during last summer's war.

Now their videotaped interviews form part of a remarkable report by retired Lieutenant Colonel Reuven Erlich of Israel's Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center. Relying heavily on captured Hezbollah documents, onsite and aerial photography and other first-hand evidence, the report shows how the Shiite group put innocent civilians at risk by deliberately deploying its forces in cities, towns and often private homes.

Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, has accused Israel's military of "indiscriminate warfare" and "a disturbing disregard for the lives of Lebanese civilians." Mr. Erlich demolishes that claim, and in the process shows the asymmetric strategy of Islamist radicals.

The most persuasive evidence here is photographic, so we urge readers to access the report itself on the Web site of the American Jewish Congress (ajcongress.org1). Hezbollah's headquarters in Aita al-Shaab, for instance, sits in the heart of the village. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah's office and home are in a densely built neighborhood of Beirut. In the town of Qana -- site of an Israeli bombing on July 30 that killed 28 and that Hezbollah's apologists were quick to label a "massacre" -- an arms warehouse can be seen adjacent to a mosque. There are photographs of rockets in the back seats of cars, missile launchers adjacent to farm houses, storage bunkers hidden beneath homes. There is also a trove of before-and-after photography demonstrating the precision of most Israeli bombing.

The report also shows how the use of civilian cover was explicitly part of Hezbollah's strategy. "[The organization's operatives] live in their houses, in their schools, in their churches, in their fields, in their farms and in their factories," said Mr. Nasrallah in a TV interview on May 27, several weeks before the war. "You can't destroy them in the same way you would destroy an army."

Exactly what Mr. Nasrallah means is illustrated in the testimonials of the captured fighters. Asked why Hezbollah would risk the destruction of civilian areas by firing from them, Mr. Suleiman replied that while in theory private homes belonged to "the residents of the village . . . in essence they belong to Hezbollah."

Perhaps that's true; if so, then Human Rights Watch has no grounds to accuse Israel of atrocities when Mr. Nasrallah has effectively declared everyone and everything in southern Lebanon to be his fief. Our sense, however, is that not all southern Lebanese were delighted to have their livelihoods appropriated for Hezbollah's political purposes, even if they were too intimidated to register a protest. Either way, it is Hezbollah, not Israel, that is guilty of war crimes here.

Beyond the war in Lebanon, these images suggest how Islamists seek to use the restraint of Western powers against them. They shoot at our civilians from the safety of their own civilian enclaves that they know we are reluctant to attack. Then if by chance their civilians are killed, they call in CNN and al-Jazeera cameras and wait for the likes of Mr. Roth to denounce America or Israel for war crimes.

None of this means the U.S. shouldn't continue to fight with discrimination and avoid civilian casualties. But it means our political leadership needs to speak as candidly as Israelis now are speaking about this enemy strategy, so the American people can understand and be steeled against this new civilian battleground.

Ideas: Presidential Provocation (NSWK)

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - President Carter has a new book out, his 23rd since leaving office and his most controversial. "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid" has drawn fire for its use of the word "apartheid," and a former associate, Kenneth Stein, a professor of Middle Eastern studies at Emory University, is raising questions about the book's accuracy. (Disclosure: NEWSWEEK's Christopher Dickey was one of the people asked to comment on an early draft of the book.) President Carter spoke to Eleanor Clift:

You've created quite a stir. I suspect it was partly intentional.

Well, it was. But one of the purposes of the book was to provoke discussion, which is very rarely heard in this country, and to open up some possibility that we could rejuvenate or restart the peace talks in Israel that have been absent for six years.

The word apartheid—did you agonize about that?

Not really, because I knew that's an accurate description of what's going on in Palestine. I would say that the plight of the Palestinians now—the confiscation of their land, that they're being suppressed completely against voicing their disapproval of what's happening, the building of the wall that intrudes deep within their territory, the complete separation of Israelis from the Palestinians—all of those things in many ways are worse than some of the aspects of apartheid in South Africa. No one can go there and visit the different cities in Palestine without agreeing with what I have said.

Why do you think you're under attack for the book and the title?

You and I both know the powerful influence of AIPAC, which is not designed to promote peace. I'm not criticizing them, they have a perfect right to lobby, but their purpose in life is to protect and defend the policies of the Israeli government and to make sure those policies are approved in the United States and in our Congress—and they're very effective at it.

You're obviously aware of your main critic, Mr. Stein, who used to be with the Carter Center.

Thirteen years ago! He hasn't been associated with the Carter Center for 13 years.

He says that he was a third party in some meetings and his notes don't jibe with yours.

He was a third party in some of the meetings, I can't deny that. And a lot of those meetings took place when I was still president and an exact transcription was kept and it's in the official files. So the reports that I gave in the book are completely accurate.

He also has a veiled hint of plagiarism, saying you took from other sources.

The only source that I took anything from that I know about was my own book, which I wrote earlier—it's called "The Blood of Abraham" ... Somebody told me this morning [Stein] was complaining about the maps in the book. Well, the maps are derived from an atlas that was published in 2004 in Jerusalem and it was basically produced under the aegis of officials in Sweden. And the Swedish former prime minister is the one who told me this was the best atlas available about the Middle East.

To bring it up to the here and now, the Iraq Study Group report recommends ...

Exactly what I did—that the peace talks recommence.

The Big Lie About The Middle East (TIME)

By Lisa Beyer

Time, December 11, 2006

No sensible person is against peacemaking in the Holy Land. Applause and hopefulness would seem the reasonable reaction to the Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the Bush Administration "act boldly" and "as soon as possible" to resolve the conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians. But as a front-row observer of similar efforts over the past 15 years, I could muster neither response. In lumping the Iraq mess in with the Palestinian problem--and suggesting the first could not be fixed unless the second was too--the Baker-Hamilton commission lent credibility to a corrosive myth: that the fundamental problem in the Arab world is the plight of the Palestinians.

It is a falsehood perpetuated not just by the likes of Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden, who came late to the slogan after their actual beefs--Saddam with his neighbors; bin Laden with the Saudi royals--gained insufficient traction in the Arab world. The mantra is also repeated like an axiom in the U.S.--in parts of the State Department, in various think tanks, by editorial writers and Sunday talk-show hosts.

Yes, it was a great disturbance in the Arab world in the 1940s when a Jewish state was born through a U.N. vote and a war that made refugees of many Palestinians. Then the 1967 war left Israel in control of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and thus the Palestinians who lived there. But the pan-Arabism that once made the Palestinian cause the region's cause is long dead, and the Arab countries have their own worries aplenty. In a decade of reporting in the region, I found it rarely took more than the arching of an eyebrow to get the most candid of Arab thinkers to acknowledge that the tears shed for the Palestinians today outside the West Bank and Gaza are of the crocodile variety. Palestinians know this best of all.

To promote the canard that the troubles of the Arab world are rooted in the Palestinians' misfortune does great harm. It encourages the Arabs to continue to avoid addressing their colossal societal and political ills by hiding behind their Great Excuse: it's all Israel's fault. Certainly, Israel has at times been an obnoxious neighbor, but God help the Arab leaders, propagandists and apologists if a day ever comes when the Arab-Israeli mess is unraveled. One wonders how they would then explain why in Egypt 4 of every 10 people are illiterate; Saudi Arabian Shi'ites (not to mention women) are second-class citizens; 11% of Syrians live below subsistence level; and Jordan's King can unilaterally dissolve Parliament, as he did in 2001. Or why no Middle Eastern government but Israel's and to some extent Lebanon's tolerates freedom of assembly or speech, or democratic institutions like a robust press or civic organizations with independence and clout--let alone unfettered competitive elections.

One might argue that if the Arab dictators were deprived of the Great Excuse, they might begin to rule with greater concern for their constituents' needs. But why should they be allowed to wait--in the meantime cynically selling their people the Israel Myth--especially since the wait is apt to be long? The Baker commission is quite right in wanting to see sooner rather than later a viable Palestinian state. But the report's airy prescription for frog-marching Israelis and Palestinians into new peace talks perpetuates another persistent fiction: that U.S. involvement is the key to a breakthrough. That contradicts the real-life story of all three of the major peace agreements Israel has signed, with the Egyptians, Palestinians and Jordanians. Each was the result of bold initiative not by Washington but by local leaders, when conditions were ripe. In all three cases, the accords were the product of negotiations begun in secret behind the backs of the Americans. The Oslo accords with the Palestinians ultimately fell apart, but not because of a collapse of U.S. diplomacy; rather, because of a failure of leadership by Yasser Arafat.

The Israelis and Palestinians aren't going to make peace until they have brave, inspiring leaders, which they don't, and when they are sick of fighting, which they aren't. When that time comes, the U.S. can facilitate negotiations, as it has before, but only if it re-establishes its reputation as a reasonably honest broker. In the past, Washington tilted to the Israelis' side but not so much that the Palestinians couldn't live with it. President Bush has turned the tilt into a slap-down. He says he supports Palestinian statehood, but the Palestinians don't hear the words; they grasp the lack of feeling he evinces for them. They take in the unprecedented silences in Washington when Israeli forces overreact; they wince at White House endorsements of what the U.S. used to call illegal Jewish settlements in the West Bank. If James Baker had wanted to improve U.S. policy toward the Palestinians, he might have whispered these things into Bush's ear instead of sucking up to the Arab states with his inappropriate and quixotic peace plan.

Opec Plans Squeeze On Oil Stockpiles (FT)

By Carola Hoyos, Chief Energy Correspondent

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

Two years ago Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil exporter, opened its spigots and let supply out-pace demand. The result was a gradual build up in oil inventories in the US, Europe and several Asian oil-consuming countries.

This month Ali Naimi, the country's influential oil minister, appeared abruptly to reverse that accommodating policy. At a meeting in Cairo he told reporters that the market was "significantly" oversupplied.

"Inventories in the US are high, not low . . . That's why the market is out of balance," the minister said, adding that 100m barrels of oil should be cut to rebalance it.

Inventories have indeed swelled in recent years. By the end of September, stockpiles in the world's 30 biggest oil-consuming countries were at eight-year highs, holding enough oil to last 55 days of consumption.

This worries Mr Naimi because, as the spare-oil cushion in consuming countries has grown, some of the power to influence world oil prices has shifted from the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries to its customers.

Saudi Arabia has already begun to regain its clout and rebuild its own cushion of spare supply, which dwindled as the kingdom tapped into it over the past years to quench a growing thirst in the US and China.

Saudi Aramco, Saudi Arabia's national oil company, is on schedule to boost its production capacity from 10.5m to 12.5m barrels a day by 2009, while the energy ministry is keeping tight control of exactly how much of this it chooses to pump each day. The rest remains underground, for use in the event of a sudden supply interruption elsewhere in the world.

In fact, signs of a shift in Riyadh's policy began to emerge in October. It was Saudi Arabia's idea that Opec agree to reduce its production by 1.2m b/d at the cartel's October meeting in Doha.

On Thursday the 11-member group is scheduled to meet again, this time in Abuja, the Nigerian capital.

Mr Naimi's utterance and the immediate echo of agreement from other ministers in Cairo is the best indication yet that the kingdom and Opec are seriously considering another cut to further trim the inventories outside their control.

What remains unclear is whether that cut will come at this week's meeting or whether Saudi Arabia will press fellow members, especially Iran and Kuwait, to better adhere to the Doha cuts before agreeing to deepen them.

Mr Naimi made his position on the issue clear late last month, saying: "The kingdom is not prepared in any way to be alone in the task of balancing the market through what is known as swing production, whereby the kingdom cuts production on its own to maintain prices while others [producers] do not."

But why would Opec forgo revenue even though prices are again comfortably above $60 a barrel, its unofficial floor?

The answer lies in the nearly 2m b/d of new oil production from outside Opec that the cartel believes will come on stream next year.

Several prominent analysts disagree with Opec's forecasts. Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers, the investment bank, forecasts that countries outside Opec, which are battling steep rates of field decline, will add no more than 1m barrels of net new production in 2007. In fact he argues that, rather than cut supply, Opec will have to plug a hole.

"The question that remains is whether Opec will have the desire or ability to fill the gap that probably will exist next year between growth in demand and non-Opec supply," he wrote in a recent report.

But Opec sees the world supply/demand picture quite differently, especially in the second quarter of next year. In the spring, when the need for winter heating oil drops and petrol demand has yet to pick up for the summer driving season, the cartel expects that the amount of oil it will need to supply the market will plummet to 27.1m b/d from today's 28.9m b/d.

Now the only question is the timing. Will Opec decide to cut this week or wait to reassess the market, inventories and the cartel's adherence to the Doha cuts early next year? Whatever happens, the group's focus, and that of Saudi Arabia in particular, is yet again firmly set on reducing the consuming world's oil inventories and reasserting the group's clout.

North Korea To Return To Multiparty Talks On Nuclear Program (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

SEOUL -- North Korea will return to nuclear-disarmament talks with five other nations in Beijing next Monday. But expectations are low that the meeting, the first such one in 13 months, can produce a breakthrough, reducing tensions with neighbors and the U.S.

After testing a nuclear device Oct. 9, North Korea early last month said it was willing to resume the so-called six-party talks that it abandoned in November 2005. And two weeks ago, officials from China, North Korea and the U.S. met to set a foundation for the reopened discussions, which also include Japan, Russia and South Korea.

The U.S. is ready to offer more specific incentives to North Korea than were agreed to in September 2005, when the six countries reached a tentative pact in which the North would receive financial and energy assistance in return for giving up its nuclear-weapons pursuit. Last month, President George W. Bush reiterated his willingness to discuss a prize long sought by the North Koreans: a declaration that ends the 56-year-old Korean War, in which the U.S. sided with South Korea.

But even with offers of big political and economic incentives, North Korea is unlikely to end its nuclear program quickly. Its dictator leader, Kim Jong Il, depends for power on the perception among the masses that the country is in a continuous fight with hostile foreign forces -- and nuclear weapons provide the ultimate defense.

The U.S. envoy to the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, struck a cautious tone in discussing expectations for next week's meeting. "We've got some things we need done, and I suspect they will have some of their own ideas for what they want from the process," Mr. Hill said in an email. "So we'll see what we can come up with."

North Korea says it is in favor of denuclearization and signed a treaty with South Korea in the early 1990s pledging to keep the Korean peninsula free of nuclear weapons. But Pyongyang continued to develop them. It walked away from the September 2005 deal with complaints about a separate U.S. investigation of its alleged money-laundering and counterfeiting activities. The probe led to a freeze on North Korean assets in a bank in Macau that was a key financial conduit for Pyongyang.

The U.S. also has said it is willing to discuss a way to end sanctions on the Macau bank, but officials say North Korea would have to halt illegal financial activities.

Analysts say the rosiest outcome for the meeting would be for the six countries to return to the conditions set in last year's deal. "If the next round gets us back to September of last year, then we can start talking about a more substantial retooling," says John Feffer, director of global affairs at the International Relations Center, a private group in Washington.

China Gears Up For Six-nation Talks On NKorea Nuclear Program (AFP)

By Karl Malakunas

AFP, December 11, 2006

Six-nation talks aimed at dismantling North Korea's nuclear program will begin in China within one week, the United States said, ending a 13-month hiatus during which Pyongyang tested an atomic bomb.

The US State Department announced late on Sunday that the talks would resume "around December 16" in Beijing, with a firm date expected to be confirmed on Monday.

The talks -- which involve the two Koreas, host China, the United States, Japan and Russia -- started in 2003 in an effort to stop the North acquiring nuclear weapons.

North Korea had boycotted the talks since November last year in protest at financial sanctions against it for alleged money laundering and counterfeiting.

It then stunned the world on October 9 by conducting its first ever nuclear weapons test, triggering global condemnation -- including from closest ally China -- and UN sanctions.

The United States had insisted since then that it would not return to the talks until it was sure Pyongyang would make major concessions and significant progress would be made.

In announcing the December 16 date, US State Department spokeswoman Joanne Moore said Washington expected the talks to focus on implementing an agreement in September last year when the North agreed to give up its nuclear program.

In what was seen then as a major breakthrough, the North said it would end its nuclear weapons activities in return for security guarantees, energy and other aid.

However there was no word from any of the parties involved on Monday if the United States or North Korea had indeed given any ground, fueling pessimism that the talks may degenerate into another round of labored discussions that achieve nothing.

"I find it extremely difficult to be optimistic about this next round of talks," said Ralph Cossa, president of the Pacific Forum CSIS research institute in Hawaii and member of the Council on US-Korean Security Studies.

"It seems to me so many people are now just defining success as holding talks."

Cossa said the North Koreans had made it clear they would return to talks only if the issue of the US sanctions imposed against it -- which has seen 24 million dollars frozen in a Macau bank -- was resolved.

However he said it was extremely unlikely the United States had given the North Koreans any indication that the sanctions would be lifted.

"It's very difficult for the United States to quietly make an agreement on this. It's a matter of (US) law. It can come to a conclusion that they should be lifted but it's pretty remote."

A key policymaker in Japan's ruling party also warned Sunday that major compromise from Pyongyang was a must in the next round of negotiations.

"The six-party talks should not resume without careful consideration," Syoichi Nakagawa, chairman of the Liberal Democratic Party's policy research council, told a television news program.

"It's okay if (North Korea) brings something about progress or contribution to peace. But otherwise, it's no good. We don't think that resuming talks itself is meaningful."

China hosted two rounds of meetings in October and November between the North Korean and Chinese envoys to the talks in an effort to kickstart the negotiations.

China's foreign ministry had no comment when asked on Monday when the talks would resume.

N.Korean Nuclear Talks To Resume Dec. 18 (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, December 11, 2006

International talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear weapons program are likely to resume in the week starting Dec. 18, South Korea's top nuclear envoy said Sunday.

Chun Yung-woo told The Associated Press that he expects the talks to resume in the week starting Dec. 18, but that consultations are still under way and China will announce the date soon.

In Washington, a senior U.S. official said Saturday the talks are expected to reconvene Dec. 18 in Beijing and continue for three to five days. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because host China has not announced a final schedule.

North Korea has boycotted the talks since November last year, angered by U.S. financial restrictions imposed because of Pyongyang's alleged involvement in money laundering and counterfeiting of dollars.

The parties to the talks — the two Koreas, the U.S., China, Russia and Japan — have been trying to set a date for the fresh round of talks. North Korea agreed to a resumption of negotiations after it tested a nuclear bomb on Oct. 9.

Chun said Seoul hopes to see "substantial progress toward implementing the Sept. 19 statement" in the upcoming nuclear talks, referring to a breakthrough agreement reached at talks last year when North Korea agreed to abandon its atomic program in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Saturday that any future nuclear talks must yield "early and concrete results."

"We believe it is necessary for North Korea to show concrete actions toward the abandonment of all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs," Abe said.

Last month, the U.S. offered North Korea specific details about the kind of economic and energy assistance the North would receive in exchange for shutting down its nuclear arms facilities. But it remains unclear whether the communist country has made specific promises for the outcome of the new talks.

In Tokyo, a top Japanese ruling party official warned Sunday that that his country opposes resuming the nuclear talks unless Pyongyang is ready to compromise.

"It's fine if North Korea can bring some contribution to peace, but simply starting talks is not meaningful," Shoichi Nakagawa, chairman of the Liberal Democratic Party's policy research council, said on a morning talk show carried by public broadcaster NHK.

Vietnam Trade Deal Is Hailed In US (FT)

By Amy Kazmin And Eoin Callan

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

Vietnam and US business leaders hailed a US Congressional vote Sunday to permanently normalise trade relations with Vietnam, the final step on the long road to reconciliation between the two countries after their bitter war 30 years ago.

The historic measure – adopted as part of a massive bill combining various tax and trade measures – ends an old, Cold War-era requirement that Washington evaluate Hanoi's human rights record as a pre-condition for renewing normal trade relations with Vietnam each year.

The pact – passed with strong bi-partisan support over the weekend before the Republicans surrender power in the Congress – will ensure that US companies can fully benefit from Vietnam's accession to the World Trade Organisation on December 28.

"This event is of major significance for the ties between Vietnam and the United States," said Le Dung, Vietnam's foreign ministry spokesman.

George W. Bush – who last month became only the second US president to visit Vietnam since the end of the war three decades ago – said the development "marks a significant step forward in the process of normalising relations with Vietnam, and will benefit both our nations".

The US business community expressed strong relief at the news, after the embarrassing fiasco last month on the eve of Mr Bush's visit, when a rushed effort to normalise trade relations with the Communist-ruled country failed to muster adequate Congressional support.

Since the US and Vietnam signed a bilateral trade deal in late 2001, two-way trade between the two countries has risen to $7.8bn a year, up from $1.2bn in 2000, an increase driven mainly by surging Vietnamese exports of garments, shoes, furniture and seafood to the US. To join the WTO, Hanoi has agreed to liberalise its domestic service industries, including banking and insurance, sectors of keen interest to many US companies, eager to tap into a fast-growing market of 84m people.US companies had feared that they could be disadvantaged in accessing the market if Washington had not fully normalised trade relations with Vietnam.

David Knapp, chairman of the the American Chamber of Commerce in Vietnam, said he was "pleased" with the vote, and that he expected US businesses to enjoy "increased opportunities in both the goods and services sectors" as a result of Vietnam's WTO accession.

Susan Schwab, US trade representative, said: "This bill shows that contrary to conventional wisdom, Democrats and Republicans, the administration and Congress, can work together to further our vital trade agenda."

"The vote also demonstrates to our trading partners in East Asia, the US commitment to strengthen and deepen our relationships in that region," she added.

The advance for the White House trade agenda comes amid setbacks on several fronts, as free trade negotiations with South Korea stall and deals with Peru and Colombia run into opposition from Democrats over labour standards.

US business groups welcomed the normalisation of relations with Vietnam as part of wider trade and tax package. John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said: "These are all critical trade programs for US manufacturers and our trade partners in the development world."

Bruce Josten, of the US chamber of commerce, said the trade measures were of "critical" importance to business and would "expand US trade and economic competitiveness and promote growth".

China's Shifting Growth May Alter Its Taste For Foreign Investment (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

BEIJING -- China's entry into the World Trade Organization, five years ago today, sparked an economic expansion that is the envy of the world. But now, that very growth is posing new problems for China and its increasingly uneasy trading partners.

Over the past five years, the size of China's economy has nearly doubled, with annual output surpassing $2 trillion in 2005. The world's most populous nation is now its fourth-largest economy and third-largest exporter.

China's WTO entry did what officials inside and outside the country were hoping it would -- increase trade and make markets more competitive. By becoming more open, China has become stronger and more prosperous. But the growing size and sophistication of its domestic economy have made the outside world less important to China's economic vigor now than it was during the early years of the country's export boom. That raises an important question: Will China continue to be ever-more welcoming to foreign investment in the years ahead?

Even as China has begun to take a more active role in international affairs, its economic strategy has shifted inward. It is increasingly trying to nurture homegrown companies, rather than simply providing an attractive climate for multinational corporations to set up shop.

There's an emerging consensus among the nation's leaders that China no longer needs to cater to the whims of foreign investors in order to grow. That shift in sentiment was underscored earlier this year when China's economic planners called for more-selective approval of foreign investment and fewer giveaways, such as tax breaks or land.

U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's scheduled visit to Beijing this week is part of a continuing effort by China's trading partners to deal with this new reality.

When China won the WTO's seal of approval in late 2001, it was a signal to the world that Beijing wasn't going to turn its back on capitalism. That sent a flood of foreign investment sweeping into China, surging from roughly $40 billion annually in the years before 2002 to more than $70 billion last year.

China's economic ascendance hasn't been altogether comfortable for much of the rest of the world. The addition of China's vast, low-cost labor pool to the global work force has put widespread pressure on jobs and wages in many wealthier nations. It often seems to employees of U.S. and European companies that their bosses prefer to hire workers to make things in China rather than use their home-country assembly lines.

In some ways, the change has also been painful for China. As it has phased out state control of its economy, China has dismantled much of its health-care and social-welfare system and laid off millions of workers from state-run companies. Competition from foreign companies sometimes gets the blame for the resulting social problems.

Even so, China has largely adhered to its WTO commitments, though some critics say it hasn't been aggressive enough in combating copyright piracy or letting market forces influence its currency's foreign-exchange rates.

And while complaints about China's trading practices are rife, it is also clear that China's economy is in many ways more open than Japan's was during its rise in the 1980s and India's is today.

Japan was once notorious for the difficulty foreign companies faced in penetrating its maze of tariffs and regulations. Even though it is much more open now, imports still account for only about 11% of the country's gross domestic product. The equivalent figure for China was 29% last year.

Compared with India, China's greater openness is visible at street level. Wal-Mart Stores Inc. outlets are fixtures in every major Chinese city. The U.S. discount retailer now has 66 stores in China and is building more -- but it has yet to open a single outlet in India, where government rules ban most direct foreign investments in the retail sector.

The regulatory overhaul that China undertook to meet the requirements of WTO membership meant allowing new competition in industries long dominated by state-owned firms. Among other things, that process jump-started financial restructuring. Four of China's five biggest banks now trade on international stock markets and boast big foreign shareholders.

Not every industry is equally open, and some openings have had unanticipated consequences. Take cars, which very few of China's private citizens owned when the WTO pact was signed. Then-U.S. Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky, explaining the benefits of a WTO deal in April 2000, noted how "a combination of trade barriers and industrial policies makes it virtually impossible to export cars to China." The country subsequently removed many of those barriers, and auto sales boomed as car prices fell.

The boom came so quickly that infrastructure and public transport haven't kept up: Major cities are now choked with traffic and smog, especially Beijing, where a car's average speed can be slower than a bicycle's at peak hours.

What didn't happen, however, was a boom in car exports to China. China did buy more cars from abroad -- 143,000 vehicles in 2005, compared with 61,000 in 2001 -- but most of the market has gone to locally made vehicles. Passenger-car sales are expected to top three million this year, up from fewer than one million in 2001. The Chinese market's combination of huge size and rapid growth made it irresistible to global auto makers, but the companies quickly realized that making cars locally was the best way to cater to Chinese tastes and budgets.

Peter Pang, the China president of German auto-parts and power-tools maker Robert Bosch GmbH, has seen a similar shift play out in his business. When the Stuttgart-based company came to China in the 1990s, high tariffs and government policies essentially forced it to use a local joint venture to get into the market. These days, Bosch has much more freedom to import its products if it needs to. But the Chinese market has become so much bigger and tougher, Mr. Pang says, that "you have to make locally simply because otherwise you won't be competitive."

That changing dynamic has raised questions about the future of market-opening reforms in China. The country's entry into the WTO on Dec. 11, 2001, started it on a path of gradually lifting tariffs and other trade and investment barriers. While China hasn't been released from its WTO obligations, it has come to the end of the changes it was specifically required to make under its terms of entry.

As a result, the search is on for ways to continue to engage China. Much of the U.S. cabinet will visit Beijing this week for the first meeting of a so-called strategic economic dialogue, a new series of high-level meetings to discuss the two countries' relationship. The European Union is planning a similar process.

"China is more open than at any time in its history," said Minister of Commerce Bo Xilai in a recent speech. But, he added, "The coming five years will be an even more important period for China's development."

China Faces Fresh Tasks On Trade (FT)

By Alan Beattie And Richard Mcgregor

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

Organising more than 100 countries in the World Trade Organisation was already like herding cats. When China joined the WTO five years ago today, the system faced a rather tougher test: adding a particularly large and fearsome tiger to the enclosure.

China's WTO membership has been an exceptional endeavour both for a country that had turned to the market economy only 20 years before joining and for an organisation that had itself been in existence only seven years. So far China's accession has done the country a lot of good, the WTO a fair amount of good and China's trading partners more good than they are generally willing to admit.

But as evinced by US sabre-rattling ahead of its official mission to Beijing this week headed by Hank Paulson, Treasury secretary, China's challenges will, if anything, increase rather than diminish now its five-year transition period is over.

The milestone marks a difference that is more symbolic than practical, though it does coincide with several deadlines for commitments, such as opening up the banking sector. It also means that as an established member of the club, China will face louder and more urgent calls to play by WTO rules.

Moreover, China has been lucky that its five years of membership have coincided with remarkable resilience in global economic growth. If economies stall and unemployment starts rising across the world, irritation with its perceived failings as a trading partner could easily escalate into virulent anger.

China itself has been the most obvious beneficiary from its WTO membership. Its exporters have benefited greatly from increased and guaranteed access to foreign markets, while trepidation about exposing its industries to what China regards as the multinational "wolves" of world trade has substantially been assuaged. Long Yongtu, who was China's chief negotiator on WTO entry, says he is as surprised as anyone. "No one could have predicted that China's foreign trade could increase at such a speed," he says.

China's exporters were already performing very well outside the WTO. But both exports and imports have accelerated since 2001 – and membership not only helped domestic reform but also reassured both Chinese and foreign companies that access to markets was much less likely suddenly to be taken away.

For Mr Long, and Zhu Rongji, the then premier who forced the accession through a resistant bureaucracy, the past five years have provided a spectacular vindication of their strategy to use pressure from WTO accession to force domestic reform and make the Chinese economy more competitive. Mr Long singles out the automotive and agriculture sectors to illustrate how the economy has been transformed in the past five years because of the WTO.

"Before the WTO, Chinese-made cars were expensive and the quality was poor," he says.

WTO membership mandated a large cut in tariffs from a maximum value of 125 per cent, depending on the type of engine, to 25 per cent, a policy complemented by Beijing's decision to allow foreign carmakers into China en masse through 50-50 joint ventures with local partners. A number of competitive, independent domestic carmakers have also established a foothold.

Falling prices, combined with rising local incomes and increased competition, have seen an explosion in car sales, from just under 1m in 2001 to an estimated 4m this year. "That has changed not just China's car industry but also lifestyles, just like what happened in the US and other western countries," says Mr Long.

Nick Reilly, Asia-Pacific president for General Motors of the US, says he too was pleasantly surprised at the size of the new middle-class Chinese consumer market. Mr Reilly told chief executives at the recent Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation meeting in Hanoi: "A decade ago we thought we might sell 60,000 vehicles a year to government officials and state-owned enterprises. In fact we are selling 900,000 a year, largely to the newly affluent."

Chinese agriculture, considered the most vulnerable sector and the most politically sensitive because of the size of the rural population, has also survived and, in some sectors, thrived. In many ways it has displayed a textbook "comparative advantage" response to being opened up. A populous country with relative shortages of land and water, China has increased imports of water- and land-intensive commodities such as soya beans and wheat – and on occasion even rice, a highly symbolic crop – and shifted domestic production towards labour-intensive crops such as fruit and vegetables.

Mr Long came under sharp attack at home for agreeing to so-called "tariff-rate quotas", a form of price-based import allowance, for grain, which is still regarded in China as strategically vital to food security. His critics said foreigners would fill the quotas, even if the extra grain were not needed, something that has not happened.

"Now people understand how these quotas work," he says. "They were very suspicious."

Still, suspicions remain within China that WTO membership has not prevented China getting a raw deal from international trading partners. Much of China's trading heft has come from foreign-owned companies, which account for 58 per cent of total exports and much larger shares of the higher-value products into which the country is trying to move.

Rupert Schlegelmilch, head of China trade relations at the European Commission, says: "Foreign companies play leading roles in some important sectors in China, which fuels a degree of 'investment nationalism' in some circles in China: complaints that China's economy has a strong body with strong limbs but no head and that there is not enough transfer of technology."

Investment and trade nationalism are not helped by episodes such as the China National Offshore Oil Corporation's failed takeover approach for Unocal, the American oil company, which the US blocked on national security grounds. Nor were the Chinese impressed by the imposition by the EU and US of emergency "safeguard" import restrictions on Chinese clothing shortly after the expiry of a global system of textile quotas last year – a deadline for which they and textile companies had been given 10 years' warning.

Wang Jinzhen, secretary-general of China's Council for the Promotion of International Trade, says: "The US and EU had a lot of time to make the transition but did not until the very last minute."

Outside China, sentiment about its WTO membership is even more mixed. Its massive increase in exports has provoked a tumult of complaints about unfair trade. Capitol Hill tends to look at America's growing bilateral trade deficit with China without accepting that it mainly reflects China's core strength as an assembler of components it imports from elsewhere, and that China's overall trade surplus is quite modest.

Many objections are related to China's manipulation of its currency, which falls outside the WTO's competence. Within the WTO, those industries dependent on intellectual property rights (IPR) protection, particularly films and music, have worn themselves hoarse about the feebleness of China's promised clampdown on compact disc and DVD counterfeiters. The EU and the US say too much of China's service sector, particularly financial services, remains hedged round with impenetrable regulations.

But the dominant feeling so far in Washington and Brussels is that China's WTO membership has been a net positive for both the country and the organisation, rather than the pessimistic minority view that China has flouted WTO rules and brought itself and the system into disrepute. The most dramatic symbol of US protectionism – a bill to impose 27.5 per cent tariffs on all Chinese imports, which would be flatly illegal under WTO rules – was withdrawn by its sponsors in September with the promise of a WTO-compliant replacement.

Only one case against China has so far been pursued in the WTO's dispute settlement body – a joint action by the EU, US and Canada on car parts, imports of which they say China is taxing unfairly. The US continues to warn that a case against IPR violations is likely unless compliance improves.

Though China is at the centre of plenty of other disputes, its membership of the WTO has at least helped to moderate and regulate those. For example, China is both by far the biggest target and an enthusiastic user of so-called "anti-dumping" actions – retaliatory tariffs countries impose on supposedly subsidised imports. These tariffs are imposed bilaterally but WTO rules limit their scope.

Simon MacKinnon, Greater China president at Corning, the US glass and technology company, says China's WTO membership has made a marked difference in atmosphere. Corning, one of the world's biggest manufacturers of optical fibre, was accused but then cleared of dumping in an investigation by China's commerce ministry. "China's WTO membership has brought more visibility," Mr MacKinnon says. "China is part of the WTO trade dispute resolution process and China has a seat at the table." Corning has now invested heavily in China.

Still, there is one area where China has conspicuously avoided responsibility – the stalled Doha round of trade talks, whose launch coincided with China's accession. Beijing has left the representation of the developing world to other governments, notably India and Brazil, despite entreaties from other negotiating parties including the US and EU to play a more active public role. The Chinese attitude has been, in the words of Grant Aldonas, until last year US commerce undersecretary for international trade: "We gave at the office."

Beijing argues that it has had its hands full implementing its WTO accession commitments. This looks more like an excuse than a reason, but a tactically sound one. Silence on Doha deprives of evidence those domestic critics who say Beijing is volunteering to expose too much of China's economy to foreign competition. Bo Xilai, the ambitious commerce minister, is pushing for a promotion to vice-premier at the five-yearly party congress next year. Mr Bo has elevated his profile with strong nationalistic attacks on American and European critics of China's supposedly export-obsessed trade policy.

Internationally, Chinese exporters are already causing more than enough concern among both rich and poor trading partners without its bureaucrats also throwing their weight around. India, for example, says its reluctance to allow deep cuts in import tariffs on industrial goods reflects a fear of exports from China. Similarly, if China volunteered to reduce the protection of its farmers or service companies, other developing countries might have to follow suit.

Looking ahead, trade tensions involving China are if anything likely to rise rather than moderate. As China goes up the value chain to more sophisticated goods, its companies will increasingly compete directly with those in developed countries. Trade lawyers reckon there is a large number of potential WTO legal cases.

Any economic slowdown that pushes up US unemployment would test the patience of American lawmakers with Chinese intransigence on the level of its currency or any other trade-related issue. A big fall in commodity prices will encourage a flood of anti-dumping cases against China from steelmakers that do not share the views of Mr Wang from the trade promotion council, who says: "There is no way for the US to continue to be engaged in those lower-technology industries including textiles and, I personally think, even steel...Maybe [the US steel industry] will last another 10 years."

China's entry into the WTO fold was a big risk and the country needs to continue to pussyfoot warily around its fellow members. But so far, if only tentatively and partially, so good.

A Broad Dialogue With China (WP)

By Henry M. Paulson

Washington Post, December 11, 2006

My highest priority as Treasury secretary is the long-term strength and competitiveness of the U.S. economy. Managing our economic relationship with China to ensure both nations benefit is vital to our nation's future prosperity. A market-based economy in China, with sustainable economic growth and full participation in rules-based international trade, is in our best interest -- and in the interest of the Chinese people.

Since 1980 China's share of the world economy has more than quadrupled. The United States and China now account for almost half of global economic growth. And bilateral trade between our two nations grew by a factor of five over the past decade. Beyond the numbers, the U.S.-China economic relationship epitomizes both the opportunities and challenges of globalization.

This week a delegation made up of U.S. Cabinet secretaries, agency directors and the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben Bernanke, will participate in the first meeting of our new Strategic Economic Dialogue with China.

Presidents Bush and Hu Jintao launched the dialogue in September to focus on China's successful integration into the global economy and ensure that China continues on its market-based reform path.

My colleagues and I will meet with Chinese leaders in Beijing for discussions in three areas: maintaining sustainable growth without large trade imbalances; continuing to open markets to trade, competition and investment; and improving energy security and the environment.

China is at a crucial juncture. Decisions it makes in the next few years will have long-lasting effects around the world. The United States and China each have a vision of how our relationship will evolve, and in many respects our visions are similar.

We both want strong commercial ties that produce benefits for workers and consumers in America and China. We both want China to grow in a way that is sustainable economically and environmentally and that contributes to global prosperity. We both want China to be a responsible stakeholder in the global economy and in multilateral institutions.

We do have our differences. The United States believes China can do more to reduce its trade surplus. We are encouraging China to introduce greater flexibility for its currency, consistent with economic fundamentals. And China needs to do more to protect intellectual property rights.

Our goal is to advance our common interests and find solutions to issues that strain our relationship. The United States and China are engaged in dozens of bilateral negotiations at multiple levels. This has produced positive outcomes, but it can be difficult to address issues that cut across numerous sectors and areas of responsibility. The dialogue will allow us to meet with several Chinese leaders at once and begin to address important issues comprehensively.

For instance, transparency and respect for the rule of law are core principles that affect all economic policy and trade issues. Commitments to these principles are essential to China's maintaining the confidence of international businesses and of its own investors and entrepreneurs. Working on these principles across government ministries can enhance our ability to reach agreement on a number of key issues that we negotiate ministry-by-ministry.

One of the most important topics for discussion is how to help China manage its transition to freer, more open markets, including capital markets. Every strong, vibrant economy in the world has open, competitive capital markets that attract investment and allocate resources to their most productive uses. Such markets will contribute to sustained economic growth and boost job creation in China. And strengthening and reforming financial markets will ultimately allow the Chinese to freely float their currency.

The Chinese government is committed to creation of a social safety net, including health and retirement programs that will contribute to balanced growth by giving Chinese workers and families the confidence to spend more.

China's high saving rate is a major contributor to the country's large global trade surplus. Increasing consumption in China will benefit U.S. and other exporters.

Energy is an issue with far-reaching effects. Both the pattern of China's growth -- with its heavy dependence on industry -- and low domestic prices for energy have led to rapidly increasing energy use by China. Unfortunately, because of technological and infrastructure challenges, much of that energy is produced from sources that generate high levels of pollution. This harms the air and water we all share, and creates health problems for Chinese citizens.

Through the Strategic Economic Dialogue, we can work with China's leaders to help it achieve more environmentally and economically sound growth and constructive engagement with the global energy market.

This is a pivotal moment for China and for our relationship with that country. By engaging Chinese leaders with an eye to producing long-term benefits for our two nations, we can build a productive and prosperous partnership for the 21st century.

Chinese Voices That Oppose Reform Grow Louder (FT)

By Susan Schwab

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

One of the most important events in modern economic history occurred five years ago on Monday when China joined the World Trade Organisation. This anniversary provides the opportunity to take stock – through a congressionally mandated report issued on Monday by the office of the US Trade Representative – of China's integration into the global economy and its compliance with WTO obligations.

The record is profoundly mixed. China has moved with resolve to reform some of its economic and governmental structures over the past five years. It has enacted or revised over 1,000 laws and regulations to help bring its trading system into compliance with WTO rules. It has also reduced tariffs on goods of great importance to US industry from an average of 25 per cent in 1997 to 7 per cent today, with similarly significant reductions for agricultural products.

In addition, it has reduced or eliminated numerous non-tariff barriers, increased market access for international service providers and improved the transparency of its governmental procedures. These steps have expanded economic growth in both countries and contributed to a roughly 190 per cent increase in US goods exports to China over the past five years. Today, China is America's fourth largest export market – up from 15th a decade ago.

WTO accession has also helped promote the rule of law in China and subjected the country to binding international dispute settlement procedures. Nevertheless, looking back on the past year, we see troubling indications that China's momentum towards reform has begun to slow. Voices in China opposing further market liberalisation have grown louder and government intervention in the economy, especially at the provincial level, has increased.

While facing fewer blanket prohibitions or prohibitive tariffs, US companies face an array of regulatory obstacles and government policies that make doing business in China uncertain.

Later this week, I will join other administration officials on a trip to China as part of the new strategic economic dialogue led by Treasury secretary Hank Paulson. As part of this dialogue, we will clearly convey our view that a slowdown in reform hinders China's development and undermines the health of our bilateral ties.

One of the most serious challenges identified by USTR is the rampant infringement of intellectual property rights that persists in China in spite of efforts by central government officials to move against this illegal practice. Counterfeiting, piracy and inadequate enforcement of intellectual property protections rob US businesses of billions of dollars a year in legitimate sales and weaken China's development of its own knowledge-based industries.

Of equal concern is China's continued use of industrial policies that limit imports of goods, government subsidies that encourage exports and protect non-competitive industries, and regulatory barriers that impede participation in China's market by US service providers. There are many other areas, from steel to telecommunications, where China's incomplete move away from a centrally-planned to a market-based economy is creating massive distortions that could leave the Chinese and global economies at risk. In agriculture, we are pleased by the rise in US exports to China. But our exporters continue to be frustrated with practices that make China one of the world's least transparent and predictable markets.

The large US trade deficit with China, which this year will exceed the $202bn reached in 2005, is due to factors including differences in patterns of saving, investment and consumption as well as fiscal and monetary policies. Our trade policies can help reduce the imbalance to the extent it arises from closed markets or unfair trade practices. USTR and other US government agencies are aggressively addressing our trade concerns with China through the Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade and other bilateral forums. Multilateral negotiations under the Doha round of trade talks, litigation through the WTO and the application of trade remedy laws are other important avenues. Whether through dialogue, negotiation or dispute settlement, China must be held to its commitments to reform.

We want a strong trade relationship with this vast and fast-growing economy. The potential benefits for Americans – in exports, jobs and greater economic competitiveness – are enormous. But that depends on China's continued reform, and on a commitment to expand free and fair trade based on decisions by the actors in the market – not by bureaucrats.

Cracking The Currency Puzzle (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

Five years ago today, China joined the World Trade Organization. The experiment has gone astonishingly well: China has changed more than 3,000 regulations to comply with WTO requirements. And yet an awkward question hovers over Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's China trip this week: How to deal with a country that appears to distort trade not through tariffs or quotas but through currency and savings policies?

This dilemma reflects a lopsidedness in the rules of globalization. To keep the trade playing field balanced, the WTO presides over a vast apparatus of quasi-law governing subsidies and tariffs; violators can be hauled in front of WTO tribunals. But there is no equivalent mechanism, other than a dormant provision buried in the charter of the International Monetary Fund, to punish countries that skew trade by manipulating their currencies. And there is no sanction at all for pursuing a growth strategy that relies on exports more than domestic consumption.

China has made the most of this vacuum. When it joined the WTO in 2001, its current account surplus (trade plus a few other cross-border payments) was a modest 1.3 percent of gross domestic product. As recently as 2004, when Congress was beating up China for its alleged manipulation of trade, it was possible to retort that China's surplus was just over half the size of Germany's. But this year China's surplus is expected to hit a breathtaking 8 percent or 9 percent of GDP. In absolute terms, it has overtaken Germany's surplus and even Japan's, despite the fact that Japan's GDP remains more than twice the size of China's.

How has China done this? Unlike Japan, it has not closed its economy. Instead, China's surplus reflects, first, a currency that's about a fifth undervalued and so encourages exports; and second, a reluctance to stimulate domestic consumption, which forces companies to sell a large slice of their output to foreigners.

The extraordinary growth of the Chinese surplus has created an unlikely echo of the left's complaints about globalization. The left frequently charges that the international system is unfair: It has rules to enforce open trade, but none to enforce decent labor standards. For years, free-traders have dismissed this as an apples-to-oranges comparison: There are international rules for trade because trade is a necessarily cross-border affair, whereas the appropriate level of labor protection varies among countries. But now economists with impeccable free-trade credentials are saying that there ought to be an international mechanism to enforce responsible exchange-rate policies, and never mind the fact that these have traditionally been viewed as the province of national governments.

The urge to pressure China over its currency policy makes more sense than the urge to punish it for its labor policy. China's dynamic economy has lifted well over 100 million people out of poverty, and excessive labor regulations that slowed growth would harm workers rather than helping them. But China's weak currency, allied with its reluctance to stimulate domestic consumption, damages its economy and workers as well as stirring up trouble for foreigners.

China's commitment to a weak currency limits its freedom to raise interest rates, since higher rates tend to suck in foreign capital and drive the exchange rate upward. This inhibits efforts to use the interest-rate tool to dampen the economy when it overheats -- which explains why China has experienced boom-bust cycles. Meanwhile, a growth strategy that relies on foreign rather than Chinese consumers is not great for the Chinese. China is saving rather than consuming, which means its living standards are lower than they could be.

Then there is the effect of China's policies on foreigners. The challenge of integrating a vast pool of cheap labor into the world trading system is compounded when a low exchange rate makes that labor even cheaper. And the challenge of dealing with America's mirror-image problem of low savings is rendered harder, too. If the United States boosts saving and cuts spending, there'll be a nasty recession unless foreigners buy more U.S. exports. China should let its currency rise so as to assist America's necessary adjustment.

Yet it's one thing to agree that China needs to revalue and quite another to conclude that globalization's rules should punish currency "manipulators." Various forms of currency management are common and sometimes even good -- lots of countries have used currency pegs to conquer inflation, and China's own peg was a bulwark against the turmoil of the East Asian crisis. As to China's savings addiction, American policymakers have to be cautious: China's savings excess is no more egregious than America's savings deficit.

So long as there is globalization, its rules will be debated. It will always feel odd that some aspects of the system are subject to quasi-law while others seem anarchic. But there's a perfectly good reason why trade, unlike labor standards or currency policies, is so intensively rules-based. For nearly all countries at nearly all times, cutting trade barriers make sense. But when it comes to labor standards or currency regimes, such generalization is impossible.

Rights Group Urges China To End Curbs On Lawyers (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 10 — Rules requiring Chinese lawyers to submit to government supervision when representing clients in politically delicate cases have dealt a serious blow to the country's legal system and should be rescinded, Human Rights Watch said in a report to be issued Monday.

The rights group said the rules, known as "guiding opinions," effectively shut down the legal system to people fighting official land confiscations, forced relocation, corruption, pollution and other politically delicate matters in China's one-party system.

"These restrictions effectively deprive people with lawful collective complaints of meaningful legal representations and risk instilling a sense of futility about legal avenues of redress," the report said. "That may exacerbate social unrest in the future."

The Chinese police have reported a surge in "mass incidents," including large demonstrations, in the past several years, with 87,000 such events in 2005.

Statistics for the first nine months of 2006 showed a decline in the number of protests from the year before, but Human Rights Watch said that the numbers were subject to political manipulation and that anecdotal evidence suggested rising discontent.

The "guiding opinions," which were put into effect in the spring, require lawyers who accept cases that involve 10 or more plaintiffs suing organs of the government or the ruling party to submit to "guidance and supervision" by their local judicial bureau and the All-China Lawyers Association, which are under government control.

They also must obtain consent from at least three partners in their law firm before accepting such cases, and they must refrain from "stirring up" news media coverage.

The rules are part of an effort to suppress expression rather than to address the causes of social unrest, lawyers and rights advocates say.

Although rapid economic growth has lifted hundreds of millions of Chinese out of severe poverty, weak property rights and poorly enforced labor and environmental laws have made China's transition to a market economy painful for many millions of people without power to protect their interests.

Lawyers, self-styled legal rights advocates and journalists have been the most conspicuous victims of a campaign by President Hu Jintao to create a more "harmonious society." They have been accused of leading people to take to the streets over lost jobs, unpaid wages, environmental degradation, land seizures and other sources of discontent.

After a rise in protests in 2005, including several well-publicized confrontations in which protesters were killed by riot soldiers or thugs, the authorities moved to prevent social disputes from gaining momentum.

Luo Gan, a member of the Politburo Standing Committee who oversees police and judicial matters for the ruling party, said in an speech published in a state-run magazine that officials should take "forceful measures" against lawyers or rights advocates who use the law as a pretext to "undermine social stability."

State security officers and the police have arrested or intimidated people associated with China's weiquan, or rights protection movement. At least four prominent lawyers and leading rights advocates, Gao Zhisheng, Chen Guangcheng, Guo Feixiong and Zheng Enchong, were charged with crimes after accepting politically delicate cases.

Human Rights Watch said in its 70-page study of the conditions for defense lawyers that many faced less obvious but nonetheless serious threats to their independence. Their licenses are subject to renewal annually. They depend on the good will of the police, prosecutors and court officials if they wish to take even rudimentary steps to defend their clients.

Several prominent defense lawyers, including Zhang Sizhi, who helped mold the profession after China emerged from the Cultural Revolution, have criticized the "guiding opinions." On Internet sites for lawyers, the rules have been called the biggest blow to the legal system since lawyers won some independence in the 1980s.

The government has defended the rules in the state-run media. Officials contend that they are intended mainly to protect lawyers and plaintiffs in delicate cases and to "safeguard legal rights." Many lawyers and plaintiffs hold the opposite view.

Human Rights Watch said China could not have an effective legal system until it respected the independence of lawyers and freed them from enforcing the will of the ruling party.

Taiwan's Leader Gets Surprise Lift In Local Elections (WSJ)

By Jason Dean And Chiu Piling

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

A better-than-expected performance by Taiwan's governing party in weekend mayoral elections could ease political pressure on President Chen Shui-bian and complicate the opposition's efforts to win back control of the government of Asia's fifth-largest economy in 2008 presidential elections.

The elections for mayor in Taiwan's two biggest cities, Taipei and Kaohsiung, were watched closely as indicators of public support for Mr. Chen's Democratic Progressive Party following a spate of corruption scandals affecting people close to the president. In Saturday's polls, the DPP mayoral candidate in Taipei lost to his opponent from the Kuomintang, or Nationalist Party, by a margin that, while large, was narrower than expected. And the DPP candidate narrowly won in Kaohsiung -- a race the party was expected to lose.

The results are far from signaling an end to Mr. Chen's troubles. His wife, indicted last month for alleged misuse of a secret government diplomatic fund, is likely to face trial next year, and the president's approval ratings remain in the low double digits. But analysts said the mixed outcome could at least mean that Mr. Chen avoids pressure from his party to resign before his second and final four-year term ends in 2008. Such pressure could have increased if Mr. Chen's problems had caused a major defeat for the party Saturday.

The outcome means "relief from President Chen from a potential crisis causing him to step down," said Ho De-fen, a political analyst in Taipei who generally backs the DPP but has been critical of Mr. Chen.

At the same time, the Kuomintang's weaker-than-expected showing dealt a blow to its champion, party chairman and outgoing Taipei mayor Ma Ying-jeou. Mr. Ma has been widely seen as a favorite to win the 2008 presidential vote, a contest already being anticipated by investors and other observers who believe it could yield big changes in Taiwan's relationship with rival China. Mr. Chen's administration has constantly squabbled with China, which claims sovereignty over Taiwan despite nearly six decades of separate rule. Mr. Ma takes a less-confrontational stance toward Beijing, and the possibility of him becoming president has fueled hopes of greater economic ties between Taiwan and China.

But Mr. Ma's previously high popularity has suffered amid allegations that his office improperly accounted for its use of city government funds. And analysts said Mr. Ma is being blamed by many in the opposition for its failure to deal a resounding defeat to the DPP.

The disappointment "has triggered loud criticism from party members of Ma Ying-jeou's integrity and leadership ability," said Wang Yeh-li, a political science professor at Tunghai University in central Taiwan who has supported Mr. Ma in the past.

The Kaohsiung race was especially significant. Southern Taiwan, where Kaohsiung is located, has traditionally been the DPP's base of support. This year, the Kuomintang had hoped that a victory there would debilitate the DPP and solidify its own political momentum heading into legislative elections a year from now and the presidential vote in March 2008.

But DPP candidate Chen Chu won the Kaohsiung race, albeit by just 1,114 votes out of 767,868 total valid ballots. Her opponent, Kuomintang candidate Huang Jun-yin, called for a recount.

In Taipei, Kuomintang candidate Hau Lung-bin won 53.81% of the vote, defeating Frank Hsieh, a former premier under Mr. Chen and possible DPP presidential candidate, who won 40.89%. The margin was far narrower than the 28 points by which Mr. Ma won re-election four years ago.

Augusto Pinochet, Dictator Who Ruled By Terror In Chile, Dies At 91 (NYT)

By Jonathan Kandell

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

Gen. Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, the brutal dictator who repressed and reshaped Chile for nearly two decades and became a notorious symbol of human rights abuse and corruption, died yesterday at the Military Hospital of Santiago. He was 91.

Dr. Juan Ignacio Vergara, head of the medical team that had been treating him, said he died at 2:15 p.m., a week after being hospitalized and undergoing angioplasty and another operation after an acute heart attack. Dr. Vergara said his condition degenerated sharply yesterday morning, and he was moved to the intensive care unit, where he died.

General Pinochet seized power on Sept. 11, 1973, in a bloody military coup that toppled the Marxist government of President Salvador Allende. He then led the country into an era of robust economic growth. But during his rule, more than 3,200 people were executed or disappeared, and scores of thousands more were detained and tortured or exiled.

General Pinochet gave up the presidency in 1990 after promulgating a Constitution that empowered a right-wing minority for years. He held on to his post of commander in chief of the army until 1998. With that power base, he exerted considerable influence over the democratically elected governments that replaced his iron-fisted rule.

He set limits, for example, on economic policy debates with frequent warnings that he would not tolerate a return to statist measures, and he blocked virtually all attempts to prosecute members of his security forces for human rights abuses. Through intimidation and legal obstacles, General Pinochet sought to ensure his own immunity from accountability and in fact was never brought to trial. But in an astonishing turn of events nearly a decade after he stepped down, he was detained in Britain and then, on his return to Chile, forced to spend his retirement years fighting a battery of legal charges relating to human rights violations and personal corruption.

During those last years he lived in near seclusion, mostly at his home in Bucalemu, about 80 miles southwest of Santiago, scorned even by many of his former military colleagues and conservative civilian ideologues. Many were disillusioned by revelations that he held, at the least, $28 million in secret bank accounts abroad.

"The humiliation Pinochet has gone through is probably a better outcome than any trial could have achieved," said José Zalaquett, Chile's foremost human rights lawyer.

He won grudging international praise for some of the free-market policies he instituted, transforming a bankrupt economy into the most prosperous in Latin America. They included removing trade barriers, encouraging export growth, privatizing state-owned industries, creating a central bank able to control interest and exchange rates without government interference, cutting wages sharply, and privatizing the social security system. Many elements of the so-called Chilean model were widely emulated in the region.

But by the time of his death, even some of those economic victories had been called into question. The privatizing of Chile's social security system, in particular, has come under attack as unjust and is undergoing revision. And across Latin America, many of the countries that had adopted similar reforms are reversing some of them, responding to a growing wave of popular, leftist anger over untrammeled foreign competition and unequal distribution of wealth.

Little Use for Constitution

General Pinochet initially led a four-man junta in the 1973 military coup that brought him to power, with the support of the United States government. President Allende, a democratically elected Socialist, was found dead after shooting himself during an assault on the presidential palace in Santiago. The coup followed many months of political unrest and economic chaos. Hyperinflation, recession, labor strife and middle-class protests had sapped the Allende government of popular support.

General Pinochet (pronounced pee-noh-CHET) soon made it clear that he had little use for political parties, banning all of them. He also dissolved Congress and scrapped the Constitution. He blamed the democratic political system for having allowed a coalition of Socialists and Communists to take control of the government. In a 1973 news conference, he asserted that Chile would require "an authoritarian government that has the capacity to act decisively" and would not return to the traditional political party system for a generation. It was a vow he kept.

In 1974, General Pinochet elevated himself to president, reducing the rest of the junta to a consultative role. He appointed military officers as mayors of towns and cities throughout Chile. Retired military personnel were named rectors of universities, and they carried out vast purges of faculty members suspected of left-wing or liberal sympathies.

The press was censored, and labor strikes and unions were banned. A fearsome security apparatus known as the National Intelligence Directorate, or DINA, persecuted, tortured and killed Pinochet opponents within Chile and sometimes beyond its borders. A government-commissioned report issued in 2004 concluded that almost 28,000 people had been tortured during the general's rule.

Military governments were the rule rather than the exception in Latin America in the 1970s. Whether right wing, as in Argentina and Brazil, or left wing, as in Peru, military dictators came to power promising to impose economic discipline but departed, after some initial success, with the economy in disarray.

General Pinochet proved to be the exception. Though no economic expert, he had at his service a team of technocrats who, months before the coup, put together a radical plan to overhaul the country's battered economy. Some had studied with the Nobel Prize winner Milton Friedman at the University of Chicago and embraced his notions of free-market forces and monetarism.

But economic transformation was slow and painful. Mistakes by the general's economic team provoked a deep recession in the early 1980s that left more than a third of the work force without jobs. The poor survived with the help of soup lines and temporary employment in public works projects that paid less than the minimum wage.

Attempts at strikes or other forms of protest were ruthlessly put down by General Pinochet's secret police. That repression gave the free-market policies time to take hold. Since the mid-1980s, Chile's gross domestic product has grown an average of more than 6 percent a year, the most impressive performance in Latin America.

A Steady Rise in the Army

There were few hints in General Pinochet's early life that he harbored either political ambitions or ideological convictions. The son of a customs inspector, he was born into lower middle-class circumstances on Nov. 25, 1915, in the Pacific port city of Valparaíso. He graduated from the military academy in Santiago in 1937 and rose steadily in the officer corps. He was already a general, and only 55, when he was given the important post of commander of the Santiago army garrison in 1971.

It was a crucial moment in President Allende's term. Elected the year before with only 36 percent of the vote, Mr. Allende, a physician, had pressed ahead with a Socialist program to nationalize mines, banks and strategic industries, split up large rural estates into communal farms, and impose price controls. The measures soon resulted in steep declines in production, shortages of consumer goods and explosive inflation. A general strike paralyzed Santiago in late 1972, and General Pinochet, as garrison commander, was called on by Mr. Allende to impose a state of emergency in the capital.

This was the first time most Chileans became aware of the tall, broad-shouldered army officer with a brush mustache on his unsmiling face. General Pinochet imposed a curfew, ordered the arrest of several hundred demonstrators on both the left and the right and announced, "I will not tolerate agents of chaos no matter what their political ideology."

His seemingly neutral stance convinced Mr. Allende that he was an officer who could be relied on to observe the Chilean military's century-long tradition of loyalty to civilian government. In August 1973, he appointed General Pinochet commander in chief of the army.

Less than three weeks later, the armed forces overthrew the government. The presidential palace, known as La Moneda, was bombed and strafed by the air force. Mr. Allende shot himself rather than surrender, according to his personal doctor.

Aside from battles at some factories in the Santiago suburbs, there was little resistance to the overwhelming firepower of the military units that fanned out across the country. Tens of thousands of Allende sympathizers were rounded up and brutally interrogated. A majority of the killings took place in the first three months, long after resistance had ended.

In most cases, prisoners from a slum or agrarian community would be executed as a means of terrorizing their neighbors into accepting military rule. The killings were often cynically, and falsely, justified as cases in which prisoners were shot while trying to escape.

The images that most shaped the outside world's low opinion of the military administration were scenes of Santiago's main sports stadium filled with prisoners, and by the public appearances of General Pinochet, eyes hidden behind dark glasses, face set in a scowl, arms folded defiantly across his chest. Although a majority of executions, jailings and cases of torture took place shortly after the 1973 coup, serious human rights abuses waxed and waned over the next 17 years.

By the late 1980s, the economic prosperity General Pinochet created had lulled him into assuming that in free elections he or his chosen candidate would receive the grateful support of a majority of Chileans. But by then most were either too young to remember the Allende years or too confident about the strength of the economy to believe that only an authoritarian government could ensure growth and stability.

Free Elections Ended Rule

In 1980, a new Constitution backed by the Pinochet government made the armed forces "guarantors of institutionality," giving them a nebulous role as political arbiters. It included several other limitations to full-fledged democracy. But in a 1988 plebiscite, an ample majority of Chileans voted against an attempt by General Pinochet to stay on as president for eight more years.

In presidential elections a year later, the former dictator's candidate was handily defeated by Patricio Aylwin, a centrist Christian Democrat supported by parties of the left. In 1993, another Christian Democrat, Eduardo Frei Ruiz-Tagle, was elected president by an even greater margin.

To the delight of the Chilean business community, foreign investment, which had been stunted during the years the government was regarded with international opprobrium, poured back into the country, and Chilean products were welcomed everywhere abroad. Officials of the new Christian Democratic administration were not inclined to tinker with the roaring economic machine they inherited from the Pinochet administration.

"We may not like the government that came before us," Alejandro Foxley, who was finance minister under Mr. Aylwin and is foreign minister today, said in a 1991 interview. "But they did many things right. We have inherited an economy that is an asset."

With the transition to democracy going so well, even General Pinochet's admirers hoped he would settle into a quieter period. Instead, he staged unannounced military maneuvers or placed his troops on sudden alert and gave notice that he would not tolerate attempts to prosecute his era's human rights violators. "The day they touch one of my men, the rule of law ends," he warned in 1991.

In a rare exception, he stood by as two subordinates were convicted of ordering the murder of Orlando Letelier, foreign minister in the Allende government. Mr. Letelier was killed by a car bomb in Washington in September 1976, along with an American colleague, Ronni Moffitt. The incident, considered the worst act of state-sponsored terrorism on American soil, strained relations between Chile and the United States for almost two decades.

The two went to prison in 1995. Gen. Manuel Contreras Sepúlveda, the head of DINA, the notorious secret police, was sentenced to seven years; his second in command, Col. Pedro Espinoza, was sentenced to six years.

Stories of corruption began swirling around members of General Pinochet's family as well as military personnel, and he used his power as army chief to protect them. He quashed judicial and congressional investigations into the financial dealings of his elder son and of army officers who were accused of running an illegal investment banking operation. Until revelations emerged in late 2004 that he had accumulated secret accounts totaling as much as $8 million at Riggs Bank in Washington, the general, who lived spartanly, was rarely accused of corruption himself. Later, Chilean investigators found that he had as much as $28 million in secret bank accounts in a number of countries.

Through his strong-arm tactics against the democratic governments that succeeded him, General Pinochet was making the point to Chileans that if they wanted to enjoy the capitalist virtues of his former dictatorship, they had better overlook his human rights violations.

Those violations were well documented by the National Commission on Truth and Reconciliation, a nonpartisan group appointed by Mr. Aylwin to investigate the killings and disappearances carried out under the general's 17-year dictatorship. The commission's report cited victims by name and described the ghastly circumstances of their deaths by firing squads, beatings, mutilations, drownings and electrocutions. In all, the report attributed at least 3,200 killings and disappearances to the Pinochet security forces.

General Pinochet scoffed at his human rights critics. Asked about the discovery of a mass grave of his government's victims, he was quoted in the Chilean press as joking that it was an "efficient" way of burial.

Legal Battles to the End

Protected by personal security squads, the general also continued an active social life. He was feted by wealthy admirers on his birthday and on the anniversary of his coup. He was often invited to speak at luncheons given by political supporters and leading businessmen. When he finally stepped down as army chief, he joined the Senate as an unelected, permanent member, apparently intending to grant himself further immunity from prosecution.

But the general did not count on the determination of jurists abroad to bring him to justice. In October 1998, while recuperating in a London clinic from a back operation, he was arrested by the British police in response to an application from a Spanish judge seeking the general's extradition to Madrid to stand trial on charges of genocide, torture and kidnapping.

A 16-month legal battle ensued, ending with a decision to send him back to Chile in March 2000 because his physical and mental ailments made him unfit to stand trial. Days after his return, Ricardo Lagos, the first Socialist to be elected president since the 1973 overthrow of Mr. Allende, assumed office.

For the rest of his life, the general had to fight off lawsuits and accept the humiliation of constant news reports about widespread brutality under his rule. President Lagos allowed the hundreds of criminal complaints filed against General Pinochet to run their course in the courts. He was succeeded in March 2006 by another Socialist, Michelle Bachelet, a former political prisoner and exile. Her father, an air force general loyal to Mr. Allende, was jailed by his colleagues, tortured and died in prison.

General Pinochet spent his final years in near seclusion, with his wife, the former María Lucía Hiriart Rodríguez, 84, with whom he had two sons, Augusto and Marco Antonio, and three daughters, Lucía, Verónica and Jacqueline. They all survive him.

In rare public remarks, he continued to insist that he enjoyed the gratitude and wide support of Chileans. But polls indicated that well over half of his compatriots believed that he should have been prosecuted for his human rights crimes.

A Chilean Dictator's Dark Legacy (WP)

By Monte Reel, J.Y. Smith

Gen. Augusto Pinochet, 91, the former Chilean dictator whose government murdered and tortured thousands during his repressive 17-year rule, died yesterday at a Santiago military hospital of complications from a heart attack, leaving incomplete numerous court cases that had sought to bring him to justice.

Pinochet assumed power on Sept. 11, 1973, in a bloody coup supported by the United States that toppled the elected government of Salvador Allende, a Marxist who had pledged to lead his country "down the democratic road to socialism."

First as head of a four-man military junta and then as president, Pinochet served until 1990, leaving a legacy of abuse that took successive governments years to catalogue. According to a government report that included testimony from more than 30,000 people, his government killed at least 3,197 people and tortured about 29,000. Two-thirds of the cases listed in the report happened in 1973.

An austere figure who claimed to be guided by "the spiritual force of God as a believer," Pinochet regarded himself as a soldier rather than a politician. With his stern visage and fondness for military uniforms and dark glasses, he seemed to personify implacable authority. He was both an opponent of communism and a critic of "orthodox democracy," which he said was "too easy to infiltrate and destroy."

"I would like to be remembered as a man who served his country, who served Chile throughout his entire life on this earth," he once told an interviewer. "And what he did was always done thinking about the welfare of Chile and never sacrificing my tradition to hand it to other countries."

Pinochet relinquished the presidency in 1990, but he retained the powerful position of head of the army until 1997, when he became a senator for life. He gave up that position in 2002, claiming mild dementia and physical infirmities -- ailments that helped him avoid trials in hundreds of court cases filed against him in recent years.

But legal actions against Pinochet had gathered momentum in the two years preceding his death, as courts locked several of his key subordinates behind bars and raised hopes among victims' families that Pinochet would meet a similar fate. He had been placed under house arrest in Santiago five times, most recently last month in connection with the murders of two of Allende's bodyguards.

Throughout his later years, Pinochet retained loyal supporters, who credited his government with instituting a fiscal discipline that helped make Chile's economy the region's strongest. But he lost many of those backers after multiple probes in recent years revealed financial corruption, including the discovery of millions of dollars in state funds held in numerous secret overseas accounts, among them several at the former Riggs Bank in Washington. As recently as October, Chilean investigators announced the discovery of 10 tons of gold, worth an estimated $160 million, in Pinochet's name in a Hong Kong bank.

Pinochet remained defiant in the face of the accusations, consistently refusing to apologize for his actions as president. But during his 91st birthday celebration last month, his wife read a statement that indicated the authoritarian took "political responsibility" for his government. The vague nature of the statement did little to appease the families of his victims.

"Today, near the end of my days, I want to say that I harbor no rancor against anybody, that I love my fatherland above all," Pinochet's statement read. "I take political responsibility for everything that was done."

Among the crimes attributed to Pinochet during his reign were several high-profile murders that stretched beyond Chile's borders, many carried out by the Directorate of National Intelligence, or DINA, a fear-inspiring secret police agency that Pinochet organized in 1974.

Prosecutors in Washington in 1999 began investigating Pinochet's possible role in the September 1976 car bombing on Embassy Row that killed Orlando Letelier, a former Chilean foreign minister, and his 25-year-old American assistant, Ronni Karpen Moffitt. Six people were imprisoned for the attack, but the case was reopened after Pinochet was arrested in London in 1998 and held for 17 months on a warrant seeking his extradition to Spain on charges of murdering and torturing Spanish citizens in Chile.

His arrest set off a chain of events that led to his return in 1999 to Chile, where the Supreme Court stripped him of immunity the following year. However, a court ruling in 2002 acknowledged that he had vascular dementia and prevented the cases from going to trial. Chile's courts reversed the ruling of dementia in 2004, deeming him fit to stand trial.

Court filings against Pinochet followed at a rapid pace, and various court rulings toggled back and forth on his legal status. He was stripped of immunity in the case of Gen. Carlos Prats, his predecessor as head of the army, who was assassinated along with his wife in a 1974 car bombing in Argentina.

Last year, another court ruling affirmed his immunity. However, several other cases of human rights abuses were progressing through the court system at the time of his death, including one that charged him with the mass kidnappings and tortures at the infamous Villa Grimaldi prison on the outskirts of Santiago.

To his supporters, Pinochet was a patriot who saved his country from political and economic chaos under the threat of communism, restored order and led it into a period of unprecedented prosperity. In their view, the harsh measures taken under his leadership were justified by the violence of the opposition and the threat of civil war. Finally, they credited Pinochet with restoring the country to civilian leadership under democratic and constitutional principles.

Christian LabbÃ©, a former army colonel and one of Pinochet's closest advisers, told The Washington Post last year that Pinochet had accepted the likelihood that he would die an outcast in his own country, with his achievements under attack by his opponents.

"He knows very well that these things happen to great men," LabbÃ© said. "The great men need to wait for history's judgment, not [current] justice."

The first widespread international backlash against Pinochet followed the Letelier car bombing in 1976. The United States suspended all military aid for several years. Chile was condemned in the United Nations and the European Union. Pinochet disbanded DINA but reorganized the secret police under another name. The Chilean government eventually agreed to pay compensation to the United States but never acknowledged official complicity.

In 1978, Michael Townley, a former CIA employee who worked for DINA, was convicted of placing the bomb on Letelier's car. He implicated Gen. Manuel Contreras, the DINA commander, and Col. Pedro Espinosa, the DINA director of operations. In 1987, army Capt. Armando Fernando Larios, a former DINA operative, surrendered to U.S. authorities and quoted Contreras as saying Pinochet personally had ordered the attack, but offered no direct evidence. In 1993, a Chilean court sentenced Contreras and Espinosa to prison.

In 1982, the movie "Missing" dramatized the fate of two Americans, Charles Horman, 31, and Frank Teruggi, 24, who were killed by Chilean officials in 1973. Those cases are still being litigated.

Though the abuses in Chile lessened considerably in the later years of Pinochet's government, periods of violence and repression occasionally flared throughout his rule. In 1986, for example, the Frente Patriotico Manuel RodrÃ-guez, or FPMR, an organization with links to the communists, announced it was abandoning "peaceful protest" in favor of violence and sabotage. Volodia Teitelboim, the Chilean communist leader, announced on Radio Moscow that it would be a year of "titanic battles."

On July 2, during a general strike, an army patrol seized Rodrigo Rojas, an 18-year-old photographer who lived in Washington, and Carmen Gloria Quintana, 19, and set them on fire. Rojas died four days later, but Quintana survived and was blessed by Pope John Paul II, who visited Chile in 1987. The army at first denied responsibility, but a judge in 1989 sentenced an army captain to 300 days in prison for the attack.

On Sept. 7, the FPMR attempted to assassinate Pinochet as he was driven to Santiago from his country retreat. He escaped unharmed when his driver sped from the scene in reverse. Five bodyguards were killed and 12 were wounded. In retaliation, security agents abducted four communists from their homes and killed them. More than 50 leftists were arrested. The government declared a state of siege.

In the 1980s, Pinochet's government promulgated a new constitution that provided for a plebiscite in 1988 on whether he should continue in office. He received 43 percent of the vote. He declined to be a candidate in a presidential election the following year, which was won by Patricio Aylwin, a Christian Democrat, who took office in 1990.

Chile's current president, Michelle Bachelet, was tortured alongside her mother by Pinochet's government in 1975; her father had been arrested and tortured, and he died of a heart attack in prison shortly after the coup. Bachelet's government announced Sunday that Pinochet would not receive a state funeral usually due former presidents. Pinochet's son Marco Antonio Pinochet said his body would be cremated because his father feared a tomb would be desecrated by his enemies.

Augusto Pinochet Ugarte was born into an upper-middle-class family in Valparaiso, Chile, on Nov. 25, 1915. After graduating from the Chilean military academy in 1936 and receiving a commission in the infantry, he studied law and social sciences at the University of Chile in Santiago.

He had several appointments as an instructor in military schools. He was the author of standard texts on Chile's geography and its history. In the 1950s, he was assigned as a military attache in Washington and Quito, Ecuador. He was promoted to brigadier general in 1968.

As Chile's 1970 presidential election approached, U.S. officials became increasingly concerned about the prospects of Allende, a Socialist, winning. President Richard M. Nixon directed the CIA to take steps to ensure that this did not happen. But when the ballots were counted, Allende had eked out a bare plurality of 36.3 percent of the vote against two other candidates.

In Nixon's memoirs, he said he quoted an informant who told him that Latin America could become "a red sandwich" with Cuba on one side and Chile on the other. He directed the CIA to "make the Chilean economy scream."

A key part of Allende's program was the nationalization of industry, including U.S.-owned copper companies, and the redistribution of land. By 1973, inflation was soaring and the economy was further crippled by CIA-supported strikes in the trucking industry. The government also was unable to control unofficial land expropriations by leftist groups operating on their own.

In an effort to shore up his government, Allende sought support from the army, which had a long tradition of standing aside from politics in Latin America's longest continuous democracy. Among other things, he put Pinochet in command of the army.

Nineteen days later the coup began. Allende died in the Moneda Palace, the presidential residence and office. There were conflicting reports about whether he committed suicide or was killed by government troops.

Pinochet reportedly had a minor role in planning the coup, but he was a member of a four-man junta that took control immediately afterward. He became president and sole ruler of the country in 1974.

Pinochet ended the nationalizations and returned many businesses and much land to private ownership. Although not an economist, he embraced the free trade policies of Milton Friedman of the University of Chicago. He gave free rein to a group of young Chilean economists who had been trained by Friedman and who were known as "the Chicago boys."

Pinochet's survivors include his wife, Lucia Hiriart Pinochet, and five children.

Ex-Chilean Strongman Pinochet Dies At 91 (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella, Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

Augusto Pinochet, the embodiment of the brutal and intensely anti-communist South American military dictator, died Sunday, a military doctor said. He was 91 and had suffered a heart attack a week earlier.

Pinochet ruled this Andean nation for 17 years after seizing power in 1973 in a coup that toppled leftist President Salvador Allende. He gave up control in 1990, retiring to a presumed impunity, but he spent the last years of his life fighting charges of human rights abuses and corruption.

Pinochet's coup, which led to the deaths or disappearances of about 3,200 people and the torture of thousands more, is widely regarded as a watershed event in recent Latin American history. The military takeover, experts generally agree, was a dramatic example of how unwilling South American elites were to allow left-wing governments to come to power, even by election.

In an era when Latin America was a raging Cold War battleground and Fidel Castro's Cuba was seen as fomenting revolution, those elites gathered support from allies in Washington.

Thousands of once-classified U.S. documents released in recent years showed that the Nixon administration, through the CIA and other means, worked secretly to undermine Allende's elected government. Pinochet denied any foreign involvement in the coup, declaring: "I never had contact with any American. I swear by the memory of my parents."

But in 2003, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell acknowledged a U.S. role in destabilizing Allende's government. "It is not a part of our country's history that we are proud of," he said.

Other military governments in the region, such as the junta that ruled Argentina, were bloodier than the Chilean dictator's regime. But Pinochet's dominating public persona and his seeming contempt for Chile's venerable democratic traditions marked him as a central figure among Latin America's late-20th century despots.

Pinochet's regime pioneered the use of "disappearance" as a tool of repression, refusing to acknowledge the detention of executed prisoners.

The dictator's much-feared secret police also organized assassinations against dissidents abroad, including a car bombing in Washington on Sept. 21, 1976, that killed Orlando Letelier, Chile's former foreign minister, and an American colleague, Ronni Moffitt.

In recent years, the human rights and corruption charges, as well as his detention for nearly 17 months in Britain, had chipped away at the retired general's aura of steely invincibility.

Although still admired by those who credited him with jump-starting Chile's economic growth, the aging and frail strongman had become somewhat of an embarrassment for a nation that has long taken pride in being more economically advanced and committed to social justice than many of its neighbors.

Reports that Pinochet had stashed away as much as $28 million in secret offshore accounts during his rule alienated even his stalwart supporters. At the time of his final illness, Pinochet was facing fraud and tax evasion charges in connection with the money, which first came to light at U.S. congressional hearings in 2004.

No event marked the exorcising of Chile's authoritarian ghosts more than the election in January of President Michelle Bachelet, a lifelong socialist and former political prisoner exiled during the Pinochet regime.

Among the human rights cases that were pending here against Pinochet was one involving dozens of alleged abuses at Villa Grimaldi, a former torture center outside the capital where the young Bachelet and her mother were held before being allowed to leave Chile.

Bachelet's father, Alberto Bachelet, an air force general deemed a traitor by the military because he aided the Allende government, was arrested and tortured by Pinochet's forces after the coup. He died of a heart attack while in custody, and his daughter blames his death on the abuse he endured.

As president, Bachelet has cultivated warm relations with the military and has been applauded for her attempts at national reconciliation.

On Nov. 25, Pinochet celebrated his 91st birthday with a statement accepting "political responsibility" for acts committed during his rule. But the long-unrepentant general did not explicitly accept legal responsibility, and declared that his aim had been to avert the "disintegration" of Chile, the latest version of an oft-repeated justification for his actions.

"Today, close to the end of my days, I want to make it clear that I hold no rancor toward anybody, that I love my fatherland above all else," Pinochet said in the statement.

Pinochet's death immediately sent thousands of supporters and critics into the streets of Santiago, the capital, some uncorking bottles of champagne in celebration of the general's demise.

But the country remained deeply divided about his legacy. Mourners outside the Santiago Military Hospital, where Pinochet died, shed tears as news of the general's death spread. Authorities planned a funeral Tuesday with full military honors, in accordance with Pinochet's position as a former commander in chief, but without the official protocol accorded a former head of state.

The White House on Sunday issued a statement saying that "Augusto Pinochet's dictatorship in Chile represented one of most difficult periods in that nation's history. Our thoughts today are with the victims of his reign and their families. We commend the people of Chile for building a society based on freedom, the rule of law, and respect for human rights."

Augusto Pinochet Ugarte was born in the port city of Valparaiso on Nov. 25, 1915. His father was a customs agent whose family had come from Brittany, in northwestern France. Augusto was the oldest of six children and the favorite of a strict and demanding mother.

The young Pinochet applied three times to the national military academy before he was accepted. He graduated in 1936 near the bottom of his class. After a year at infantry school, he became a second lieutenant and began an ascent through the ranks. As deputy director of Chile's war academy between 1949 and 1951, he published two books on military and historical topics.

Like most Latin American armies during the 1960s, the Chilean military worried about Marxist subversion as Castro's Cuban revolution electrified the region. For some, those fears intensified after 1970, when Chileans elected Allende, a socialist whose victory was seen by supporters as a regional model of the democratic road to socialism.

By 1973, workers were taking over factories and farms. Pro-government leftists and opposition rightists clashed in the streets. Rampant inflation caused chaos and shortages, with people waiting in long lines to buy sugar and toilet paper.

Despite a number of military conspiracies against the left-wing government, Allende promoted Pinochet to commander in chief in August 1973. Less than three weeks later, on Sept. 11, 1973, the newly minted top general staged his coup.

On the day of the takeover, Pinochet ordered fighter planes to attack La Moneda, the presidential palace where Allende had barricaded himself. Pinochet joked with an admiral about providing Allende safe passage on an aircraft, according to transcripts of taped military radio transmissions that surfaced in a 1998 book.

"The offer to remove him from the country stands, but the plane falls, old man, while it's flying," Pinochet said over the radio, eliciting a chuckle from the admiral, according to the transcript.

To this day, the grainy images of the aerial attack on La Moneda run regularly on Latin American news retrospectives. Allende died in the palace, probably a suicide.

Pinochet's troops declared a state of siege and seized thousands of Allende government officials and members of the socialist, communist and other leftist parties. Some were summarily executed or tortured to death. Others died in shootouts, though there was little resistance to the overwhelming force of the military.

The atrocities of the military regime, including kidnappings, executions, torture and rape in secret concentration camps, were carried out in part at the behest of the Directorate of National Intelligence, or DINA. Gen. Manuel Contreras, the DINA director, was the architect of an alliance among South American intelligence services, the so-called Operation Condor, that waged a "dirty war" on political enemies across the globe.

Contreras and Michael Townley, a U.S. citizen working for the Chilean secret police, were later convicted in Chile and the United States, respectively, for their roles in the car bombing in Washington that killed Letelier and Moffitt, still considered one of the most audacious foreign-organized assassinations on U.S. soil. Townley implicated Pinochet in the killing.

Chile's intelligence agents struck in other nations as well. In 1974, former Gen. Carlos Prats, Pinochet's predecessor as head of the army, was blown up along with his wife in the garage of the couple's Buenos Aires apartment building. Authorities in Argentina unsuccessfully sought Pinochet's extradition in the killings.

Other crimes against Pinochet's political opponents abroad, along with the influence of a diaspora of hundreds of thousands of Chileans, made the dictator something of a pariah.

But former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger remained a staunch supporter of Pinochet, despite public comments that attempted to distance the U.S. government from the dictator. Kissinger met with Pinochet in Santiago on June 8, 1976, and privately reassured the strongman of continued White House support despite increasing hostility in Congress.

"In the United States, as you know, we are sympathetic with what you are trying to do here," Kissinger told Pinochet, according to a declassified State Department memorandum obtained in 1999 by Lucy Komisar, a New York journalist. "I think that the previous government was headed toward communism. We wish your government well."

Kissinger added: "My evaluation is that you are a victim of all left-wing groups around the world, and that your greatest sin was that you overthrew a government which was going Communist."

Pinochet's relations with Washington soured under the Carter administration, with its emphasis on human rights, and the decline continued through the presidencies of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush. The Chilean leader blamed Marxist propaganda and criticized the United States for pressuring him to restore democracy.

A U.S. Senate investigative committee headed by the late Sen. Frank Church (D-Idaho) revealed that the CIA had secretly bankrolled the Chilean opposition for years. Former CIA chief Richard Helms pleaded no contest to lying to Congress about the Chile operation.

An avid reader of books about Roman emperors and Napoleon, the stiff-backed, shrill-voiced Pinochet cultivated an imperial mystique. He promoted himself to the exalted and antiquated rank of captain general.

He sported ornate uniforms — sometimes a white tunic trimmed in red and gold, other times a flowing cape draped over his shoulders as he reviewed goose-stepping troops.

His men revered him as a gruff patriarch who embodied the pride and Prussian-instilled tradition of the Chilean army, one of Latin America's most powerful militaries.

"Not a leaf moves in this country if I am not moving it," Pinochet boasted shortly after the coup.

In the later years of his rule, Pinochet claimed credit for an economy that had begun growing steadily after early struggles and miscues. Pinochet knew little about economics, but he gave carte blanche to technocrats who were known as the "Chicago boys" because they had studied economics at the University of Chicago.

The Chicago boys launched an ambitious and experimental set of free-market reforms. They reduced the size of government, privatized state industries and promoted free enterprise. Exports boomed. Chile became the economic showcase of Latin America.

Nations across the region began adopting similar reforms in the late 1980s, and innovations such as a privatized social security system have been copied elsewhere. Pinochet boasted that low-income home construction had set records and that the infant mortality rate had plummeted.

But debate persists over whether the credit for brisk economic growth and poverty reduction should go to the military regime or to the four civilian governments that followed it. Critics say Pinochet's wrenching policy shifts inflicted lingering damage on public health, education and other social services.

Despite the growing economy, a pro-democracy movement steadily gained strength in Chile during the 1980s. In 1988, Pinochet agreed to hold a referendum on his continued rule. Chileans said no to the dictatorship by a margin of 57% to 43% in a historic vote that helped pave the way for a return to democracy.

An opposition coalition led by Christian Democrats and that included socialists won a subsequent national election.

Pinochet handed the presidency to Patricio Aylwin on March 11, 1990. The center-left coalition agreed to let Pinochet retain command of the army and to respect the pro-military constitution and rules he had imposed, including a broad amnesty for military officers.

"The day they touch one of my men, the rule of law ends," Pinochet warned before ceding power.

Pinochet belittled the findings of an investigative panel known as the Rettig Commission, which in 1991 documented his regime's abuses. He dismissed the estimated 2,000 "disappeared" political prisoners in his characteristically hard-nosed and unpolished style: "They were nothing but bandits."

But his civilian successor said the general exercised a stabilizing influence. "If Pinochet had not been there during the transition," Aylwin said, "we would have had in Chile attempts at insurrection carried out by subordinates."

Pinochet retired as army chief in March 1998. He immediately became senator for life, a post he created for himself that shielded him from prosecution.

He aspired to a moderate image, making overtures to centrist Senate colleagues and hinting that he might not back a rightist presidential candidate.

Then came a fateful trip to Britain, a nation he had visited often and admired. Pinochet and the Chilean government knew about an investigation by Spanish Judge Baltasar Garzon, a magistrate on a quixotic crusade to bring South American oppressors to justice. But the former dictator, who had decided to undergo back surgery in London, apparently thought his diplomatic passport would protect him.

On Oct. 16, 1998, British police officers walked into Pinochet's hospital room as he recovered from the operation and placed him under arrest. At that moment, Pinochet lost his battle to rehabilitate himself in the history books.

Just more than a month later, Britain's highest court ruled that the aging former dictator could be prosecuted on charges of murder, torture and hostage-taking, saying his official immunity offered no protection for crimes against humanity.

Pinochet remained under house arrest for nearly 17 months, fighting efforts to send him to Spain for trial on genocide charges under international law.

In March 2000, British officials ruled that a series of strokes had left Pinochet unable to stand trial. Physically and psychologically debilitated, he returned home, branded as a criminal abroad and rendered increasingly irrelevant in Chile, where even many rightist leaders distanced themselves.

Pinochet spent his final years living discreetly, but opulently, in the several homes owned by his family. He and his wife, Lucia Hiriart, had five children, who remained steadfastly loyal to their father as he fought a series of human rights prosecutions inspired by the detention in Britain. Even as his reputation plummeted, his children denounced the mounting charges as politically motivated persecution.

But the financial scandals that dogged Pinochet in his final years also swept up members of his family, who were accused of at least implicit knowledge of the long-secret overseas accounts. His wife and five children have faced charges of tax evasion or using false passports in connection with the offshore money. A daughter-in-law and the general's former secretary also have been charged. All denied wrongdoing and were freed after posting bonds as the cases worked their way through Chile's courts.

Pinochet's eldest daughter, Lucia Pinochet Hiriart, fled to the United States in January 2006 and sought political asylum after being charged in the tax evasion case. After U.S. officials looked askance at her application, she quickly withdrew it and returned to Chile.

Pinochet lived to see the public rehabilitation of Allende, a martyr of the Latin American left whose bronze likeness stands outside the presidential palace, emblazoned with some of his last words: "I have faith in Chile and its destiny."

Pinochet was deeply superstitious, former aides said. At times, he also seemed prophetic, all but predicting his misfortune in an interview with the New Yorker magazine shortly before his 1998 arrest.

"I've always been a very studious man, not an outstanding student, but I read a lot, especially history," Pinochet said. "And history teaches you that dictators never end up well."

Former Chilean Dictator Augusto Pinochet Dies (CHIT)

By Colin McMahon

Chicago Tribune, December 11, 2006

Former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, whose military regime killed thousands of political opponents in one of Latin America's bloodiest "dirty wars," died Sunday, weakened by ill health, pursued by government prosecutors and abandoned by all but his most loyal defenders. He was 91.

Shorn of his swagger and absent the menacing look he would flash from behind dark glasses, Pinochet at his death was a mere ghost of the emblematic military strongman who played a critical role in the Americas of the 1970s and 1980s.

Instead, Pinochet had adopted the grandfatherly image of a retired statesman. He had lobbied for a place in history that would reward him for opening Chile's economy. And he had defended his regime as just having done what was necessary to impose stability by seizing power in 1973.

Pinochet had saved Chile from communism, his supporters insisted: His only crime was being a patriot.

But the blood of the Pinochet era, most it shed by the regime itself, followed Pinochet around well after he left power in 1990.

It followed him to Europe, where human-rights lawyers lobbied for Pinochet's arrest on charges that he had ordered the torture, disappearance and death of political dissidents.

Then the blood followed Pinochet home. And by the time he suffered a serious heart attack that sent him to a Santiago hospital a week ago, Pinochet was under house arrest awaiting trial on charges ranging from abuse of power to stealing from the Chilean state.

"Pinochet was a very polarizing figure, and for some time after the end of the regime Chileans were still split about him," said Rebecca Evans, an associate professor of politics and international relations at Ursinus College in Pennsylvania. "But in the last several years, his image has steadily deteriorated."

Pinochet lost most of his remaining international support in the late 1990s, when evidence produced in European courts linked him to the deaths or disappearances of political opponents during the 1970s and 1980s.

A government commission estimated that more than 3,000 people died or disappeared at the hands of the Pinochet regime. Thousands more were politically persecuted, some detained and tortured, others exiled, and still more harassed by secret police.

Yet a sizable minority of Chileans would not condemn Pinochet. Sometimes his supporters denied crimes had occurred. Sometimes they said the oppression was needed to protect Chile from a leftist takeover funded and engineered by Cuba's Fidel Castro and the Soviet Union.

And sometimes, preposterously to Chileans who remembered Pinochet's remark that "not a leaf moves in this country unless I move it," his supporters argued that the supreme commander himself did not know about the abuses.

"The younger generation does not understand the full picture. We were on the verge of collapse," said Guillermo Garin, a retired general who remained loyal to Pinochet. "If human rights were violated, they were violated as part of the struggle to protect the human rights of the majority of the Chilean public."

To Garin and other Pinochet allies, the coup that brought down the democratically elected presidency of Salvador Allende was Chile's salvation. Pinochet not only kept civil war from breaking out, but he also helped stop communism from taking root in South America.

Later, Garin said, the economic policies that Pinochet imposed, the privatizing of state businesses and the opening of domestic and international markets, set the stage for Chile's long stretch of solid economic growth.

History, Garin said in a recent interview, would judge Pinochet kindly.

But the shadow of the rights abuses grew darker and longer over Pinochet as he approached death.

Secret accounts in foreign banks, some holding millions of dollars, turned up tied to Pinochet. Pinochet family members were accused of enriching themselves at public expense.

Supporters who had absolved Pinochet's "excesses" in fighting communism could not brook theft. His reputation as a hard case politically but a man of personal integrity crumbled. Even support within the army faded away.

"Some crazies still love him," Santiago political analyst David Altman said recently. "But more people are seeing the dictatorship for what it was."

The dictatorship was, at first, a four-man affair, with Pinochet representing the army on the military junta.

How involved Pinochet was in planning the coup, just as how involved the United States and the CIA were in supporting the coup, remains unclear. But once the socialist Allende was ousted, Pinochet quickly moved to consolidate control.

Yet Pinochet's rise to the top was 40 years in coming.

Augusto José Ramón Pinochet Ugarte was born on Nov. 25, 1915, in Valparaiso, to a middle-class merchant family. He went to Catholic school as a youngster, entered the military academy in 1933, against his mother's wishes, and then embarked on an army career that would see him rise steadily through the ranks.

Along the way, Pinochet married and had five children--three daughters and two sons.

He became commander in chief of the Chilean army in August 1973. Allende himself appointed Pinochet to the post, believing the fellow Masonic lodge brother to be loyal.

But with strikes paralyzing Santiago and Congress accusing Allende of violating the constitution, Pinochet and his fellow chiefs of staff moved against the president.

Allende was found dead before troops could seize him. Most experts believe he committed suicide.

Though many Chileans reacted with joy to the coup, the political violence that followed tore families apart.

Among the victims was the family of the current Chilean president, Michelle Bachelet. Her father was an Air Force officer who was arrested, tortured and killed shortly after the coup.

Bachelet herself, who was 22 at the time, and her mother were detained. They were held for a short time in a notorious detention center where women and girls were beaten, abused and raped. They then fled into exile.

Late last month, during his 91st birthday celebration, Pinochet issued a statement that for the first time indicated any acceptance of responsibility for the crimes committed under his regime.

"Today, near the end of my days, I want to say that I harbor no rancor against anybody, that I love my fatherland above all and that I take political responsibility for everything that was done which had no other goal than making Chile greater and avoiding its disintegration," Pinochet said in a statement read by his wife.

Meanwhile, a member of Allende's own re-constituted Socialist Party is president of Chile. Pinochet's ideological enemy, Castro, is passing authority over Cuba to his brother, Raul Castro. The socialist Hugo Chavez has been re-elected president of Venezuela. And left-leaning presidents run more than a half-dozen other nations in Latin America.

As for the Pinochet name, it is shorthand across the region for right-wing, military repression.

Former Chilean Dictator Pinochet Dies At 91 (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall, Jack Chang, Helen Hughes

McClatchy, December 11, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile - Hounded by human rights groups until the end and defended with equal zeal by the armed forces, Chile's controversial former dictator Augusto Pinochet Ugarte died Sunday from complications after suffering a heart attack last week. He was 91.

History likely will remember Pinochet as a figure with twin legacies: His bloody right-wing rule and defense against Soviet and Cuban communism changed the fate of not only Chile but also its neighbors in the southern cone of South America.

Decades later, attempts to prosecute Pinochet at home and abroad in the final years of his life set a precedent likely to be felt across the globe: that there is no statute of limitations on human rights abuses.

Thousands filled the streets of Santiago on Sunday after the announcement of his death, both weeping supporters and some critics, most peacefully marking his passing, though a few scuffles were reported.

Pinochet seized power on Sept. 11, 1973, in a bloody U.S.-backed coup that was aided in the planning stages by the CIA, according to U.S. documents released in 2000. Amid intense social strife, the military coup toppled elected socialist President Salvador Allende, and Pinochet emerged as the leader of the junta, recognized almost immediately by the Nixon administration. He ruled until 1990.

The Cold War is the context in which Pinochet will be remembered: He wore a scowl, dark sunglasses and in his ruthless fight against communism in South America once boasted, "Not a leaf moves in Chile without my knowing about it."

He executed socialist and communist leaders and interrogated and often tortured tens of thousands of Chileans and foreign nationals suspected of subversion. He also forged close ties with dictatorships in neighboring Paraguay, Uruguay, Brazil and Argentina to create Operation Condor, in which the countries' intelligence agencies traded information on leftists and detained each other's nationals for return, torture and often death.

Pinochet set the model for a take-no-prisoners approach to communism with widespread human rights abuses, but in his final days he suffered the consequences of his excesses, hit with prosecution attempts that brought relief to victims' families and angered supporters - who lovingly called him "my general."

"He did a great evil in this country," said attorney Hugo Gutierrez, who represented the relatives of dictatorship-era victims in cases against Pinochet. "The only legacy he will leave is that social conflicts must be solved in peaceful ways and not with the insanity that Pinochet brought to Chile."

Yet dozens of Pinochet's supporters appeared outside the Hospital Militar in the capital of Santiago after his heart attack last week to bid him an emotional farewell.

"He had the strength and courage to save us from a civil war and from becoming a second Cuba," said Santiago resident Silvia Perez De Arce outside the hospital. "What Chile is today is due to Pinochet."

One Pinochet legacy has a brighter side - he brought economic prosperity to Chile. Under him, Chile did away with most labor unions and revamped its economy with market-friendly advice from University of Chicago economists dubbed "The Chicago Boys."

He launched ambitious economic incentives that transformed the country into the region's most stable economy and brought him support from a large segment of Chilean society. Chile became an exporter of grapes, wine, salmon - three Chilean products always in U.S. supermarkets. Chile has in recent years signed free trade agreements with the United States, China and other countries.

"In a way he epitomizes Latin American dictators, except he was a very successful dictator, and I think that's what stands out," said Chilean historian Alfredo Jocelyn-Holt. "People who think highly of Pinochet insist he brought about (economic) revolution before Thatcher and Reagan. For the right wing, Pinochet is thought of as very significant."

But like much in Pinochet's 17-year rule, the transformation came with an asterisk attached. Many of Chile's gains came through undemocratic means. For example, Chile's maturation into an important timber and forestry exporter came at the expense of indigenous Mapuches, who under Pinochet saw land restoration programs reversed and who lost collective lands that were their ancestral tradition.

Pinochet died at the hospital, his family at his side.

He was at the time of his death the subject of six prosecutions, four for human rights violations and two for financial corruption.

Two weeks ago, at his 91st birthday party on Nov. 25, 2006, Pinochet's wife read a statement from the general in which he for the first time took "full political responsibility for what happened" during his government. The statement said he had acted with "no other goal than making Chile greater and avoiding its disintegration."

Official estimates show Pinochet's government executed 3,197 people for political reasons, more than 1,000 of them people who disappeared.

Ironically, Pinochet died on Human Rights Day, the annual anniversary of the United Nations General Assembly's 1948 adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The former ruler was under house arrest at the time of his death after being indicted for the kidnappings and executions of two Allende security guards shortly after the 1973 coup.

In October, he was indicted for abuses at the Villa Grimaldi detention center in Santiago, where hundreds were held and tortured. The country's current socialist President Michelle Bachelet and her mother were among those sent to Villa Grimaldi.

Many of Pinochet's supporters, who remained loyal for years, abandoned the ex-dictator in 2004 after news broke that he had amassed some $28 million in foreign bank accounts. Pinochet's former spy chief Gen. Manuel Contreras said the money came from arms and drug trafficking, which Pinochet's family denied.

Pinochet managed to escape numerous prosecutions for health reasons, although human rights groups accused him of faking his illnesses. He suffered several strokes and was diagnosed with diabetes and, according to his doctors, mild dementia.

The Bachelet government decided to give him a funeral as a former head of the military and not as former head of state. According to the Chilean military, he will receive a funeral Mass 11 a.m. Tuesday at the country's military academy in Santiago, and his body will be cremated. There will also be memorial services Monday.

Born on Nov. 25, 1915, in Valparaiso, Pinochet seem destined for anything but fame when it took him three tries to win acceptance at Chile's prestigious national military academy Escuela Militar. He graduated four years later as a second lieutenant in the infantry, rising through the ranks to become a professor at his alma matter in 1951, teaching geopolitics. Pinochet's interest in geopolitical strategy would be shown later as he and archrival Cuban dictator Fidel Castro jockeyed for influence in the Americas.

Pinochet served in important posts throughout Chile and abroad in Ecuador, and was tapped by Allende as armed forces commander on Aug. 23, 1973, after months of coup rumors. He replaced Gen. Carlos Prats, who had resigned. Officials in neighboring Argentina have accused Pinochet of plotting the September 1974 car bombing in Buenos Aires that killed Prats and his wife Sofia Cuthbert.

Pinochet burst onto the international stage with the dramatic 1973 coup, which included the haunting Air Force bombing of the La Moneda presidential palace and the apparent suicide of Allende with an AK-47 assault rifle that was reportedly a present from Castro.

Pinochet's government was also believed responsible for the 1976 assassination of former Chilean Foreign Minister Orlando Letelier in Washington, D.C.

Pinochet's 1980 constitution formally installed him as president of the country. He survived a September 1986 assassination attempt by Marxists before losing a national referendum on his rule in October 1988. He agreed to return Chile to civilian rule with elections in 1989 and finally transferred power to Patricio Aylwin Azocar in March 1990.

However, the strongman continued to cast a long shadow over Chilean politics as commander of the armed forces, a post he held until 1998 when he stepped down and became a senator-for-life. He menaced elected leaders from the sidelines until his Oct. 16, 1998, arrest in London in response to a Spanish extradition request.

British Home Secretary Jack Straw set Pinochet free on March 2, 2000, and he returned to Chile to face criminal complaints that numbered more than 300 at the time of his death. After losing his immunity from prosecution as a senator-for-life on July 25, 2000, Pinochet faced prosecution efforts for the Caravan of Death - the name given to death squads that roamed Chile carrying out summary trials and executions in the first weeks of his rule.

In 2002, the country's Supreme Court declared Pinochet too infirm to face Caravan of Death prosecutions but reversed itself this July, clearing the way for Pinochet's indictment for the killings of Allende's security guards.

At the end of his life, the ex-dictator saw his sway over Chile diminish as the country entered its 17th year under the center-left Concertacion coalition. Yet Sunday's outpouring of support for him on the streets of Santiago and the worldwide impact of his death showed that his legacy remained enduring and complicated.

"He is a mythical figure and as such he will never die," Jocelyn-Holt said. "Neither demons nor gods die, they simply pass away until someone erects them."

Controversial Legacy Of Former Chilean Dictator Augusto Pinochet (CSM)

By Jen Ross

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

Gen. Augusto Pinochet, who overthrew Chile's democratically elected Communist government in a 1973 coup and ruled for 17 years, died Sunday without ever having been condemned for the human rights abuses committed during his rule.

The date - December 10, the UN's International Human Rights Day - could not have been more symbolic for the passing of a man who best symbolized the international struggle to end impunity for human rights abusers in Latin America.

"It's no consolation to anyone that Pinochet has been subjected to a long legal battle, given that it has never resulted in a condemnation. That's what his victims will lament most about his death," says Sergio Laurenti, executive director of the Chilean wing of Amnesty International.

In 1970, Chile became the first country in Latin America to elect a socialist leader. President Salvador Allende quickly moved to nationalize foreign-owned industries and rectify Chile's gross economic disparities. But by 1972, internal dissent, failing production, and covert international attempts to undermine Mr. Allende's government combined to create an atmosphere of high political tension that many Chileans feared would crescendo into class warfare or civil war.

On Sept. 11th, 1973, two weeks after being appointed commander-in-chief of Chile's Army, Pinochet led a military junta of four officers who sent war planes to bomb the presidential palace, La Moneda. Once Pinochet's treason and the forces against him became clear, Allende committed suicide.

Pinochet imposed a curfew and ordered mass arrests in an effort to root out opposition. Declaring himself president in 1974, he eliminated Congress, political parties, freedom of speech, habeas corpus, and trade unions. At least 27,000 people were tortured while in detention, and an estimated 3,200 Chileans were killed or disappeared during his 17-year-rule.

Political scientists say that, although many dictators elsewhere in Latin America were responsible for more deaths, Pinochet is the most notorious because of what he embodies.

"He overthrew Latin America's first democratically elected Marxist leader, who himself was a symbol," says Robert Funk, a political science professor at Santiago's Diego Portales University.

In 1998, Pinochet narrowly lost a referendum on his rule, giving way to a democratic government in 1990, led by center-left president Patricio Aylwin. Passions he stirs

Although it has been 33 years since the military coup staged by Augusto Pinochet, and more than 16 years since the end of his rule, he still stirs passions on both sides.

Car horns honked here in celebration on Sunday, while tens of thousands of his opponents gathered in plazas across the country to cheer and celebrate his passing.

Meanwhile, more than 1,000 supporters gathered to mourn the man and express their outrage at the international media. With photos of Pinochet taped to their bodies, and waving flags or hand-painted signs, they came to Chile's Military Hospital to express their gratitude for the deceased strongman.

Pinochet still boasts a decidedly committed following who remember him as a savior.

According to opinion polls, somewhere between 20 and 30 percent of the population was still professing their support for Pinochet and his military regime as recently as one year ago, says Claudio Fuentes, director of the Latin American Faculty of Social Sciences, an independent think tank based in Santiago.

Others say there's an element of nostalgia involved. "But more important, what there is in Chile, as there is in the rest of Latin America, is a fetish for authority," says Mr. Funk. "That respect that we see for Pinochet now is in many ways the support for someone who had a strong hand and made things run in a more orderly fashion." Credited with stimulating economic growth

Though condemned for its brutality, his regime is credited with stimulating economic growth.

"Pinochet, of course, became known for the economic reforms that he championed, which became perhaps the first case of neoliberal reform, not only in Latin America but in the world, and which were then copied by governments such as [US President Ronald Reagan and [British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher]," says Funk.

During his 17 years in power, Pinochet controlled inflation, united the country with highways, and helped Chile's economy grow steadily. He is credited for heralding an economic miracle for this developing nation, whose economy is now considered the most stable in the region.

"He led a series of social, economic, and political reforms that changed the face of our country," says supporter and history teacher Mauricio Schiapacasse. "When he took power, 40 percent of the population had sewers; when he left, 90 percent did. He created a private health-care system that focused on the poorest sectors. He took 150,000 families out of shantytowns and gave them property. And he achieved an economic growth rate of 10 percent. So many people are thankful for that and will never forget him."

Mr. Schiapacasse says Pinochet's legacy has been distorted outside of Chile by a deliberate campaign of disinformation financed by international leftists, including the more than 500,000 Chileans exiled during the dictatorship.

"We have to recognize that these human rights problems existed, but at some point they've come to eclipse the image of what he did for our country," says retired Gen. Luis Cortes Villa, Director of the nonprofit Pinochet Foundation, which is dedicated to giving out scholarships and preserving the positive side of his legacy. Symbol for human rights violations

But for most of the world, Pinochet's legacy is synonymous with human rights abuses. Pinochet had long been seen as an untouchable in Chile, but in 1998, Spanish judge Baltasar Garzón mounted an offensive, using international instruments barring crimes against humanity to argue for Pinochet's extradition from London.

The former dictator spent more than a year under house arrest until he was deemed too ill and returned to Chile for judgment. But as the world looked on, in 2002, Chilean courts finally declared Pinochet mentally unfit to stand trial.

Since then, Pinochet has been formally charged six times for various crimes, but was twice exonerated for dementia.

In late November, Pinochet was placed under house arrest on kidnapping charges stemming from the Caravan of Death case, in which Pinochet is accused of having sent soldiers to round up and kill opponents shortly after his military coup in 1973. The families of his victims had also filed more than three hundred civil suits against him.

While he has never been found guilty by the courts, some of his detractors have taken comfort in the fact that his popularity has suffered enormously in recent years as a result of these trials.

And Pinochet himself recently issued a sort of mea culpa. To mark his 91st birthday on Nov. 25, Pinochet issued a statement in which he took "political responsibility" for everything that took place under his rule, although he said he had believed it was in Chile's best interests. He also alluded to his failing health, saying: "Today, close to the end of my days, I want to make clear that I hold no rancor toward anyone."

The government has not yet said how it will remember Pinochet, and whether it will hold a funeral with full honors, as is the custom for former heads of state and military commanders.

For many Chileans, his death marks the end of an era and what they believe will herald a period of reconciliation for Chile's polarized political classes.

Chilean Dictator Pinochet Has Died (AP)

SANTIAGO, Chile -- Gen. Augusto Pinochet, who overthrew Chile's democratically elected Marxist president in a bloody coup and ruled this Andean nation for 17 years, died Sunday of complications following a heart attack. He was 91.

The brief announcement by the Santiago Military hospital said Gen. Pinochet's condition had worsened suddenly and doctors had rushed him back to the intensive care unit, from which he had been removed on Thursday while recovering from an acute heart attack he suffered one week ago. Dr. Juan Ignacio Vergara, spokesman for the medical team that had been treating Gen. Pinochet, said his family was with him when he died.

Gen. Pinochet's health had been deteriorating for years. Doctors implanted a heart pacemaker in 1993 and he suffered from diabetes and arthritis. He also was diagnosed with mild dementia caused by several strokes.

Hundreds of supporters of the former dictator, some weeping, gathered in front of the hospital chanting "Pinochet! Pinochet! Long Live Pinochet!" Anti-Pinochet motorists shouted insults at them and celebrations broke out in several parts of the Chilean capital.

Hugo Gutierrez, a human rights lawyer involved in several lawsuits against Mr. Pinochet, lamented that "this criminal has departed without ever being sentenced for all the acts he was responsible for during his dictatorship." Lorena Pizarro, president of an association of relatives of the dictatorship's victims, noted ironically that Mr. Pinochet had died "on Dec. 10, the international day of human rights."

But the office of former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who had been a close ally of Gen. Pinochet, said she was "greatly saddened" by his death.

President Michelle Bachelet, who was imprisoned and mistreated during the dictatorship, recently said it would be "a violation of my conscience" to attend a state funeral for him.

One of Gen. Pinochet's sons, Marco Antonio, has said that his father asked to be cremated to avoid desecration of his tomb by "people who always hated him." A military funeral was likely.

Gen. Pinochet took power on Sept. 11, 1973, demanding an unconditional surrender from President Salvador Allende the country's freely elected Marxist president, as warplanes bombed the presidential palace in downtown Santiago. Instead, Mr. Allende committed suicide with a submachine gun he had received as a gift from Fidel Castro.

Chile's government says at least 3,197 people were killed for political reasons during his rule, but after leaving the presidency in 1990 Gen. Pinochet escaped hundreds of criminal complaints because of his declining physical and mental health, with courts ruling out proceedings at least twice in recent years as victims of his rule pressed efforts to bring him to justice.

MORE ON PINOCHET

Key dates in Pinochet's career1, from chief of the army to dictator.

As the mustachioed Gen. Pinochet crushed dissent during his 1973-90 rule, he left little doubt about who was in charge. "Not a leaf moves in this country if I'm not moving it," he once said.

But when it came to his regime's abuses, Gen. Pinochet refused for years to take responsibility, saying any murders of political prisoners were the work of subordinates. Then on his 91st birthday -- just last month -- he took "full political responsibility for everything that happened" during his long rule. The statement read by his wife, however, made no reference to the rights abuses.

Born Nov. 25, 1915, as the son of a customs official in the port of Valparaiso, Gen. Pinochet was commander of the army at the time of the 1973 coup, appointed 19 days earlier by the president he toppled.

The CIA tried for months to destabilize Mr. Allende's government, including financing a truckers strike that paralyzed the delivery of goods across Chile, but Washington denied having anything to do with the coup. In the days after Gen. Pinochet's seizure of power, soldiers carried out mass arrests of leftists. Tanks rumbled through the streets of the capital.

Many detainees, including Americans Charles Horman and Frank Teruggi, were herded into the National Stadium, which became a torture and detention center. The Americans were among those executed by the Chilean military, their deaths chronicled in the 1982 film "Missing." Other leftists were rounded up by a death squad known as the "Caravan of Death." Victims were buried in unmarked mass graves in the northern Atacama desert, in the coastal city of La Serena and in the southern city of Cauquenes.

Gen. Pinochet pledged to stay in power "only as long as circumstances demand it," but soon after seizing the presidency, he said he had "goals, not deadlines." He disbanded Congress, banned political activity and started a harsh anti-leftist repression. Within years, Chile and other South American countries with right-wing governments launched Operation Condor to eliminate leftist dissidents abroad.

In May 2005, some of the strongest evidence against Gen. Pinochet emerged, when Gen. Manuel Contreras, the imprisoned head of the former dictatorship's secret police, gave Chile's Supreme Court a list describing the fate of more than 500 dissidents who disappeared after being arrested by the secret police. Most were killed, their bodies flung into the sea.

Gen. Contreras, who is serving a 12-year sentence for the disappearance of a young dissident in 1975, said Gen. Pinochet was responsible. Gen. Pinochet blamed all the abuses on subordinates.

"Justice has been too generous with Pinochet," said Viviana Diaz, whose father was among the disappeared. She said the fact that the dictator was never punished "is the impotence that we have, and the reason for the fight we have waged all these years to eliminate impunity in our country."

Gen. Pinochet defended his authoritarian rule as a bulwark against communism -- and even claimed part of the credit for the collapse of communism. He repeatedly said he had nothing to ask forgiveness for. "I see myself as a good angel," he told a Miami Spanish-language television station in 2004.

With his raspy voice, he often spoke in a lower-class vernacular that comedians delighted in mimicking. But his off-the-cuff comments sometimes got him into trouble. Once, he embarrassed the government by saying that the German army was made up of "marijuana smokers, homosexuals, long-haired unionists." On another occasion, he drew criticism by saying the discovery of coffins that each contained the bodies of two victims of his regime's repression was a show of "a good cemetery space-saving measure."

Shrewd and firmly in command of his army, Gen. Pinochet saw himself as the leader of a crusade to build a society free of communism. Amid the upheaval in 1973, the economy was in near ruins, partly due to the CIA's covert destabilization efforts.

Gen. Pinochet launched a radical free-market economic program that, coupled with heavy foreign borrowing and an overvalued peso, triggered a financial collapse and unprecedented joblessness in the early 1980s. Eventually, the economy recovered, and since 1984 Chile has posted growth averaging 5% to 7% a year.

The dictator tried to remain in control of the nation of 15 million people, but Latin America was gravitating toward civilian rule. On Oct. 5, 1988, he lost a national referendum on a proposal to extend his rule until 1997. He was forced to call a presidential election, which was won by center-left coalition candidate Patricio Aylwin. Gen. Pinochet handed over power to Mr. Aylwin in March 1990 but remained army commander for eight more years and then was a senator-for-life, a position guaranteed under the constitution written by his regime.

In 1998, the former dictator traveled to London to undergo back surgery, but was placed under house arrest after a Spanish judge issued a warrant seeking to try him for human rights violations. British authorities decided he was too ill to stand trial and sent him home in March 2000.

Back in Chile, ghosts of the past dogged the retired general. More than 200 criminal complaints were filed against him, one involving the Caravan of Death. But on July 9, 2001, a court ruled that he could not face trial because of his poor physical and mental health after court-appointed doctors diagnosed him with a mild case of dementia. A 2004 case against him was also stopped because he was found unfit to stand trial.

Still, his foes and relatives of his regime's victims kept trying to bring him to trial, successfully having him indicted and held under house arrest several times. But chances of any case reaching trial always appeared dim.

In 2004, a U.S. Senate investigative committee found Gen. Pinochet kept multimillion-dollar secret accounts at the Riggs Bank in Washington. In all, investigators said he had up to $17 million in foreign accounts, and Chilean courts charged him with owing $9.8 million in back taxes. He was also indicted on tax evasion charges, along with his wife and three children.

While many of his military and civilian followers staunchly supported him throughout his legal battle against human rights accusations, he was isolated and almost abandoned as the money dealings became public. Many expressed frustration and disappointment. "We deserve an explanation for this," said retired Gen. Rafael Villarroel, once one of Gen. Pinochet's closest aides.

Since the mid-1990s, Gen. Pinochet led a mostly secluded life between his heavily guarded Santiago mansion and his countryside residence. He rarely appeared in public other than for checkups at the Santiago army hospital.

Associates said he lost interest in politics and rarely paid attention to news. During family gatherings he would remain mostly silent, looking frail and tired. His health declined steadily. In 1992 he received a pacemaker. He suffered from diabetes and arthritis and had at least three mild strokes beginning in 1998.

He is survived by his wife, Lucia, who headed a volunteer women's organization dedicated to helping the poor, and two sons and three daughters.

Thousands Celebrate In Streets Of Santiago On Learning Of Death (WP)

By Jonathan Franklin

SANTIAGO, Chile, Dec. 10 -- Thousands of jubilant Chileans streamed into the streets of Santiago after hearing that their former president, Gen. Augusto Pinochet, had died Sunday. Many danced and popped open champagne, while caravans of cars with horns blaring toured the capital for hours.

"These people are not celebrating the death of anyone. It is to celebrate the end of a cycle of so much pain, so much dictatorship, so much torture," said Jorge Salinas, 50, as he threw confetti into traffic. "Pinochet signified many deaths, so much suffering for us. That's why you see such happiness in most of the people. That's why they are celebrating."

While Chileans celebrated downtown, a rowdy and bitter crowd of about 700 Pinochet supporters gathered outside the military hospital where he died Sunday afternoon.

"He leaves us today, but I remain proud to support him," said Ivan Moreira, a member of the lower house of Chile's Congress who was with the Pinochet family during a private Mass at the hospital Sunday. Moreira, of the Independent Democratic Union party, said, "I express what so many silent Chileans want to express: loyalty to his government."

Emotions at the hospital turned violent as the pro-Pinochet crowd brawled with police and attacked reporters with a hail of bottles and rocks.

In upper-middle-class neighborhoods where Pinochet was once revered, many residents left their homes to celebrate the former dictator's death. Pinochet's reputation had disintegrated in the past several years with ongoing investigations into financial crimes.

In poorer neighborhoods, barricades were set up and tires burned as crowds gathered to sing and celebrate. Police patrolled the streets of Santiago in an effort to control clashes between Pinochet supporters and foes.

In the city center, police shut down the main avenues to accommodate a crowd that had swelled to 7,000 people by late afternoon.

"Today is an anniversary for human rights," said Hugo Guttierrez, a leading Chilean human rights lawyer who noted that Pinochet's death came on International Human Rights Day. "And without a doubt, this is a very sweet treat."

Victims of human rights abuses also gathered downtown at a statue of Salvador Allende, the Chilean president who died in the 1973 coup led by Pinochet. Human rights activists called on the government to avoid giving any special honors to Pinochet at his funeral.

Chilean President Michelle Bachelet, who was detained and tortured in 1975 by Pinochet's security forces, has not said whether she would attend his funeral Mass.

Joy, And Violence, At Death Of Pinochet (NYT)

By Pascale Bonnefoy

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile, Dec. 10 — Thousands of demonstrators took to the streets in celebration here on Sunday almost immediately after news circulated of the death of the former dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet. But within hours the revelry was marred by violence, with confrontations breaking out and the police using tear gas and water cannons against a large group marching toward the presidential palace.

Gen. Jorge Acuna, of the capital police force, said that six police officers had been wounded in the scuffles and that seven demonstrators had been arrested in the capital, while dozens of others were detained in police vehicles and more arrests were expected.

The government called for calm on Sunday night. "We call on the detractors and supporters, if they're going to demonstrate to do it peacefully. And for this, we've deployed a major security force," said Felipe Harboe, the under secretary of the interior.

After General Pinochet's death, at 2:15 p.m., President Michelle Bachelet met briefly with cabinet ministers and then released a terse announcement through her spokesman, Ricardo Lagos Weber, covering only funeral and memorial considerations with no other comment. Mr. Lagos said that General Pinochet would not receive a state funeral, but would receive military honors. The president authorized flags to fly at half-mast at military installations, but did not decree a period of national mourning.

A spokesman for the White House, Tony Fratto, said: "Augusto Pinochet's dictatorship in Chile represented one of most difficult periods in that nation's history. Our thoughts today are with the victims of his reign and their families."

On Sunday night, General Pinochet's remains were taken from the Military Hospital of Santiago, where he died, to the Army Academy in Santiago, where religious services were to be held throughout the day Monday. Funeral services will take place at the Army Academy on Tuesday at 11 a.m., and Defense Minister Vivianne Blanlot will attend to represent the government. The general's remains will be cremated and given to his family, Mr. Lagos said.

A few hundred mourners gathered in front of the hospital Sunday afternoon, with some weeping or chanting, "Viva Pinochet!"

"Pinochet rescued and transformed Chile into the country we all feel proud of," Hernán Guillof, president of the Pinochet Foundation, said to a group outside the hospital. "Once passions subdue, he will be given his place in history as architect of our nation."

But many more focused instead on the brutality and terror of General Pinochet's 17-year rule, in which more than 3,200 people disappeared or were killed and tens of thousands were detained, tortured or exiled.

Some rights advocates said they had mixed feelings about General Pinochet's death. Hiram Villagra, the prosecuting attorney in dozens of human rights cases against the general, said he would have preferred that he lived long enough to be sentenced in the trials he was facing.

"The air will feel lighter tomorrow, we will feel a sense of liberation," Mr. Villagra said. "But I lament that Pinochet has died without having been sentenced. However, in all serious charges against him, he has had his immunity lifted and has been indicted. Pinochet does not die an innocent man."

José Miguel Vivanco, Americas director at Human Rights Watch, said, "Pinochet spent his last years fending off an ever-tightening web of prosecutions in Chile and died a profoundly discredited figure in the land he once ruled."

Even his final illness proved to be divisive. He was admitted to the hospital in critical condition on Dec. 3 after he had a heart attack. He underwent angioplasty, and doctors said he was recovering well — so well that human-rights groups here began charging that the health crisis may have been staged, and they requested a judicial investigation.

But his condition took a sharp downturn on Sunday morning, his doctors said, and his family was gathered around him in the intensive care unit at the military hospital when he died.

Demonstrators began pouring onto the main avenue in the center of Santiago immediately after the news of General Pinochet's death, chanting human rights slogans and denunciations of him. The gathering quickly took on the air of a street party, with drinking and dancing, and the crowd began marching toward La Moneda, the presidential palace.

The size of the main demonstration grew quickly and steadily, reaching about 6,000 by 6 p.m. Around then, demonstrators began trying to cross over barriers guarding the presidential palace, and police officers in riot gear broke out tear gas and water cannons to turn them back.

The violence spread, with demonstrators throwing rocks, uprooting stoplights and burning at least four barricades and two cars. One person was reported injured by a thrown bottle. A radio reporter said there was "massive destruction" in a 10-block stretch in downtown Santiago.

The Dextrous Dictator (NYT)

The central puzzle of the dictator Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, who died yesterday at the age of 91, was that until recently he retained admirers in Chile and abroad, especially among people emerging from Communism. He masked his corruption and brutality by tailoring his level of repression to just what he needed to retain power and prestige.

General Pinochet was head of the army in 1973 when he led a coup against the socialist Salvador Allende, whose chaotic presidency had been further destabilized by the Nixon administration. In the first three years, General Pinochet's regime killed almost 3,000 people. Thousands more were tortured. The vast majority of the victims were nonviolent.

At first, Chileans, exhausted by politics, bought the government's stories that the victims were terrorists killed in confrontations with police. Then General Pinochet made the repression more subtle. Killings were selective — but that was enough to take care of the few brave dissidents. He distracted the rest of Chile with an artificially strong peso that made imports cheap and allowed even the middle class to buy color televisions and cars. The protests did not begin until 1983, after the peso crashed.

General Pinochet also exploited Chileans' need for legality. In 1980, he passed a Constitution providing for a plebiscite in 1988 on whether to hold free elections — robbing the coming protests of their power. When the plebiscite arrived, the government tried to rig it. But even members of the junta objected, and General Pinochet was forced to hold elections in 1989. The opposition won.

Out of office, General Pinochet's reputation slowly disintegrated. Although his second wave of economic policy worked, the center-left governments that followed deepened reforms and brought their benefits to average people, refuting the argument that a Pinochet was necessary for economic discipline. Chileans who argued that the human rights abuses were exaggerated were shown irrefutable proof.

Investigators also discovered at least $28 million that General Pinochet held in more than 100 secret bank accounts, most of them in the United States. At the time of his death, he was under indictment for kidnapping, torture and murder, as well as corruption-related charges of tax evasion and possession of false passports. Time has revealed that the once-admired General Pinochet was accomplished only at holding power.

IT'S A COINCIDENCE that Jeane Kirkpatrick, the astringent U.S. envoy to the United Nations in the 1980s, and former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet died only a few days apart. But in death as in life, the two are associated with a political theory that defined the early days of the neoconservative movement in the United States. Unfortunately for Kirkpatrick, its author, the theory proved to be dead wrong.

The idea was that right-wing authoritarian governments were much better bets for conversion to democracy than left-wing totalitarian ones. This is how Kirkpatrick put it in "Dictatorships and Double Standards," the influential 1979 essay in Commentary magazine that brought her to the attention of Ronald Reagan.

"Although there is no instance of a revolutionary socialist or communist society being democratized, right-wing autocracies do sometimes evolve into democracies — given time, propitious economic, social and political circumstances, talented leaders and a strong indigenous demand for representative government." Kirkpatrick's article, which focused on the Carter administration's policy toward Iran under the shah and Nicaragua under Anastasio Somoza, made some valid points about the differences between Marxist and traditional authoritarian societies. But the article — and Kirkpatrick — are remembered most for the suggestion that dictatorships of the right (especially those friendly to the United States) offered more fertile ground for democratization than dictatorships of the left.

Chile, where the murderous Pinochet eventually relinquished much of his power after a 1988 referendum, seemed to vindicate the Kirkpatrick doctrine. But then came the collapse of the Soviet Union and the creation of more democratic governments not only in the formerly captive states of Hungary and Czechoslovakia but also in Russia. And as China has shown, spectacularly, Marxist states can turn capitalist in a hurry, though political freedoms may still lag.

Like other reductionist theories, the Kirkpatrick doctrine ran up against the wisdom of H.L. Mencken's observation that "for every problem, there is a solution that is simple, clean and wrong."

Death Saves A Tyrant (USAT)

Saddam Hussein and Chile's Augusto Pinochet have long been members of the club of tyrants who killed thousands of their citizens. The difference between them emerged Sunday when Pinochet died after suffering a heart attack at age 91. Numerous attempts to bring him to justice failed. Saddam, sitting in a Baghdad jail cell after a court sentenced him to death, must surely be envious.

Thankfully, though, the difference in their fates is not so stark as, say, between Saddam and Uganda's murderous former dictator Idi Amin, who died as brutal tyrants could once reasonably expect to if ousted from power: in gilded exile. International attitudes to mass murder by brutal leaders are changing. The challenge is to continue the trend and make sure Pinochet is one of the last exceptions.

Already, because of the changing international consensus, Pinochet, whose military junta ruled the South American nation from 1973 to 1990, spent his old age fighting numerous attempts to bring him to justice. Several almost succeeded. Most notably, in 1998, he was detained in London for more than a year after an extradition request from Spain, where a judge had ordered his trial. The British decided he was not well enough. But a flood of efforts to get him to stand trial followed. Since 2000, he has frequently been under house arrest, facing charges of human rights and financial abuses, and barely avoiding trial because he was old and sick.

Bringing a dictator to justice is about more than revenge. It is needed for a society to face up to past crimes and to deter brutal dictators elsewhere. Chile is deeply divided over Pinochet's legacy. His many supporters argue that he saved the country from communism when he overthrew left-leaning Salvador Allende.

But that cannot justify what Pinochet is accused of: knowing about the 3,197 Chileans documented as dying and the 28,000 tortured under his rule.

Tyrants who have been brought to justice include Serbia's Slobodan Milosevic (he died during his trial in the Netherlands) and Liberia's Charles Taylor, facing an international court. Those now involved in crimes against humanity — the leaders of Sudan, abetting genocide in the country's western Darfur province spring to mind — must expect to end up like Saddam, not Pinochet.

Sic Semper Tyrannis (LAT)

By Marc Cooper

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

NOT WITH LITTLE irony did the gods choose to reclaim former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Sunday, which was International Human Rights Day.

The heart attack he suffered a week ago had initially seemed quite convenient. By landing him in a military hospital, it short-circuited an imminent court hearing into two killings he was accused of ordering more than 30 years ago. Indeed, his house arrest, decreed just last month, was lifted so he could be hospitalized. Nor was this the first time his failing health had worked to his advantage: Twice before over the last five years, Pinochet was spared trial on charges of murder, kidnapping and torture because he claimed he was too ill to face the courts.

But if human justice failed on previous occasions to fully snare Pinochet, the greater forces of nature and biology this time imposed the maximum sentence — and on the most appropriate day of the calendar.

By the time of his death at age 91, Pinochet's name had come to symbolize all that can go horribly wrong when dictatorship supplants democracy. Once celebrated as a prophet of free-market economic policies, he died disgraced and reviled, saddled with criminal accusations ranging from human rights violations to money-laundering and tax evasion.

Whatever his accomplishments or failures in the economic realm (which are destined to be debated for decades to come) there is no longer any possibility of denying the level of soul-less brutality and inhumanity that Pinochet imposed at bayonet point on Chile. It wasn't just the thousands of dead, tortured and jailed. It was rather the en masse humiliation of an entire population, forced to kowtow to a snarling dictator who had overnight reversed 100 years of civil democratic tradition.

Chileans have a saying: "The color of blood is never forgotten." Pinochet's brutality unleashed the sort of ghosts that never rest. Numerous commissions have published reports detailing the mind-numbing practices of electric-shock torture, "water-boarding," disembowelment and outright disappearance employed by Pinochet's military and police.

Pinochet's swagger, his unbridled arrogance, his flaunted impunity won him no respite. In spite of the national trauma generated by his dictatorship (and overcoming two decades of fear), a small group of relentless human rights crusaders were able to finally pierce the dictator's once invulnerable shield of impunity.

While the civilian government that succeeded Pinochet was too cowardly to prosecute him, enterprising magistrates in Spain went after him for the murder of some prominent Spanish citizens in the first years of his dictatorship. In 1998, still riding high as a self-appointed senator-for-life, Pinochet made the mistake of visiting London. The Spanish judges had him served with an international arrest warrant, and overnight Pinochet slid from having tea with Margaret Thatcher to sharing encyclopedia entries with Idi Amin and Benito Mussolini.

After 500 days in British custody, Pinochet was kicked out and sent home, and a tenuous and still-recovering Chilean civil society was finally ready to confront him. A cascade of accusations and indictments washed away any of his remaining legacy. His very presence in Chile, right up until his death, served as an electrifying stimulant to an ongoing national catharsis of restoring collective memory and providing justice. Pinochet had been indicted on multiple charges and was still facing more than 200 other criminal allegations.

Pinochet died with much of that business unfinished. A number of high-ranking military officers have been indicted for the abuses during the Pinochet period. Almost 30,000 Chileans have been officially recognized as victims of torture and have been granted monetary compensation.

But much about the Pinochet period remains unknown and unresolved. And while the civilian government now in power has shown little if no appetite to pursue these matters, Chile will never right itself until the full truth is known. No one knows for sure, just to cite one example, the origin of the millions that Pinochet stashed in secret foreign accounts. Illicit arms sales? Or drugs? Or both? And who else was involved with Pinochet in these scandals?

Likewise, there are still literally hundreds of unsolved political murders and disappearances. And an equal or greater number of former associates and beneficiaries of the Pinochet regime, guilty of a long list of human rights and criminal violations, remain unaccountable.

The death of any individual diminishes us all. There can be no celebration of Pinochet's demise, nor any mourning. The only appropriate response is to redouble efforts to uncover, review and sort out all the dirty work of his dictatorship — and then bury it forever with its execrable author.

Congresswoman Denies Urging Killing Of Castro (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

MIAMI, Dec. 10 (AP) — A congresswoman says a video showing her calling for Fidel Castro's assassination is fake, a charge denied Sunday by the film's director.

DOJ_NMG_0104357

The congresswoman, Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Republican of Florida, appears in the 28-second clip made available on the Internet by the makers of a new British documentary, "638 Ways to Kill Castro."

In it, she says: "I welcome the opportunity of having anyone assassinate Fidel Castro and any leader who is oppressing the people."

But Ms. Ros-Lehtinen, a Havana-born lawmaker recently selected to become the top Republican on the House International Relations Committee, says the filmmakers spliced clips together to make the sound bite.

"It's twisted in a way that gives the viewer a totally wrong impression," she told The Miami Herald. "I've said the community has moved on, that those strategies are not being used today, but apparently the filmmakers think we're still in a '60s mentality."

Still, Ms. Ros-Lehtinen said it was possible she had, at some point, mentioned Mr. Castro's potential assassination.

"If someone were to do it, I wouldn't be crying," she said.

The film's director, Dollan Cannell, stood by the authenticity of the video.

"I can assure you categorically and completely that there has been no distortion of what she said," Mr. Cannell told The Associated Press on Sunday.

Ms. Ros-Lehtinen said that she had seen the documentary and that the final cut did not include that video clip. However, the documentary's Web site has a link to the clip.

The congresswoman said she was not shy about wanting Mr. Castro dead.

"No one advocates assassination," she said. "What we are advocating for is free elections, freedom for political prisoners, free expression of ideas and respect for human rights. That's how you get change in Cuba. Not assassination."

After An American Dies, The Case Against His Killers Is Mired In Mexican Justice (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr. And Colin Moynihan

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 10 — A month ago, the death of Bradley Roland Will seemed cut and dried. Mr. Will, an independent New York City journalist was shot in the chest while videotaping a lopsided confrontation between gunmen who supported the beleaguered governor of Oaxaca and protesters demanding his ouster.

Pictures of some of the gunmen, with their names, had appeared on the front pages of all the major papers. The two fatal bullets had come from a 9-millimeter pistol like those issued to the police. The case seemed a prosecutor's dream.

That is, until Dec. 1, when a judge freed two of the men photographed shooting at the protesters, citing a lack of evidence. The ruling provoked accusations from leftists of a cover-up. Indeed, the state's investigation into the killing of Mr. Will, as well as the deaths of a dozen protesters in the conflict, has drawn so much criticism that federal police raided the state police headquarters on Friday and seized weapons to determine if any had been used in shootings during demonstrations.

Besides underscoring how infrequently killings of journalists and antigovernment protesters are solved in Mexico, the case has drawn widespread attention because it reveals the sad clash of left-wing idealism, personified in Mr. Will, a bearded 36-year-old originally from Illinois, with the murky realities of Mexican politics.

Politics often warps investigations here, and Mr. Will's death in late October has quickly become a contentious issue in the very struggle he had come to document.

The protesters with whom Mr. Will was sympathetic said he was killed by government-backed paramilitary thugs who had already killed a dozen others since the conflict here began in May. They charge that his death is still more proof that the state government remains repressive, its prosecutors willing to cover up crimes by government officials.

They also assert that Mr. Will's death was part of an orchestrated attack on protesters intended to shed enough blood to provoke the federal police to intervene. Mr. Will and three others died in the violence that day. The killings prompted Vicente Fox, who was president at the time and had resisted getting involved in the conflict, to send in federal police officers and clear the streets.

State prosecutors, meanwhile, have built a case that suggests it was the protesters, not the police, who murdered Mr. Will to call attention to their cause.

The state attorney, who was appointed by the governor and owes him political allegiance, said the videotape Mr. Will recorded just before two bullets hit him on Oct. 27 suggested that someone at his side shot him, not the gunmen down the street. "The person who shot him was at a distance of no more than two and a half meters," said the prosecutor, Lizbeth Caña Cadez. "He was close."

The lack of progress in the case has angered Mr. Will's parents and friends. They complain that Ms. Caña is trying to steer blame away from police officers and public officials loyal to the governor. Mr. Will's family, as well as several human rights organizations, has urged the federal government to take over the investigation.

"It's very frightening what is going on down there," Mr. Will's mother, Kathy Will, said in an interview. "They are totally manipulating the case. They are trying to shift the blame off of their people, the paramilitaries."

Whoever is right, the authorities here have resolved only one of the 13 killings related to the protests in Oaxaca, and it involved off-duty soldiers rather than the local police or officials.

Nationwide, when it comes to journalists, the picture is bleaker. At least 38 have been killed in Mexico since April 2005, most of them assassinated after reporting on drug dealers. None of those cases have been solved, despite the appointment of a special federal prosecutor to pursue the killers.

"The justice system in Mexico is highly dysfunctional," said Daniel Wilkinson of Human Rights Watch. "Criminal investigations into cases like this are rarely successful."

It was into this world that Mr. Will arrived with a digital video camera in early October to document an inside story of what he saw as powerless people rebelling against a repressive government. He was working for the New York chapter of the Independent Media Center, a left-leaning media collective.

Friends said Mr. Will contended that the news media had ignored the conflict in Oaxaca, which began with a teachers' strike in May and snowballed into a larger movement, involving dozens of left-wing and Indian groups united in a desire to see governor Ulises Ruiz resign.

For Mr. Will, friends said, the conflict was a pure uprising, poor people taking direct actions to force out a despotic, corrupt government and install a true democracy. His reports made it plain that his sympathies lay with the protesters. Still, several journalists said he never participated in the protests himself.

"He wasn't one of these revolutionary tourists, making Molotov cocktails," said Diego Osorno, a reporter for the Mexican newspaper Milenio, who was nearby when Mr. Will was shot.

The motivations of the protesters themselves, many Mexican analysts say, were less clear-cut, and, in some cases, perhaps less noble. The myriad groups who made up the Oaxaca People's Popular Assembly had differing agendas.

They included teachers seeking a large salary increase, out-of-favor politicians hoping to forge a new party and Marxists who wanted to incite a violent, leftist revolution. What's more, many of the groups involved were angry because Mr. Ruiz had cut off the flow of state patronage to their organizations.

In late November, after yet another clash in which protesters burned several public buildings, the federal police arrested more than 130 people and imposed a ban on marches. On Tuesday, the new administration of President Felipe Calderón arrested a top leader of the movement, Flavio Sosa Villavicencio, and threw him in a maximum security prison on criminal charges. An uneasy calm exists in Oaxaca, where the federal police have banned demonstrations.

The day Mr. Will died was a critical turning point in the five-month-old conflict. That week, the teachers' union, the largest group in the movement, had finally reached an agreement with federal negotiators to return to work.

On Friday, Oct. 27, the rest of the organizations in the protest decided to show they were still powerful by shutting down the city for a day. They erected dozens of barricades, and by afternoon the city was paralyzed.

Groups loyal to the governor struck back, attacking protesters at barricades in four Oaxaca suburbs. Local residents, fed up with months of unrest, took part in the attacks, but officials from Mr. Ruiz's party and police officers in civilian clothes led them, witnesses said. Some of the plainclothes officers fired at the protesters.

Mr. Will was among the reporters who responded when residents and local officials confronted protesters in Santa Lucía, a suburb west of Oaxaca, where at least 200 protesters, some of them armed, took part in street battles.

A witness, who asked not to be identified because he feared for his safety, said he saw five city officials, including two police captains, huddled nearby during the gunfight, firing large-caliber weapons at the protesters. Mr. Osorno, of Milenio, said he saw at least one gunman behind a truck, about 30 yards from where Mr. Will was in a half-crouch. Mr. Will was hit and fell to the ground, groaning "Help me" in Spanish, his last videotape reveals, though it does not show who fired the shot. Several protesters were in front of him, most of them young men in masks, with stones, bottle rockets and clubs.

Prosecutors say that just before Mr. Will fell, a voice can be heard on the tape yelling, "Didn't I tell you, man, not to take photos!"

Víctor Alonzo Altamirano, the chief of the homicide division in the state attorney's office, said the sound of a gun being cocked could be heard at the same time. Then comes the loud report of a pistol close by. "I cannot close my eyes to what we are seeing on the tape," he said.

One protester, who was less than a yard from Mr. Will when he was shot, maintained that no one around Mr. Will had a gun at that moment, though he acknowledged, as did two news photographers at the scene, that some protesters were telling photographers not to take photos for fear of being identified.

The protester, who requested anonymity, said Mr. Will was crouched down just behind him facing up the street, eye to the camera on his shoulder, when the bullet crashed into his chest.

"I felt a bullet whizzing over my shoulder," the protester said. "I turned and saw him twist and fall backward to his right. Then Brad raised up his shirt and said, 'They hit me.' He lost color rapidly."

Dr. Luis Mendoza Canseco, Oaxaca's medical examiner, who performed an autopsy, said Mr. Will had two wounds. Investigators said they were from the same 9-millimeter gun.

The two released suspects — Avel Santiago Zárate and Orlando Manuel Aguilar Cuello, both municipal officials — were found with .38-caliber pistols, prosecutors said.

Three other gunmen, who were also photographed firing at the protesters, have not been arrested or questioned, prosecutors say. Neither have investigators detained five men, including two police captains, who a witness reported had been shooting at the protesters.

Advocates for press freedom say investigations into the killings of journalists in Mexico have been generally shoddy. "Under the current climate in Oaxaca it's difficult for state officials to conduct an impartial investigation," said Carlos Lauria of the Committee to Protect Journalists.

Darfur Crisis Crosses Borders (CSM)

By Rich Schapiro

GOZ BEIDA, CHAD

For the past three years, Arab militiamen have helped Sudan's government quell a rebellion in Darfur by slaughtering the region's mostly black African population and leaving behind a trail of rape, murder, and destruction. The result: more than 200,000 dead and 2 million displaced in what the United Nations calls the world's worst humanitarian emergency.

At the very least, however, the violence in western Sudan was mostly confined to its borders.

No more.

The crisis in Darfur has exploded in recent weeks, and now threatens to drag fragile neighboring countries into a regional war.

Both Chad and the Central African Republic (CAR) have become engulfed in fighting that involves a toxic mix of rebel groups, government forces, armed militias, and civilians.

"It's not a steady deterioration," Jan Egeland, the outgoing UN humanitarian chief, told reporters last week. "It's a free fall, and it includes Darfur, eastern Chad, and northern Central African Republic."

In the past month alone, nearly 60,000 Darfurians have been forced from their homes to escape massacre at the hands of Arab militias known as the janjaweed. Aid workers, UN personnel, and independent observers say the janjaweed are backed by Sudan's government, but Khartoum has repeatedly denied this charge.

In eastern Chad, hundreds of aid workers have been evacuated due to increased hostilities between military forces and anti-government rebel groups, while Arab militiamen have ventured deeper into the country to conduct assaults, resulting in the displacement of nearly 100,000 Chadians.

And atrocities committed by a variety of rebel groups and armed bandits over the past few months have forced tens of thousands of people from the CAR to cross the border into Chad.

"The internal conflicts in Darfur, Chad, and the CAR are now linked by the regional presence and movement of armed groups, arms, and civilians across the three borders," said Georgette Gagnon, deputy director of the Africa division of Human Rights Watch. "And of course, the regional governments are using these insurgencies to carry out a proxy war against each other."

Indeed, leaders in Khartoum, Sudan's capital, and N'Djamena, its Chadian counterpart, have traded accusations as to who is responsible for stoking the bloodshed that has plagued Darfur since 2003. Both countries blame the other for supporting rebel groups.

In the past two weeks, the fighting has become so severe that hundreds of aid workers have been pulled from the region, leaving behind the displaced Sudanese, whose plight is now especially grim.

"For sure, if this situation lasts it will have a greater direct effect on the refugees' lives," said Hélène Caux, a spokeswoman for the United Nations High Commissioner of Refugees (UNHCR).

Since the last week of November, nearly 500 aid workers have been relocated from Abéché, the eastern city that serves as the hub for relief agencies in the region, to N'Djamena, while more than 100 are still awaiting evacuation from Guereda, a town farther north, according to the UNHCR.

Aid officials concede that, with only the skeleton crews now left behind in camps across the east, the refugees' situation has become particularly precarious.

"We haven't seen any downfall or deaths as a result of the reduction in personnel," says Joseph Aguettant, of the International Rescue Committee (IRC), which has trimmed its international staff in Bahai, a city along Chad's northern border, by 80 percent. "But we know this is something that can happen."

The area around the Goz Amir refugee camp, about 60 miles from the border, has become so rife with attacks that the Sudanese refugees and Chadians living nearby are stricken by fear of being set upon by the Arab militias.

Men head into the bush carrying bows and arrows, while young boys walk around with spears that are often taller than they are. When asked why they have the weapons, the response is unanimous: "defense."

The janjaweed - joined at times by Chadian Arabs - have been laying siege to villages east of Goz Beida, a Chadian town 100 miles from the Sudan-Chad border. The locals who survive are forced to trek miles to the closest villages, which often are plundered days later. They are then forced to flee yet again, and often end up setting up makeshift camps on wide swaths of parched land that offer little more than dust and thorn trees.

Hawaye Ismail arrived at just such a place, an open field 25 miles east of Goz Beida, last week with about 600 others. "We don't have anything to eat, and look, there's death all around us," she says.

Ms. Ismail's village was torched by Kalashnikov-carrying Arabs on horseback and camels in early November in an ambush that left 14 men dead. She made it to a nearby village, but was left homeless days later after the raiders rampaged again.

"The young attackers abused the young girls and the women," Ismail says, gesturing to the half-dozen women in tattered clothes gathered around her. "Today, with our situation, only God knows what we've been through."

Convoy Ambush In Darfur Kills About 30 Civilians; Investigators Taken Hostage (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Dec. 10 -- Militiamen on horseback ambushed a refugee convoy in western Darfur, killing about 30 civilians, and African Union peacekeepers investigating the attack were taken hostage by rioters, the A.U. and the United Nations said Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0104361

The armed men ambushed a civilian truck transporting medicine and relief items between the towns of El Geneina and Sirba, according to the United Nations. The exact number of civilians killed could not be confirmed but was estimated at about 30 people, said Radhia Achouri, spokeswoman for the U.N. mission in Sudan.

"Some of the passengers were shot by the attackers, and others were burnt to death during the attack," the United Nations said in a separate statement.

An international aid worker said that the assailants were government-backed Janjaweed, members of an Arab tribal militia, and that they attacked the convoy with rocket-propelled grenades, then killed survivors. He spoke on condition of anonymity because of restrictions the Sudanese government has placed on aid workers.

An African Union spokesman, Noureddine Mezni, said rioters angry over the deaths were holding captive a helicopter crew and eight peacekeepers sent to investigate. The A.U. base in El Geneina was also being attacked, Mezni said, although the identity of the attackers was unclear.

Sudanese police transported the bodies of the victims to a refugee camp on the outskirts of El Geneina, and demonstrations erupted in the town, the aid worker said. A U.N. official in Darfur said rioting and sporadic shooting took place in the town Sunday.

The increased violence underscored the worsening situation in Darfur, where as many as 450,000 people have died from disease and violence and 2.5 million have been driven from their homes since fighting erupted in early 2003.

The government is accused of unleashing the Janjaweed to help counter ethnic African rebels, and the militia is blamed for the worst atrocities against civilians during the conflict. The government denies backing the Janjaweed but agreed to disarm the militia as part of a peace agreement it signed with one Darfur rebel group in May.

Halliburton-linked Workers Attacked In Algeria (HC/AP)

Houston Chronicle, December 11, 2006

ALGIERS, Algeria — Assailants hurled a bomb and fired at two vehicles carrying employees of an affiliate of Houston-based Halliburton co. near Algiers today, killing one Algerian driver, witnesses said.

The full extent of the casualties in the attack was not immediately clear.

Nine American employees of BRC, or Brown & Root-Condor, were heading from their offices to a Sheraton Hotel where they are housed in Bouchaoui, 9 miles west of Algiers, when they were attacked. BRC is a joint venture of the Halliburton subsidiary KBR Inc., formerly known as Kellogg, Brown & Root, and Condor Engineering SPA. It has contracts in Algeria's oil and defense industries.

The Americans were in a bus behind a security vehicle carrying two Algerians. The assailants hurled a bomb at the first vehicle, immediately killing the driver and injuring the passenger, the witnesses said.

Attackers then opened fire on the second bus, which quickly turned around and headed back to the BRC offices before the gunmen dispersed. Witnesses said it appeared there were no casualties in the Americans' bus.

Algerian security officials immediately blocked off roads in the area, adjacent to a forest on the Mediterranean coast.

Algeria is trying to pull itself out of an Islamic insurgency that started 14 years ago and has killed an estimated 150,000 people — Islamists, civilians and military.

Large-scale fighting died down in the late 1990s, and Algeria is enjoying the fruits of the oil boom and increased foreign investment, but sporadic violence continues to rattle the nation.

BRC offices could not be reached for comment. KBR Inc. is an independent, publicly traded subsidiary of Houston-based oil services contractor Halliburton Co.

In Tsunami's Wake, A Peaceful Aceh Holds First Election (CSM)

By Simon Montlake

BANDA ACEH, INDONESIA

Voters in the battle-scarred Indonesian province of Aceh go to the polls Monday, nearly two years after a devastating tsunami scoured its coastline and released an outpouring of international aid for the stricken survivors.

DOJ_NMG_0104362

The ballot is the first since the signing in August 2005 of a landmark peace accord between the Indonesian government and armed rebels, who agreed to lay down their weapons in return for political autonomy for Aceh. Former rebels are competing in electoral races for the governorship and 19 district mayors and regents.

The presence of such figures on the ballot, and their public campaign to get elected, is a remarkable turnaround for Aceh, where the struggle for power has long been equated with fear, intimidation, and bloodshed. A trouble-free vote, and the acceptance of the outcome, would be an important step forward in the peace process after three decades of conflict and false starts.

"If we have the right leader, the peace will continue, I'm sure of that. Aceh can be prosperous and peaceful," says Ramli bin Buhari, a businessman from Pidie.

A high turnout is expected among the 2.6 million eligible voters, including hundreds of thousands of left homeless after the tsunami. Thousands of election monitors, including a European Union team, will be deployed at polling booths, which close mid-afternoon. Early results from poll samples are expected by early evening.

Under the peace accord, the rebel Free Aceh Movement, known by the Indonesian acronym GAM, agreed to disarm and demobilize 3,000 combatants, in exchange for a withdrawal of around 25,000 Indonesian soldiers and paramilitary police who were widely accused of human-rights abuses. The accord also called for local elections to be held in 2006, setting the stage for GAM to enter the political process.

But a major rift between exiled GAM leaders and a new generation of fighters and activists has prevented the movement from fielding a united candidate. Instead, two competing tickets for governor are claiming to represent GAM, which has opted to remain neutral after initially endorsing one candidate. By splitting their support base, say observers, the result could be that neither wins the governorship.

Tensions between the two camps spilled over on the eve of the two-week campaign when a gang of thugs assaulted Humam Hamid, one of the gubernatorial candidates, in a stronghold of Irwandi Yusuf, a young fighter and ex-political prisoner who heads the rival pro-GAM ticket. But conciliatory rhetoric from senior leaders in the movement, who insisted on neutrality between the two camps, helped to tamp down tensions, and the campaign has been smooth, with only minor reports of intimidation.

Analysts say this internal friction will complicate GAM's goal of dissolving its military command and transforming into a political party capable of ruling Aceh via the ballot box. "GAM never had a strong political wing. It was overwhelmingly a military operation," says Sidney Jones of the International Crisis Group in Jakarta.

Sharia law, which Aceh implemented in 2000, has also emerged as a backdrop to the elections as enforcement has been stepped up in recent years, including patrols by special "morality police" that report directly to the governor's office. While candidates have made almost no mention of the traditional Islamic law, the new policing force is a bone of contention among ordinary Achenese.

Under Indonesian election law, the winning candidate must garner over 25 percent of the vote, or face a run off against the second-placed ticket. With eight candidates in the gubernatorial race, including the two pro-GAM tickets, a second round appears likely. GAM's big election gamble

On a broiling afternoon last week, around 2,000 of Mr. Yusuf's supporters sat in a park in Banda Aceh facing a rickety wooden stage where stocky bodyguards formed a cordon behind the candidate. His speech was punctuated with references to his role in the peace accord and the promise of economic rewards in future for Aceh, which is among the poorest provinces in Indonesia despite its abundant oil and gas reserves.

Yusuf, who is running as an independent with a former political prisoner as his running mate, urged voters not to be seduced by candidates from large political parties with more money to splurge on the campaign trail. "When you run to them in the future and ask about their promises for more housing, they would answer, 'We already gave you clothing and food,' " he admonished.

Yusuf characterizes the rift within GAM as a generational divide between senior political leaders in Europe, who formed a government in exile in the 1970s, and younger combatants and activists who resisted harsh military crackdowns. But he insists that whoever wins the vote, the peace process will continue, provided Indonesia keeps its promises.

"There is an expectation from the people (of Aceh) that a candidate from GAM will win the election. If they don't win after a fair election, people must accept this. GAM will accept anyone who wins because of a fair election," he says.

Analysts say defeat for Aceh's former rebels at the ballot box would be a wake-up call for GAM and could spur its transformation ahead of the next political contest in three years time when the local legislature is up for grabs. "This is a dry run for 2009. That's the real prize. When you control the local parliament, you have budgetary power and can shape the laws of an autonomous region," says Ms. Jones. Guerrilla to groom

As the campaign wrapped up last week - candidates are forbidden to stump during the final three days - Herry Nurmansyah, a former GAM fighter, had more important matters on his mind. One year after leaving his jungle camp and going back to his village outside Banda Aceh, the former GAM fighter was to marry his high-school sweetheart, Julisa.

On Saturday, he sat stiffly in a traditional black tunic and crown on a bubblegum-pink throne with his new wife, whose hands and feet were painted in henna swirls. She dabbed tears from her heavily lacquered face as relatives crowded around the couple.

Among the visitors crammed into the room inside the bride's house were Mr. Nurmansyah's former comrades in arms, including his unit commander, Tuengku Hamzah, who had come to bless the newly-weds. Hamzah had spent the previous weeks canvassing votes for Yusuf, and was confident that the political spoils would be coming his way - just desserts for toughing it out in the jungle.

Nurmansyah, who recently found a job building houses for tsunami survivors, had more modest aims. "I just hope this election will bring change and benefit for all of us. We don't want to have to take up weapons again," he says.

In Tsunami's Wake, Old Foes In War Now Wage Politics (NYT)

By Seth Mydans

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BANDA ACEH, Indonesia, Dec. 10 — When tsunami waves hit Aceh two years ago this month, Irwandi Yusuf saved himself by climbing onto the roof of the jail where he was being held as a political prisoner.

Now he is a candidate for governor of the province, and in the election being held here on Monday, one of his eight opponents is a former commander of the Indonesian forces he faced as a separatist rebel.

"He is so friendly to me," Mr. Irwandi said of his former enemy. "We can cut off the line from the past to now. We just talk about funny things."

The tsunami that killed 170,000 people and left half a million homeless here in Aceh Province seems to have taken the fire out of a 29-year conflict. A hard-won peace agreement that made the election possible appears to be holding. There are still obstacles ahead, but if the process continues to move forward, an armed insurgency group will perform the rare feat of transforming itself into a political party within the government it opposed.

"It's a very difficult process," Muthiah Alagappa, director of the Washington office of the East-West Center, said in a telephone interview. "There are very few cases like it."

Even as post-tsunami reconstruction has bogged down in bureaucratic confusion and corruption, the dismantling of the war has proceeded quickly with what appears to be a genuine commitment from both sides. Only 43,400 permanent homes have been built in the two years since the tsunami, but 128,000 are needed, according to the United Nations. Twelve thousand families remain in temporary accommodations.

The Indonesian Army has withdrawn half the 50,000 soldiers it had in Aceh, though, and the rebels have laid down their arms and joined this special election that is part of what is called a memorandum of understanding with the government.

It is a delicate and difficult process, but the turn away from war seems irreversible, most political analysts and rebel leaders say. "No, no, we never think of using arms any more," Mr. Irwandi said in an interview.

Even before the tsunami's apocalyptic destruction shocked the combatants on both sides here, tentative moves were under way to find an exit from an unwinnable war.

"We were tired and they were tired," Mr. Irwandi said. "We could not achieve the mission militarily, and the military thought it could defeat us in five months or eight months or eight years, but found themselves trapped in a very protracted war."

In Sri Lanka, by contrast, the tsunami didn't halt a Tamil separatist insurgency that was not yet ready to look for a way to end the conflict.

As it moves from war to peace, the Acehnese insurgency is facing what analysts say is a predictable complication — a rift in the insurgency, called the Free Aceh Movement, between an old guard that lived in exile and younger former combatants.

In addition to his former combat enemy, among the opponents Mr. Irwandi, 46, faces in the election Monday is a fellow former insurgent who has been backed by the rebel group's leadership from its exile headquarters in Sweden.

"The fault lines are completely normal," said Sidney Jones, the Southeast Asia coordinator for International Crisis Group, an international monitoring group. "We've seen this in East Timor and in almost every civil conflict that exists. But it does make it difficult to pull together a coherent party structure.

"Right now, the fissures are so deep that it's going to make it all the more difficult to get the party up and running."

There is no shortage of difficulties for any new government in a province recovering from the twin devastations of war and natural disaster.

For years, Aceh has effectively been under the administration of the Indonesian military and police. Many of the province's skilled workers and civil servants died in the tsunami. Whatever the results of the election, Aceh must build a functioning government amid both physical and political ruins.

As foreign aid groups begin to pull out, taking with them jobs, skills and economic support, the challenges will become harsher. Among these will be the integration, with international assistance, of thousands of guerrillas and political prisoners into the mainstream.

As with other former insurgencies like those in Northern Ireland and the southern Philippines, there are concerns that a violent splinter group could emerge if not all of the combatants are satisfied.

A devastated province in which tens of thousands of people are without homes or jobs is not the most welcoming environment for former rebels hoping to start a new life.

The rebels and the victims of the insurgency, which took 15,000 lives, will compete for resources and financial assistance with surviving victims of the tsunami.

Many fighters have spent years in the mountains and have few skills or resources to support themselves. Many have not yet received the aid that has been promised, and there are reports that some are turning to banditry and other crimes.

The election is unlikely to bring order to the political scene. Analysts here do not expect any of the eight candidates for governor to win the 25 percent of the vote required for outright victory, and a runoff is expected early next year. Former rebels are also running for some of the 20 other local executive positions in the election.

But leaders of the rebel group say they are prepared to lose in this first attempt at electoral politics. They say they see it as a trial run as they try to form a party, or parties, for a provincial parliamentary election in 2009.

The election is about power, not policy, and it is not clear what changes the former rebels will make if they win office. They now concede that the independence for which they fought is unattainable. The peace agreement has given them a measure of local autonomy and the right to form a local political party, and they have been promised two-thirds of the revenues from rich oil and natural gas reserves in Aceh.

"If the economy here is O.K. and the Indonesian government doesn't play around with us, what do we need separatism for?" said Muhammad Zainal Abidin, 52, a former rebel who spent 16 months in prison before being released, with other political prisoners, in August 2005. Like many other former rebels and others here, he said he had little interest in the strict Islamic Shariah law that had led to canings for adultery and gambling over the past year in Aceh.

"We don't like that at all," he said as he sat cross-legged on the floor above his small grocery store. "We want democracy in Aceh. We don't want the Shariah police here."

Most of all, the people of Aceh want a chance to live quiet, ordinary lives. "What I am afraid of is that we could end up with dissatisfied groups and that could lead to conflict again," said Azwar Hasan, who runs a local aid group. "Oh, God, no one wants to live in conflict again."

Bangladesh Sends Army Amid Unrest (NYT)

NEW DELHI, Dec. 10 — The interim government in Bangladesh, faced with mounting opposition party protests, has deployed the army in what appears to be an attempt to check pre-election violence.

The order by the president, Iajuddin Ahmed, who leads a caretaker government, was issued Saturday night, on the eve of opposition party threats to surround the presidential palace. Political agitation has already debilitated the country nearly six weeks before the vote. [A news wire] reported that soldiers had been posted at the presidential compound, known as Bangabhaban, and at other potential political flash points.

Political violence has become routine in Bangladesh, and troops have been called out in the past to ensure peaceful elections. But it remains unclear to what extent the president enjoys the full backing of the interim government in his decision to pull out the army. Nor has the army provided any hints as to whether it intends to step in and rule.

The latest developments could further polarize opposition Awami League cadres, who have demanded Mr. Ahmed's ouster. The opposition contends that the voter list is inaccurate and that members of the election commission favor the Bangladesh Nationalist Party, whose five-year rule ended two months ago when the caretaker government was appointed.

So turbulent are politics in Bangladesh that its Constitution mandates that a neutral caretaker government manage the elections.

Yunus Claims Nobel Peace Prize (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 11, 2006

STOCKHOLM (AP) — Bangladeshi economist Muhammad Yunus accepted the Nobel Peace Prize on Sunday, saying he hoped the award would inspire "bold initiatives" to fight poverty and eradicate the root causes of terrorism.

Yunus, 66, shared the award with his Grameen Bank for helping people rise above poverty by giving them microcredit — small, usually unsecured loans.

"I firmly believe that we can create a poverty free world if we collectively believe in it," Yunus said after accepting the prize at City Hall in Oslo. "The only place you would be able to see poverty is in a poverty museum."

The Nobel Prizes, announced in October, are always presented in Oslo and Stockholm, Sweden, on Dec. 10 to mark the anniversary of the 1896 death of their creator, Alfred Nobel, a Swedish industrialist who invented dynamite and stipulated the dual ceremonies in his will.

The winners for literature, medicine, physics and economics will receive their awards later Sunday at a royal ceremony in Stockholm's blue-hued concert hall. Each award carries a purse of $1.4 million, a diploma and a gold medal. The first prizes were handed out in 1901.

This year's laureates include a novelist who explored Turkey's clash of cultures and American scientists who helped cement the big-bang theory of the universe and broke new ground in genetic research.

Yunus said ending poverty was the best way to fight terrorism.

"We must address the root causes of terrorism to end it for all time," he said. "I believe putting resources into improving the lives of poor people is a better strategy than spending it on guns."

Grameen Bank, set up in 1983, was the first lender to provide microcredit, giving very small loans to poor Bangladeshis who did not qualify for loans from conventional banks. No collateral is needed, and repayment is based on an honor system, with a nearly 100% repayment rate.

Yunus said the idea has spread around the world, with similar programs in almost every country.

Clad in a traditional Bangladeshi sleeveless jacket, Yunus accepted his half of the $1.4 million prize from awards committee chairman Ole Danbolt Mjoes.

Board member Mosammat Taslima Begum, wearing a traditional dress in red with a green shawl, accepted the other half of the award on behalf of Grameen bank, saying she dedicated it to all Bangladeshis.

Mjoes said the award was an outstretched hand to the Islamic world in an era where Muslims are often demonized because of terrorism.

"The peace prize to Yunus and Grameen Bank is also support for the Muslim country of Bangladesh, and for the Muslim environments in the world that are working for dialogue and collaboration," Mjoes said

Turkish writer Orhan Pamuk won the literature prize for a body of work that illustrates the struggle to find a balance between East and West.

U.S. researchers have long dominated the science awards, and swept them all this year for the first time since 1983.

The Nobel Prize in medicine went to Andrew Z. Fire and Craig C. Mello for discovering a powerful way to turn off the effect of specific genes. John C. Mather and George F. Smoot won the physics prize for work that helped cement the big-bang theory of how the universe was created.

Roger D. Kornberg won the prize in chemistry for his studies of how cells take information from genes to produce proteins, a process that could provide insight into defeating cancer and advancing stem cell research.

Economics winner Edmund S. Phelps was cited for research into the relationship between inflation and unemployment, giving governments better tools to formulate economic policy. The economics award is not an original Nobel Prize, but was created by the Bank of Sweden in 1968.

Pamuk, whose trial last year for "insulting Turkishness" made headlines worldwide, was honored for exploring "new symbols for the clash and interlacing of cultures." His novels include "Snow" and "My Name Is Red." The charges against Pamuk were eventually dropped.

Intrigue Over Spy's Death Spreads To Germany (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And Mark Landler

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 10 —The German authorities announced Sunday that they had begun a criminal investigation of a Russian businessman after finding traces of polonium 210 around Hamburg beginning on Oct. 28 — four days before he met in London with the former Russian spy who died after ingesting the radioactive substance.

The British police have so far found no evidence of polonium contamination in London earlier than the date of that meeting, Nov. 1. The Sunday announcement raised the possibility that the polonium was carried from Moscow to London by way of Germany.

It has also added to suspicions that the case is somehow connected to the shadowy world of agents and businessmen, defectors, spies and exiles let loose by the dissolution of the K.G.B., and still entwined with successor agencies.

The former Russian spy, Alexander V. Litvinenko, long a critic of Russia's president, Vladimir V. Putin, made deathbed accusations that Mr. Putin was complicit in the poisoning — an accusation the Kremlin has derisively dismissed. The case has strained relations between Russia and Britain, and has now entangled Germany.

The man the Germans have put at the center of scrutiny is Dmitri V. Kovtun, a 41-year-old Russian who was a student in the 1980s at the Supreme Soviet Higher Military Command School, where many students went on to serve in the K.G.B. He has been in a Moscow hospital since Dec. 7, suffering from exposure to polonium. There are conflicting reports about his health; Interfax, the Russian news agency, reported he was in critical condition, but his lawyer later disputed that.

At a news conference in Hamburg on Sunday, the city's chief prosecutor, Martin Köhnke, told reporters, "He may not just be a victim but could also be a perpetrator." He said that Mr. Kovtun was accused of illegally handling the polonium.

A spokeswoman for the German police, Ulrike Sweden, expressed frustration that Russian authorities had not responded to German requests to speak to Mr. Kovtun.

The German authorities said that Mr. Kovtun, who has been living in Germany, began spreading traces of polonium 210 in Hamburg soon after he arrived on an Aeroflot jet from Moscow on Oct. 28. Traces were found in the BMW that picked him up at the airport; on a couch and a pillow in at the apartment of his former wife, where he spent the night; at the house of his former wife's mother; and on a document he signed in a meeting at the immigration office in Hamburg two days later, the police said.

"If you're sitting in the passenger seat of a car, you're not likely to be sweating enough to leave traces of it that way," Ms. Sweden said at the Hamburg news conference on Sunday. "It's possible he got poisoned by handling the stuff."

On Nov. 1, Mr. Kovtun flew to London. An inspection of the plane he flew on, which belonged to the airline Germanwings, turned up no evidence of contamination.

In London, Mr. Kovtun met with two former K.G.B. agents, Andrei K. Lugovoi and Vyacheslav G. Sokolenko, whom he had known as students at the Soviet military school in the 1980s and who had both gone into private security work after the K.G.B. dissolved along with the Soviet Union.

Then he and Mr. Lugovoi, who had known Mr. Litvinenko for 10 years, met with him at a bar in the Millennium Mayfair Hotel, ostensibly to pursue a business deal. Alex Goldfarb, a friend of the Litvinenko family, said that Mr. Sokolenko also met Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1, possibly at the same hotel.

Within hours, Mr. Litvinenko became seriously ill. Three weeks later, he was dead, and medical experts determined that the cause was exposure to polonium 210. The association of so many men linked to the former K.G.B. in the case reflects the shadowy tangle of relations that emerged from Russia's post-Soviet chaos, where some covert agents became free agents but kept ties to the government, billions were made overnight, and the new billionaires who made them needed protection.

Mr. Litvinenko and Mr. Lugovoi, in particular, held close ties to Boris A. Berezovsky, the former Russian oligarch who became a rival to Mr. Putin, and whom Russia accused of defrauding the state of about $18 million in 1994 and 1995. He has been living in political asylum in Britain since 2003.

Mr. Kovtun, Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Sokolenko have all publicly denied any involvement in Mr. Litvinenko's case, but their shared background in the Soviet and then Russian secret services and the private security industry that evolved since has — fairly or not — heightened suspicions of Russia's, and Mr. Putin's, possible involvement.

Igor A. Goloshchapov, a former K.G.B. counterintelligence officer who now heads the League of Security Structures, a lobby for the private security firms that have proliferated here in Russia, said there were 4,200 licensed private security agencies in Moscow alone, as well as others operating less openly and available for hire for illicit purposes. "The security and detective business is a regular part of life in any society," he said in a telephone interview. "The peculiarity of Russia's security business is that in our country our whole way of life was changing."

"Where this kind of business starts," he added, "the truth ends."

Oleg A. Gordiyesky, a former K.G.B. colonel who defected to Britain in the 1980s, said the private Russian security companies often had close ties to Russian authorities. "Most of them are immediately recruited as secret collaborators, that is, members of the public who have promised to help," he said. "And they help very seriously. They do their job protecting the companies and they report everything back" to the Federal Security Service, the K.G.B.'s successor.

According to a lengthy interview with Mr. Kovtun, Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Sokolenko on Ekho Moskvy, an independent Russian radio station, on the day after Mr. Litvinenko died, the three met in the 1980s at Soviet military command school, where students were known as Kremlin Cadets.

Mr. Kovtun said he had served in Czechoslovakia and Germany after leaving the academy, a résumé that suggested he could have served in some military or intelligence capacity. He did not say with which service or unit he served. He settled down in Germany and married a German woman. He describes himself now as a business consultant.

"I help Western companies in entering the Russian market," he said.

Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Sokolenko went on to become members of the Ninth Department of the K.G.B., or the Kremlin Regiment, which provided security for high-ranking Communist Party officials. Mr. Lugovoi began in 1987, Mr. Sokolenko in 1990.

When the Soviet Union collapsed, the regiment became part of the Federal Security Service, known as the F.S.B. and ultimately as an independent force providing Kremlin security, not unlike the United States Secret Service.

Mr. Sokolenko, like Mr. Lugovoi, retired and became involved in private security. Many of these companies boasted of their associations with their former employers. Mr. Sokolenko's company is called the Ninth Wave, an allusion not only to the former K.G.B. department but also to a maritime expression for the worst wave in any storm, an apt metaphor for what unfolded in the 1990s.

Mr. Lugovoi left the secret service in 1996 and became head of security at ORT, the state television network that until Mr. Putin's presidency was largely controlled by Mr. Berezovsky. In 2001, Mr. Lugovoi was arrested and spent more than 12 months in prison, accused of plotting the escape of a Berezovsky associate from a Moscow hospital where he had been in police custody, accused of embezzling millions of dollars from Aeroflot and of wiring the money to accounts in Switzerland belonging to Mr. Berezovsky. (He was convicted in 2004, but released for time served; he has since left Russia.)

The authorities had summoned Mr. Berezovsky for questioning in that case, but by then he had fled Russia for London, saying that an array of criminal charges against him, many still pending, had been politically motivated. Mr. Lugovoi was released in September 2002 and the charges against him were dropped, with little explanation.

Mr. Lugovoi declined repeated requests for an interview. In the public statements he has made, he said he had continued to work in security-related matters. Along with Mr. Kovtun, he met with Mr. Litvinenko at least three times in the month leading up to the Nov. 1 meeting. One of those involved a meeting with a British company, Enrys; another involved a meeting with Mr. Berezovsky, who also became a patron of Mr. Litvinenko's.

Mr. Lugovoi said he had known Mr. Litvinenko for at least a decade — to the time Mr. Litvinenko worked for the F.S.B. and formed his relationship with Mr. Berezovsky after the latter narrowly survived an assassination attempt.

Mr. Lugovoi said that a year ago, at Mr. Litvinenko's request, they began discussing business deals involving British companies interested in investing in Russia. This year Mr. Lugovoi expanded his business dealings to include a company based near Moscow that makes mead and kvas, a bread-based, mildly alcoholic drink.

He has repeatedly promised to meet with British investigators, but in the week since British detectives arrived in Moscow an interview has not yet taken place.

Mr. Sokolenko, in a telephone interview, said he had joined Mr. Lugovoi and his family on the trip to London beginning Oct. 31 to see a soccer game, but he did not meet Mr. Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel the next day.

He declined to discuss his relationship with Mr. Lugovoi except to say they were old friends. He added that he and his colleagues had been unfairly tainted by the swirling accusations simply because of their K.G.B. backgrounds. "My name is from now on associated with this story," he said. "It is not very pleasant. We have never concealed the truth about how it all happened."

Hamburg Checked for Radiation

FRANKFURT, Dec. 10 — The investigation of Dmitri V. Kovtun's four days of spreading polonium has rattled Hamburg, with officials in space-age radiation protection suits swooping into shops and restaurants throughout the weekend.

The German police and federal authorities established a special unit to investigate the case, dubbed "The Third Man" — a reference to the cold-war film starring Orson Welles, and an officer from Scotland Yard is to travel to Hamburg on Monday to coordinate the German and British investigations.

Gerald Kirchner, an official from the Federal Office of Radiation Protection, said at a news conference in Hamburg on Sunday that polonium could have spread to Mr. Kovtun's hands if he mishandled a container of the substance. It is lethal, but is dangerous only when swallowed, breathed in, or absorbed through an open wound. "If it did come out of a container, it was very carelessly done," Mr. Kirchner said.

Not one of the people Mr. Kovtun came into contact with while in Hamburg was contaminated, said a police spokeswoman, Ulrike Sweden. The night before he left, Mr. Kovtun slept on the couch in the apartment of his German former wife, Marina, in Ottensen, a gritty Hamburg neighborhood that is being gentrified.

Also on Sunday, the British police confirmed that 2 of the 26 officers working on the case had tested positive for low levels of radioactive contamination. A police spokeswoman, who spoke in return for anonymity under police rules, said the traces were "relatively small" and "below defined safety limits."

Probe Of Poisoning Shifts To Germany (WSJ)

By David Crawford, Alan Cullison And Carrick Mollenkamp

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

The investigation into the death of ex-Russian agent Alexander Litvinenko has spread to Germany as it focuses on the travels of two Russian men, one of whom left a radioactive trail through Hamburg during his stopover there from Moscow en route to London, where Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned.

The two Russians -- Andrei Lugovoi and Dmitri Kovtun -- met with Mr. Litvinenko Nov. 1 at the bar of the Millennium Hotel in London's Mayfair neighborhood hours before Mr. Litvinenko fell ill. Mr. Litvinenko, an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin who had immigrated to Britain claiming asylum, died Nov. 23 after being poisoned with a little-known radioactive substance, polonium 210. A person familiar with the British inquiry into the alleged killing said the two men are a central focus of the investigation, adding that investigators haven't ruled out that others could have been involved and somehow set up Messrs. Lugovoi and Kovtun.

Messrs. Lugovoi and Kovtun are longtime acquaintances, having graduated from an elite military school in Moscow and having both worked in the Russian security services.

Scotland Yard, Russian police and about 300 German police and other officials are involved in the investigation of Mr. Litvinenko's death, raising diplomatic tensions between Russia and the West. Yesterday, investigators in Hamburg complained that Russian authorities aren't cooperating and haven't responded to their request for access to the Aeroflot plane that transported Mr. Kovtun to Hamburg from Moscow, said Thomas Menzel, head of Hamburg's special investigation squad for the case.

German police have code-named their investigation "Third Man" because of the trio's meeting at the hotel bar. (Police said it isn't a reference to the 1949 movie "The Third Man," a thriller set in post-World War II Vienna.)

Yesterday, investigators laid out Mr. Kovtun's steps through Hamburg, where he stayed from Oct. 28 to Nov. 1. Traces of polonium 210 were found on the passenger seat of a BMW car that picked up Mr. Kovtun at the Hamburg airport, in the home of Mr. Kovtun's former mother-in-law outside Hamburg, and on a couch he slept on at the apartment of ex-wife Marina, German officials said yesterday. Police also found traces of polonium 210 at a Hamburg city registry office on a piece of paper that Mr. Kovtun signed Oct. 30, Mr. Menzel said.

Four people have informed police they met with Mr. Kovtun, and 13 other leads are also being followed, Mr. Menzel said. The discovery in Germany came after police there ran a standard check for Mr. Kovtun's name after London's Metropolitan Police Service, as Scotland Yard is formally known, disclosed it as part of its investigation, Mr. Menzel said.

Investigators have had trouble talking with Mr. Kovtun and his associate Mr. Lugovoi in recent days. Last week, officials from Scotland Yard flew to Moscow to meet with them, but the meetings have been held up amid conflicting reports both men had been hospitalized for reactions to traces of polonium 210. One Russian news service said Mr. Kovtun had been in a coma, a report officials later denied. State news services in Moscow reported yesterday that Mr. Lugovoi was being interviewed by Russian authorities in the presence of Scotland Yard's team.

Mr. Litvinenko had said he was investigating the Oct. 7 killing of 48-year-old Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, although authorities haven't officially established any connections between the two killings.

Messrs. Lugovoi and Kovtun, in a recent appearance on a Moscow radio program, said they were innocent in Mr. Litvinenko's death. On the show, Mr. Lugovoi, an ex-Soviet security-service agent, said he introduced Mr. Kovtun to Mr. Litvinenko because of their common business interests.

Mr. Kovtun, also on the radio program, said he previously worked for the Soviet government in Czechoslovakia and was in Germany when the Soviet Union collapsed. He married a German woman and remained in the country for 12 years. He recently divorced and moved back to work as a business consultant in Moscow, where he sought to help British companies enter the Russian market. He said his first meeting with Mr. Litvinenko was Oct. 16 in London.

Germans Investigate Russian In Poisoning (WP)

By Shannon Smiley And Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

HAMBURG, Dec. 10 -- German prosecutors said Sunday that they are investigating a Russian businessman for the illegal handling of a radioactive substance in the days after he flew to Germany from Russia and before he left to meet a former Russian internal security agent in London. The development is the strongest indication so far that the plot to poison Alexander Litvinenko in London originated in Moscow.

DOJ_NMG_0104370

At a news conference in this port city, German officials said Dmitry Kovtun, who reportedly lies sick in a Moscow hospital, flew to Hamburg from Moscow on Oct. 28 before heading to London on Nov. 1, the day he met Litvinenko at a bar at the Millennium Hotel.

Hamburg's chief prosecutor, Martin Koehnke, said traces of radioactivity found in and around Hamburg and linked to Kovtun's movements before Nov. 1 suggested that he carried the substance to Germany. Koehnke said it was still possible that Kovtun was merely present when polonium-210 was "packaged in Moscow," but German investigators are convinced that he was in contact with the deadly isotope before he met Litvinenko.

"There is probable cause for the initial suspicion that he might have brought the substance with him outside his body to Hamburg, and that he may not only be a victim but could also be a perpetrator," Koehnke said at the news conference in Hamburg police headquarters.

Bolstering that assertion, Thomas Menzel, a police officer leading the investigation, said there is no evidence that Kovtun had returned to Germany after the London meeting with Litvinenko, all but ruling out the possibility, as Kovtun has claimed, that he first came into contact with a radioactive substance at the meeting with Litvinenko.

"We cannot be absolutely sure at the moment, but there has been no evidence to suggest that he returned to Hamburg," Menzel said.

"He is considered to be a suspect," German police said in a statement.

German radiation experts said Sunday that they had confirmed the presence of polonium-210, the substance that killed Litvinenko, at two locations in Germany and were 95 percent certain that traces found at other locations had come from that radioactive isotope. Final tests were needed to confirm its presence at some locations, German officials said. Officials did not specify exactly where the polonium-210 had been found.

Menzel said Kovtun, a Soviet army veteran and business consultant who had lived in Germany for 12 years, flew to Hamburg from Moscow on an Aeroflot flight.

"Aeroflot is not available to us. It is probable that he was already contaminated when he flew on the plane," Menzel said. "We have not received any answers to our questions so far" from Russian authorities.

The Germans have dubbed their investigation "The Third Man," though officials did not explain the reference to the Graham Greene mystery. More than 170 police officers are working on the case, along with members of the federal border police, the federal criminal police and radiation protection officers.

The killing of Litvinenko, which Scotland Yard has classified a murder case, had already led to some deterioration in relations between Britain and Russia, but it now has the potential to impact the wider relationship between the European Union and Russia. Critics of President Vladimir Putin have accused the Kremlin of complicity in the killing, allegations that the Kremlin rejected as absurd amid repeated assertions that the polonium almost certainly did not originate in Russia.

The German allegations, however, will throw a fresh spotlight on the Russian investigation of the case. The Russian prosecutor general's office has opened its own inquiry into Litvinenko's death and said it was investigating Kovtun's poisoning as attempted murder.

Attempts to reach Russian officials at the Kremlin and the prosecutor general's office Sunday night were unsuccessful.

The German disclosures indicate that Kovtun was "with the murder weapon before Nov. 1," said Alex Goldfarb, who has been acting as a spokesman for the Litvinenko family in London. But he said Kovtun "had no motive to kill" Litvinenko, so the question remains, "Who hired him and equipped him?"

"It is clear all the tracks lead to Moscow," he said.

Kovtun, 41, first met Litvinenko on Oct. 16 in London, where the two were introduced by another Russian, Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB agent who attended a military academy with Kovtun in the 1980s. The three discussed possible business deals involving British companies interested in investing in the Russian market, according to a joint interview with Kovtun and Lugovoy on Echo Moskva radio in late November.

Both Litvinenko and Lugovoy at various times had close ties to exiled Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky, a declared enemy of Putin. Lugovoy was head of security for a television channel in Moscow owned by Berezovsky before he fled Russia in 2000 after clashing with Putin. And Litvinenko became a part of Berezovsky's circle in London when he fled Russia after accusing former colleagues in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, of corruption. His allegations had led Russian authorities to press criminal charges against him.

The three Russians met on Nov. 1 at the Millennium Hotel bar in central London. Seven hotel workers have tested positive for exposure to a radioactive substance. An Italian who met separately with Litvinenko the same day has also tested positive for radiation exposure, as has Litvinenko's wife.

Both Kovtun and Lugovoy have denied any involvement in Litvinenko's death.

Laying out a chronology of some of Kovtun's movements, German officials said he landed in Hamburg after flying from Moscow on Oct. 28. He was picked up in a BMW, which has tested positive for radiation, German investigators said.

On Oct. 29, Kovtun spent the night in Haselau, about 16 miles north of Hamburg, at the home of his former mother-in-law. The BMW was found at that location, German officials said, and initial tests detected radiation in the house.

On Oct. 30, Kovtun went to an administrative office for foreigners in Hamburg. Radiation has been detected on his file card, which he signed, German officials said. Neither the employee in the room nor the room itself tested positive. Kovtun has a German residence permit. He was still registered as a Hamburg resident, but police said he had not lived permanently at his listed address in an apartment building on Erzbergerstrasse for a couple of years.

Kovtun told Echo Moskva that he had started working as a business consultant in Moscow and that an enterprise had led to his discussions with Litvinenko.

Kovtun's former wife lives in the same building on Erzbergerstrasse where he was registered. On Oct. 31, Kovtun spent the night on her couch. Police said they found traces of radiation on the couch.

At 6:40 a.m. on Nov. 1, Kovtun took a Germanwings flight from Hamburg to London. The plane was examined yesterday at the Cologne-Bonn airport, but no contamination was detected. Police, explaining that apparent anomaly, said that had Kovtun showered, he might have washed away any trace. They also noted that the plane had been thoroughly cleaned since Kovtun traveled on it.

HAMBURG, Germany (AP) — Traces of the rare radioactive substance polonium-210 were found at a German apartment visited by a contact of fatally poisoned ex-spy Alexander Litvinenko — before the two men met in London, authorities said Sunday.

The polonium traces were found on a couch where Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun is believed to have slept at his ex-wife's Hamburg apartment the night before he headed to London for a meeting with Litvinenko last month, German investigators said.

Tests on traces of radiation at the apartment "clearly show that it is polonium-210," Gerald Kirchner of the Federal Radiation Protection agency said at a news conference.

Investigators said Kovtun flew to Hamburg from Moscow with Aeroflot on Oct. 28 and departed for London on Nov. 1. That is the day when Kovtun and at least one other Russian met with Litvinenko at London's Millennium Hotel — and when Litvinenko is believed to have fallen ill.

Traces of radiation also were found in the passenger seat of a car that picked Kovtun up from the Hamburg airport, on a document Kovtun brought to Hamburg immigration authorities and at the home of Kovtun's ex-mother-in-law outside Hamburg — all from before the Nov. 1 meeting.

German prosecutors did not say whether they suspect Kovtun might have been involved in Litvinenko's death. But they said they were investigating him on suspicion he may have improperly handled radioactive material.

"At this stage of the investigation, we have sufficient initial cause to believe that he brought the polonium traces to Hamburg outside his body, or that these traces are the result of contact with polonium-210," prosecutor Martin Koehnke said.

Officials said that any connection between Kovtun and Litvinenko's death would have to be investigated by British police. British police are treating his death as a murder.

"We still believe that both variants are possible: that he may be a victim, but also that he may have been involved, at least in procuring the polonium," Koehnke said.

Litvinenko, an ex-Russian agent who was a fierce Kremlin critic, died Nov. 23 after blaming Russian President Vladimir Putin for the poisoning. The Kremlin has vehemently denied involvement.

Kovtun reportedly is being treated in Moscow for radiation poisoning. Russian authorities have opened a criminal investigation into his poisoning, calling it attempted murder.

Kirchner, the radiation agency official, said it was possible Kovtun could already have been poisoned when he arrived in Hamburg and left behind traces through body fluids such as sweat.

On Saturday, the German plane aboard which Kovtun flew from Hamburg to London tested negative for traces of polonium-210. Investigators raised the possibility that may be because the plane had been cleaned thoroughly.

A security officer for Moscow's Sheremetyevo airport said all Aeroflot planes, including the one which flew to Hamburg on Oct. 28, had been checked for radiation and tested negative. The officer spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to speak to the media.

Litvinenko met at the Millennium Hotel in London's Mayfair neighborhood with Kovtun and former Soviet agent Andrei Lugovoi. Another man, security firm head Vyacheslav Sokolenko, has said he was at the hotel but did not participate in the meeting.

Lugovoi has denied that the men were involved in the ex-spy's death.

Meanwhile, Litvinenko's widow said in interviews published Sunday that her late husband's criticism of the Kremlin had antagonized his former secret service colleagues, and contended that Putin had created an atmosphere that "makes it possible to kill a British person on British soil."

In her first interviews, Marina Litvinenko said she believed Russian authorities were behind the poisoning of her husband, who sought asylum in Britain in 2000 and obtained citizenship this year. Marina Litvinenko told Sky News in an English-language interview that her husband "openly went out from system and accused the system of killing people, of kidnap."

Marina Litvinenko has placed her faith in British investigators but said she does not intend to cooperate with Russian authorities, who plan to come to London to probe her husband's death.

"In Russia, it doesn't matter how many people are killed," she said, adding that the life of "only one person can still be very important in England."

Also on Sunday, Litvinenko's friend Alex Goldfarb accused Russian authorities of trying to obstruct the British probe by preventing Kovtun and Lugovoi from being questioned.

Lugovoi was supposed to testify after a team of Scotland Yard officers arrived in Moscow on Tuesday. But the interrogation has been postponed several times, although Lugovoi himself has said he is eager to answer questions.

"It's a clumsy effort to cover up the trace, to prevent British investigators from meeting with two key witnesses," Goldfarb told The Associated Press.

He added that Lugovoi and Kovtun could be in danger as the authorities "could try to remove them later."

"Another crime is unfolding before our eyes — the removal of two key witnesses: Lugovoi and Kovtun," he told the AP.

Lugovoi, who is being checked in Russia for radioactive poisoning, said Sunday his condition was "stable" and results of his medical checks would be available by the end of the week.

Lugovoi said Kovtun also was in a "satisfactory" condition. "He's not in a coma," Lugovoi told the RIA Novosti, denying a report by the Interfax news agency on Thursday.

The Spy Who Knew Too Much (TIME)

By J.f.o Mcallister

Time, December 11, 2006

Alexander Litvinenko was buried as he had lived, in a storm. There was rain, hail and a tornado near Highgate Cemetery in north London on the day his lead-lined coffin was lowered into a plot a few yards from that of another dissident who had sought refuge in Britain, Karl Marx. Before the burial, there was a memorial service at a mosque. Several close friends said Litvinenko had converted to Islam a few days before he died, in a kind of atonement for atrocities Russia (and perhaps Litvinenko himself) had committed in Chechnya, although another doubted any conversion had taken place. Litvinenko's widow Marina had requested a nondenominational service at the graveside, but an imam interrupted the proceedings to perform Islamic rites. Litvinenko, a former Moscow anticorruption detective turned furious critic of the Russian government, had a talent for controversy.

The dead man in the Highgate Cemetery started feeling ill on Nov. 1. The London doctors who attended Litvinenko's bedside quickly suspected that some kind of radioactive agent was causing his decline. His hair was falling out, his athlete's body was shriveling, his bone marrow was failing, just as if he had been one of the firemen called to the burning reactor at Chernobyl. But gamma spectrometers found nothing unusual in his blood or urine. As doctors ruled out a slew of increasingly obscure toxins and bugs, the patient's condition worsened. In desperation, the police sent his urine to Britain's Atomic Weapons Establishment, which has equipment beyond the reach of any hospital. There, experts discovered Litvinenko's urine was teeming with radiation--not the gamma rays they had been looking for, which are the usual culprits in radiation poisoning because they can penetrate steel and concrete, but alpha particles, which can be blocked by a single sheet of paper or a layer of human skin. If they get into your bloodstream, though, alpha particles will destroy everything they touch. The Chernobyl occurs inside. This is not a nice way to die.

It was Litvinenko's fate. On Nov. 23, a few hours after the scientists isolated what was causing his body to disintegrate, he succumbed. His was not the quiet, inexplicable demise that a poisoner usually seeks. Instead, those alpha particles, which were shown to come from the rare isotope polonium 210, opened a box of mysteries that have grabbed the world's attention for weeks and turned a gruesome death into the center of a global manhunt and a potential row between Russia and the rest of the world.

The victim had no doubt where the search for his killer would lead: on his deathbed, he said his death had been ordered by Vladimir Putin, the President of Russia. Russian officials have denied that as a malicious provocation. Not surprisingly, Britain is being punctilious about amassing sufficient evidence before it points a finger in any direction. But if some shadowy figures close to the Kremlin turn out to be responsible for Litvinenko's death, it would be the most astonishing indictment of just how ruthless the modern Russian state can be.

All that, as yet, remains unproved. Meanwhile, a slew of whodunit theories are jostling for prominence. Following an autopsy that spurred the police to treat Litvinenko's death as a murder, Scotland Yard antiterrorism officers have been combing sites all over London, while colleagues traveled to Moscow. "This continues to be an extremely complex investigation, and detectives are pursuing many lines of inquiry," said a police spokeswoman. Litvinenko's excruciating and sinister death and the swirl of international politics around it make this a case worthy of John le CarrÃ©, but as the police insist, the classic questions of any murder inquiry still apply: Scotland Yard, in short, is looking for motive, means and opportunity.

Who had a motive?

WHY WOULD ANYONE WANT ALEXANDER Litvinenko dead? To answer that question, investigators are having to immerse themselves in the intrigues of postcommunist Russia and their echoes in London, the favored home away from home for Russian exiles, where Litvinenko sought asylum in 2001. (He became a British citizen two months ago.)

Litvinenko had spent the 1990s as an officer in the Ã©lite organized crime unit of the Federal Security Service (FSB), which was tasked with penetrating organized-crime gangs in the murky post-Soviet world of big money and official corruption. Like anyone else who touched that cesspit, he had collected some powerful enemies--and at least one ally. That was Boris Berezovsky, one of Russia's first billionaires, who made his money in cars and oil partly by using his excellent connections with Boris Yeltsin to buy state assets for much less than they turned out to be worth. In 1994, as his Mercedes was pulling out of his headquarters, a huge car bomb decapitated Berezovsky's chauffeur but left Berezovsky unharmed. Litvinenko was assigned to the case, and over time the two men became friendly. In 1995 hit men gunned down Vladislav Listyev, a popular TV personality who also ran Berezovsky's ORT-TV network. Officers from a rival organized-crime squad came to Berezovsky's headquarters to arrest him and search for documents. But in the doorway, with his pistol drawn, Litvinenko held off eight of them armed with Kalashnikovs, while Berezovsky furiously phoned allies at the Kremlin. Berezovsky said he and Litvinenko became "like brothers" that night.

other disgruntled FSB officers. Some wore ski masks, but Litvinenko, his face uncovered, calmly stated that bosses at the FSB were using the organization "for their private ends to liquidate those who bothered them" and line their own pockets.

Was Litvinenko telling the truth, and if so, was that his sole motivation for grabbing the limelight? Later, two of the officers in the episode claimed the stunt was bought and paid for by Berezovsky, which probably only heightened the rage of the man who had become the FSB's chief--Vladimir Putin. To Putin, a former KGB officer, what Litvinenko had done "was a major act of treason," says former KGB Major General Oleg Kalugin, now an exile in the U.S. after having written about Russia's tilt toward authoritarianism. In his book The Lubyanka Gang, Litvinenko, for his part, said he had gone to Putin before the press conference with proof showing which top FSB officers and high state officials were corrupt. Putin, he wrote, promised to take action--but had Litvinenko tailed instead and hired some of those accused of corruption to work for him. FSB officers arrested Litvinenko on corruption charges in 1999, and he was jailed for eight months. At trial, he was acquitted, then rearrested and jailed for an additional seven months on the same charges (which were quashed), then arrested again. He was eventually released on the condition that he did not leave Moscow.

Litvinenko broke that promise. With Putin having succeeded Yeltsin as President, Litvinenko and his family fled to London in October 2000--shortly after Berezovsky, who was later charged in Russia with fraud, had left for Britain. Litvinenko went to work for the billionaire and lived in a house owned by him. Both agitated against Putin, Berezovsky by financing human-rights and opposition groups and Litvinenko by producing two books furiously critical of the new President. Litvinenko, it is fair to say, didn't like Putin. Last summer he claimed in a letter posted on the Internet that the President was a habitual pedophile. Litvinenko also contended that Putin had been on the take from Mafia groups for years and that to advance his presidential ambitions, he had directed FSB officers to blow up apartment buildings in Moscow in 1999, killing more than 300 people--then pinning the outrage on Chechen rebels. (Putin has vehemently denied any involvement; Russian courts found a group of Chechens guilty of the crimes.) Litvinenko helped make a French film about the apartment bombings and was contributing to a documentary being made in London when he was murdered. This fall Litvinenko had been on the trail of the murderer of Anna Politkovskaya, a persistent critic of Putin's war in Chechnya and human-rights abuses in Russia. Politkovskaya was killed in the doorway of her Moscow apartment in October. Litvinenko was sure the order had come from the Kremlin.

Putin, says Alexei Kondaurov, a former KGB general who is now a maverick Duma deputy, is known for keeping score and for a long memory. So the idea that he would want an infuriating gadfly like Litvinenko to disappear is not beyond reason. But the President's defenders scoff at the idea that he might have been involved in Litvinenko's death. Putin, they say, had no need to get rid of Litvinenko; the exile was an irrelevant crank. Milton Bearden, a former CIA spy in Moscow, as well as other experienced intelligence hands, agrees it would be nuts for Putin--who has had good relations with British Prime Minister Tony Blair--to order an assassination on British soil of a British citizen who was no more than a pest. Says Bearden: "Take a deep breath and take a look at Putin and say, 'Is he stupid or insane?'"

If not Putin, who might want Litvinenko dead? Plenty. Russian Mafia bosses whose networks he was still prying into, for example, or rogue FSB officers who had been paid to rub him out by those who wanted to hurt Berezovsky. Perhaps the culprit was someone who wanted to frame Putin, or a member of the many factions maneuvering to succeed him when his term expires in 2008. One particularly dark theory making the rounds in Moscow was that Litvinenko organized his own death in a bizarre politically motivated suicide. Julia Svetlichnaja, a Russian postgraduate student who met with Litvinenko several times over the past year, last week described an erratic man who said he was going to blackmail at least one famous Russian oligarch with the many secrets he was collecting--or sell them to newspapers. Yegor Gaidar, a Prime Minister in the early 1990s and now an occasional critic of Putin's, came to the President's assistance last week when describing how he had fallen violently ill from an apparent poisoning in Dublin on the day Litvinenko died. Writing in the Financial Times, Gaidar concluded "that some obvious or hidden adversaries of the Russian authorities stand behind the scenes of this event, those who are interested in further radical deterioration of relations between Russia and the West." His implication was that those same or similar adversaries killed Litvinenko.

Who had the means?

THE POLICE ARE TAKING ALL SUCH CLAIMS with a grain of salt--and turning their attention, rather, to the grains of polonium 210 that are at the center of the case. This is no garden-variety poison: polonium needs a nuclear reactor to cook it up and extremely careful handling. At first, the discovery of the element seemed to hang responsibility on the Kremlin. Russia is a big producer of polonium (although its annual output, less than a hundred grams a year, shows just how rare it is). The element is hard to procure. In the U.S., it takes a government license to buy more than minute quantities, and according to the website of United Nuclear, which sells isotopes for use in research labs, it would take about $1 million, 15,000 purchases of the largest unlicensed amount and some fancy lab work to scrape together a lethal dose. (The British Health Protection Agency says the dose that killed Litvinenko was at least 10 times as high as that needed to kill.)

Polonium 210 has some prosaic applications; it is used, for example, in antistatic devices found in photo shops and fabric mills. It would be very difficult, but for less than $1,000, just a few such gizmos could theoretically be disassembled and the contents reworked in a laboratory to produce a lethal dose. To be usable as a poison, Michael Clark, a spokesman for Britain's Health Protection Agency, said last week, the polonium would then have to be mixed in solution, probably with a gelling agent. "If it was some sort of liquid, it could have been--as in James Bond--a little magic capsule," Clark said. All this implies considerable sophistication and resources. A rich, ambitious criminal syndicate might have been able to pull it off; nevertheless, normally it is governments that work on this scale. And obscure poisons have long been a specialty of Russia's secret police, going back to a "toxicological office" that reported to Lenin personally. In the past, the Russians were known to have developed a gun delivering a burst of cyanide gas causing death easy to misidentify as a heart attack, and tiny pellets smeared with the poison ricin, which has no antidote.

In retrospect, it would have been a lot less trouble for someone to push Litvinenko under a bus than to feed him polonium. But it's likely his poisoners did not anticipate the brouhaha his death would cause. "I believe this was a botched operation," says Litvinenko's friend Alexander Goldfarb, who helped him escape from Russia and runs the Berezovsky-funded International Foundation for Civil Liberties in New York City. Without the intervention of Britain's nuclear-bomb lab, the cause of death would have remained shrouded. Boris Zhuykov, chief of the radioisotope laboratory at the Nuclear Research Institute of the Russian Academy of Sciences, says the discovery that polonium was the cause was "an act of scientific heroism. The murderers obviously did not expect that the polonium would be found. They failed because of the excellence of the English gamma spectrometer and the persistence of the research." (Zhuykov says that when he was making these points to Moscow's pro-government NTV network last week, the interview was terminated.)

Who had the opportunity?

SCOTLAND YARD HAS HAD ONE BIG BREAK IN the case: polonium, once released, is like a persistent, invisible dye that marks whatever it touches. Someone who ingests even small amounts will leave an unmistakable trail through sweat and even fingerprints. London's gumshoes have spent the past two weeks following such spores all over town--and beyond.

Litvinenko got sick the evening of Nov. 1, when alpha particles were destroying the lining of his gut. As he began to suspect poison, he focused on two meetings he had earlier that day. One was at a sushi bar in central London with Mario Scaramella, 36, an Italian lawyer and, like Litvinenko, a man drawn to the world of secret information and conspiracy theories. The second meeting was in the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel, near the U.S. embassy, with a group of Russian businessmen with whom Litvinenko was apparently hatching business ventures in Britain. "Alexander said both [meetings] were suspicious, and one was probably innocent," says Goldfarb.

For a time, attention focused on Scaramella, but by the end of last week his level of poisoning and other evidence exculpated him of any suspicion. Instead, the trail of polonium was entangling the group of Russians at the Pine Bar. All seven bartenders on duty that day tested positive for the substance, at levels approaching those found in members of Litvinenko's family, implying they had inhaled it soon after its release--possibly from the vapor given off by a drink into which it had been slipped. The Russians who met Litvinenko in the bar included Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB bodyguard who had met Litvinenko in the 1990s when serving as Berezovsky's security chief at ORT; Dmitry Kovtun, a former Soviet army officer who has lived in Germany for many years and has known Lugovoy since they were 12; and Vyacheslav Sokolenko, a graduate of the same military school as Lugovoy and Kovtun. Sokolenko says he had never met Litvinenko before their brief encounter in London, and that his only interest that day was to attend a soccer match and do some sightseeing. Both Lugovoy and Kovtun have polonium in their bodies, and so far the main focus is on them; both men (and Sokolenko) deny any wrongdoing.

When Lugovoy learned that British authorities were investigating Litvinenko's poisoning, he volunteered for an interview at the British embassy in Moscow. Polonium was later found in the embassy room, and in lots of other places Lugovoy had visited: on planes he had flown between Moscow and London in October; in five rooms at the Sheraton Park Lane hotel, where he had stayed; and in a fourth-floor room at the Millennium Hotel he is said to have used on the day Litvinenko was poisoned. Finding polonium in a hotel Lugovoy had used on a previous trip to London prompted British authorities to wonder if there might have been an earlier, failed murder attempt. A senior British security official thought the sprawl of radioactive markers throughout London and beyond implied an amateur operation, not up to the FSB's usual standard. But another official disagreed. "This is such an extraordinary material to be using as a weapon," he said, "I'm not sure if any standard operating procedures would exist for handling it." Lugovoy's explanation for the traces that seem to track his progress around London was straightforward. "Someone is trying to set me up," he said to the Moskovsky Komsomolets newspaper. "But I can't understand who. Or why."

Nine Scotland Yard detectives were in Moscow last week, trying to talk to Lugovoy. But the interview kept getting postponed for "technical reasons." Cooperation between the Londoners and the Russian authorities has been frosty. Russian prosecutors insisted that they conduct all the interviews, with the British merely suggesting questions. Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika said no Russian citizens would ever be extradited to Britain in connection with the case, while his office suggested that Russia would open its own criminal investigation in London. Lugovoy and Kovtun were said to be in the hospital with radiation poisoning, but there was no independent confirmation of that. After his interview with the British detectives, Kovtun was reported by the usually reliable Interfax news agency to have lapsed into a coma, but his lawyer quickly denied it. Hamburg police found alpha radiation in the apartment of Kovtun's ex-wife and in the home of his ex-mother-in-law, but were not able to say whether the source was polonium 210. For their part, British officials were hoping further tests might let them pinpoint the origins of the polonium, since reactors usually leave signatures in their output. The forensic trail so far points decisively to Russia. But Scotland Yard knows that pursuing Litvinenko's murder back to those who set it in motion, whether official, private or some combination of the two, may never be possible unless someone confesses.

Meanwhile, there is the light--uncomfortably glaring--that the case sheds on modern Russia. Vladimir Ryzhkov, one of the few independent liberals left in the Duma, says, "The point is not whether Putin is responsible for these concrete murders. The point is that he is responsible for having created a system that is ruled by fear and violence." Ryzhkov claims that the armed forces, Interior Ministry, FSB and those who have retired from them to join private security services "are running this country, own its economy and use violence and murder as habitual management techniques." A U.S. businessman in Moscow seconds the argument. "While you in the press are obsessed by Politkovskaya and Litvinenko, you've missed that half a dozen major oil executives and another half-dozen major bankers have been murdered in the last few months." Unlike Litvinenko's sickness, Russia's may not be fatal. But like his, it starts from inside. From his lead-lined coffin, a shadowy figure has illuminated that much.

EU Looks Likely To Partially Halt Talks With Turkey (WSJ)

By William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

European foreign ministers will meet today in Brussels to consider a last-ditch Turkish proposal to end a deadlock over Cyprus that threatens Turkey's membership talks with the European Union.

EU ambassadors couldn't reach a decision last week, and diplomats in Turkey's capital, Ankara, expect foreign ministers to fail, pushing the issue to EU heads of state who meet Dec. 15 and 16 in Brussels.

After an anguishing debate, diplomats expect the EU to decide to suspend parts of Turkey's membership negotiations. Pessimists fear the partial pause will evolve into a more permanent freeze, turning Turkey toward nationalism and away from the West. Optimists cling to the hope that the rupture won't be complete and European leaders will leave the door open to resume talks later.

The stakes may be high in either cementing a major Islamic country into the West or seeing failure exacerbate the clash of civilizations.

The proximate cause of the conflict is the divided island of Cyprus. After Greek Cypriots took control in 1974, the Turkish army invaded and occupied the northern half, where they have stayed ever since. Greek Cypriots rejected a United Nations-brokered deal to unify the island in 2004, while Turkish Cypriots approved it. The Greek part of the island entered the EU anyhow.

As part of their entry negotiations, the EU gave the Turks until this year's end to open their ports and airports to traffic from Cyprus. The Turks refused, saying the EU should at the same time end the commercial isolation of northern Cyprus, a prospect vetoed by Greek Cypriots. Turkey last week offered to unilaterally allow Cyprus traffic into one port and one airport for a year in return for the "expectation" the EU would reciprocate later on northern Cyprus.

The last-minute Turkish offer remains insufficient, EU officials say, and Turkish diplomats themselves are resigned to its rejection. Cyprus has vetoed the proposal outright and is pushing for a hard punishment. Given the island's small importance -- its total population is less than one million -- the Turks suspect ulterior motives. Greece, France, Germany, the Netherlands and Austria -- who are wary of the prospect of allowing 70 million Muslim Turks into what has been a Christian club -- are likely to "hide behind Cyprus," said Murat Mercan, head of the Turkish Parliament's EU Committee.

The European Commission is proposing freezing eight of the 35 "chapters" in Turkey's membership talks and saying no new chapters could be closed until the Cyprus issue is settled. A final decision to freeze fewer chapters would be "psychologically" important, helping the Turkish government sell further concessions to its citizens and continue the adoption of EU-inspired changes such as press and religious freedoms, says Kaya Turkmen, director general for European Union Affairs in the Turkish Foreign Ministry.

Another crucial issue is the possibility of a "rendezvous" clause calling for a review in 18 months or so. So far, the clause remains in the package being considered by foreign ministers. This deadline, if missed, could lead to a "complete break in talks," Mr. Turkmen said.

With Or Without EU, Turkey Is Rising (CSM)

By Yigal Schleifer

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

ISTANBUL, TURKEY

Like a game of high-stakes chicken set on the global stage, Turkey and the European Union have been locked in a tense standoff ahead of this week's deadline for Turkey to open its ports to Cypriot vessels or face consequences.

In a last-minute bid Thursday, the Muslim country looking to join the EU offered to provisionally open one port and one airport. But Brussels has deemed the concession insufficient and EU leaders appear likely to decide at a summit later this week to partially suspend talks on Turkey's membership.

As EU foreign ministers meet Monday to discuss the issue, some observers - particularly in Europe - see Turkey's stance as self-defeating obstinancy. But others say it is in fact fueled by a greater sense of self-confidence, the result of a surging economy and an increased sense of its own growing strategic importance, which may dampen the effects of any rupture with the EU.

"For the first time in my career I am seeing a Turkey that is quite calm and confident of itself," says Kemal Kirisci, director of the European Studies Institute at Istanbul's Bogazici University. "There is an element of confidence that is beginning to permeate the Turkish economy, and a bit of politics as well, and I see this confidence starting to permeate the Turkish foreign ministry. This is very healthy for Turkey and for the European Union."

Economically, Turkey has never been more part of Europe. Some of Europe's most venerable brands, from Bosch to Fiat and Renault, are today being manufactured in Turkey, which has grown to become the largest exporter of televisions to Europe.

But the continent's interests in Turkey may lie beyond the marketplace, experts say. With its strategic location between Europe and Asia, Turkey can act as a key conduit for delivering important goods to Europe, from Central Asian oil and natural gas to greater political influence in the Middle East. In addition, Turkey's young population could ultimately boost the productivity of a graying European population.

Mired in a deep financial crisis only a few years ago, Turkey's economy has been growing at a rate of some 7 percent for the last three years, while its formerly triple-digit inflation has been tamed to a manageable 10 percent. If it were to join the EU right now, Turkey would be the sixth-largest economy in the 25-member organization.

"Both in finance and trade, Turkey is already a big part of Europe," says Murat Yucer, an economic analyst in Istanbul. "Turkey is a big market. Ultimately, it's a solid growth story."

All of this has been attracting an increasing number of European investors, despite tensions between EU countries and Turkey.

Analysts point out that during a recent political crisis between Turkey and France over the French lower house of parliament's approval of a bill that would make it a crime to deny that the mass killings of Armenians by the Ottomans were a genocide, French businessmen worked hard to distance themselves from the legislators' actions.

"[European business leaders] see Turkey as a very interesting and growing market that has a lot of opportunities," says Felix Howald, Europe director for the World Economic Forum (WEF), a Geneva-based organization that brings together leaders from business and politics.

A WEF report issued ahead of a recent high-level summit in Istanbul stated: "Turkey is perceived by many as a source of risk to Europe; it may be just the opposite, a potential source of major risk mitigation."

"Europe needs to look at Turkey in the context of the wider global risks facing it in the future."

Reacting to the possibility of the EU negotiations being partially frozen and of Turkey being forced to abandon the negotiating table, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said Europe would be making a "dreadful mistake."

"Europe, not Turkey, would stand to lose," he said this week, adding that Turkey would still continue to pursue its membership goal, although it has a Plan B and C.

Mr. Erdogan didn't specify what those other plans are, but observers in Turkey believe Ankara can't afford to cast aside its engagement with Europe, no matter how rocky the relations.

Hugh Pope, an independent analyst based in Istanbul, says that even Turkey's growing involvement in the Middle East - often seen as laying the groundwork for an EU alternative - is predicated on the perception that predominantly Muslim Turkey is on the path to joining the European big leagues.

"The relationship is really important for Turkey's power. Even if it's not going anywhere, it needs to be seen as going somewhere," says Mr. Pope. "Turkey has always got to maintain the illusion that the European process is in motion. It will never repudiate Europe."

But Bahar Rumelili, an expert on Turkey-EU relations at Istanbul's Koc University, says the negotiations are as important for Brussels' image.

"For the EU, a healthy relationship with Turkey conveys the image of the EU as an inclusive organization and an international actor that is able to promote change and reform," she says. "There is a growing realization from the European side that to alienate Turkey would be a big mistake. It would damage a major part of the EU's image as an international actor."

The forces of public opinion and political expediency might still get in the way, however, with European politicians certainly giving the impression that they are happy to alienate Turkey.

French conservative presidential hopeful Nicholas Sarkozy kicked off his candidacy by declaring that "Turkey's place is not in the EU." German chancellor Angela Merkel has also made clear her desire to deny Turkey full membership. In that sense, some say a cooling-off period between Turkey and the EU might be a positive thing, particularly with public opinion in some European countries decidedly against Turkey's membership.

"I think a pause is absolutely vital at this moment because the European public is up in arms," says Pope.

"I think that Europe has to catch up with itself."

Complete The Mission (WSJ)

By Miomir Zuzul

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

ZAGREB, Croatia -- The search for peace and democratic reform in the Middle East is NATO's most important challenge, as last month's Riga summit affirmed. But this focus on security and reform outside Europe threatens to sideline NATO's core responsibility to act within Europe. Along with deterring the Soviet Union until its collapse, the Alliance contributed to the economic growth and democratization of postwar Western Europe. This record of success makes it imperative that NATO's doors remain open to new European members hoping to make a similar journey from the days of dictatorship, discord and privation to democracy, peace and prosperity.

These potential new members can be found in Southeast Europe, a region that only too recently has been plagued by war and ethnic tensions. Some steps toward bringing these countries in were taken at the Riga Summit. Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Serbia were invited to join the Partnership for Peace (PFP) program, which the Alliance has successfully used to groom prospective members. U.S. President George W. Bush affirmed that a key foreign-policy goal is to bring Croatia, Albania and Macedonia into NATO in 2008. The Riga Summit Declaration reaffirmed the Alliance's intent at the next summit in 2008 "to extend further (membership) invitations to those countries that meet NATO's performance based standards and are able to contribute to Euro-Atlantic security and stability."

While these are steps in the right direction, NATO must bring the process promptly to its logical conclusion by offering these countries full membership. Decisive and bold leadership, both by the U.S. and key European countries, is more necessary than ever since, unfortunately, some NATO members are experiencing expansion fatigue. They are threatening to stop or pause the process of integrating Southeast Europe into the Alliance's unique security architecture.

This cannot be allowed to happen. NATO was established with the goal of stabilizing Europe. Yet, a key portion of the European geopolitical space -- the Balkans -- remains unsettled. Radicals in Serbia are once again threatening to erode the budding democracy in Belgrade; Kosovo remains unresolved; and even 10 years after the Dayton accords, Bosnia and Herzegovina remain unable to function without international assistance. The best, the only, way to stabilize what otherwise might become Europe's ghetto is the region's gradual integration into NATO. This is exactly the same bold strategy that led to the transformation of postwar Western Europe and post-Cold War Eastern Europe.

The optimal way to begin this transition is through Croatia's membership in NATO. Croatia is the region's leader in terms of economic and democratic stability and is well on its way to meeting the criteria for European Union membership. President Bush also acknowledged that Croatia is presently the only truly stable pro-NATO democratic ally in the region. Croatia's membership in the Alliance would serve as the bridge to the rest of the region and encourage democratic reforms throughout the Balkans.

While NATO must certainly continue to look outward and give due importance to its tasks in the Middle East, it must not forget its founding mission of stabilizing Europe. Today, this mission remains incomplete. As in Central Europe in the 1990s, when those countries marked their return to the European family by joining the Alliance well ahead of the EU, NATO has another opportunity to move faster and exhibit greater vision than the Union in the Balkans.

Mr. Zuzul was Croatia's foreign minister between 2003 and 2005. He is currently a member of parliament in Croatia.

TERRORISM NEWS:

The Threat From Within (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

It is chilling that the Baker-Hamilton report came on the eve of Pearl Harbor's anniversary. In 1941, clashes every day in the Atlantic Ocean made us more focused on the imminence of war with Germany than with Japan. Today all eyes are on Iraq. It's called the center of the war on terrorism, but it must not monopolize our attention. We need a third eye because we are now less likely to be attacked by international terrorists than by homegrown American citizens, self-radicalized individuals who are members of groups inspired by al Qaeda propaganda.

This is a profoundly demoralizing thought, given the long tradition of success our nation has enjoyed in infusing newcomers with the American ideal. Britain, taking a different course, was proud to have created a multicultural society. But apparently well-adapted young Muslims who were born in Britain exploded the subway bombs of July 2005. Now the head of Britain's domestic intelligence agency, Eliza Manningham-Buller, has come out with a grave warning. Not so long ago it was an offense for anyone even to mention the name of the head of MI-5. (The box office hit, Casino Royale, has it right: 007's boss, Judi Dench, is a distinctly anonymous figure). So the fact that the MI-5 director has stepped out of the shadows is significant in itself. And what she says is that there are many more British Muslims who back the terrorists. MI-5 has stopped five plots to date. We know of the one to blow up 10 planes over the Atlantic, but MI-5 is monitoring 1,600 other suspects, mostly homegrown Islamic terrorists who get their training in murder and mayhem on the Internet. In Germany, too, only an alert train conductor prevented the detonation of propane and gasoline bombs that would have horribly burned and killed hundreds of commuters.

A new training ground. Interviews with the heads of counterterrorism and local police officials in the United States yield similar assessments. The threat is from second- and third-generation children of immigrants, fluent in English and accustomed to American society but using the legal rights of U.S. citizenship to rebel from within. They have learned the Koran on the Internet; they lead small clusters of 20 to 25 mostly young men who share feelings of alienation, a longing for self-importance, a need to be a part of some larger group or cause. They have developed what is called "adversarial assimilation."

The Internet has replaced Afghanistan as a training ground. It is effectively the university of jihadist studies, where hundreds of Muslims from all corners of the world can study the rules of jihad, while they live in it anonymously. Here they learn to fire a shoulder-held antiaircraft missile; to prepare explosives and make bombs out of batteries and improvise hand-thrown charges to hit vehicles; to seek a position on a crowded bus to achieve maximum casualties; to plan kidnappings; and to concoct botulism toxin.

Marc Sageman, who collected the life histories of 400 would-be jihadists, found that most were well-to-do, with two thirds having some college education and only 27 percent characterized as lower class. Some 70 percent joined the ranks of the global jihadists while away from home. Separated from the traditional bonds of family and culture, they drifted to the mosques more for companionship than for religion, but there they found extremists who appeared to offer a compelling, all-encompassing explanation for their feelings of anomie and lack of self-worth.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Imams Seek To Settle With Airline (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, December 11, 2006

A group of Muslim imams is seeking an out-of-court settlement with US Airways, saying they should not have been removed from a Minnesota-to-Phoenix flight last month and were not behaving suspiciously.

Five of the six Islamic religious leaders have retained the Council on American-Islamic Relations for legal representation and are seeking a "mutually agreeable" resolution, said Nihad Awad, CAIR executive director.

US Airways scheduled a meeting with the imams on Dec. 4 to discuss the incident, but the men canceled it and hired the activist group to act as legal counsel.

"With the hopes of reaching an amicable resolution to this matter, we would like to take this opportunity to ask for a formal meeting with US Airways executives and legal counsel," said Arsalan Iftikhar, CAIR's national legal director, in a letter to the airline.

The imams represented by CAIR include Omar Shahin, Didmar Faja, Ahmad Shqeirat, Marwan Sadeddin and Mohamed Ibrahim.

Mahmoud Sulaiman of New Mexico is the only imam not included as a plaintiff.

Mr. Sulaiman is the passenger who asked another passenger to switch seats with him to accommodate a blind imam and was one of three imams who asked for a seat-belt extension even though the police report cites his weight at 170 pounds.

The Washington Times first reported on Nov. 28 that the imams were not in their assigned seats, but seated in a formation similar to the September 11 hijackers and controlled the exits to the plane. The men also requested seat-belt extensions but did not appear to need them, and engaged in conversations critical of the United States, according to police reports and eyewitness statements.

The imams and CAIR officials maintain that press reports as well as Internet sites and blogs have circulated charges they say misrepresent the facts of the Nov. 20 incident.

"Unfortunately, the false claims and smears used against these religious leaders only serve to cloud the real issue involved, that of how national security can be maintained while preserving constitutionally protected freedoms and respect for religious diversity," said Mr. Awad.

CAIR says the men were handcuffed for several hours and is also demanding hearings on religious and ethnic profiling at airports.

Mr. Shahin told The Washington Times he was only handcuffed for "10 or 15 minutes" and that the imams were not led off the plane in handcuffs.

Federal air marshals and pilots called the imams' actions a probe of airport security as well as a probe of the politically correct mentality of air passengers.

The Washington Times reported in 2004 that flight crews and passengers were experiencing a number of terrorist probes, most notably Northwest Airlines Flight 327 from Detroit to Los Angeles in June 2004, during which 14 Syrian men posing as musicians may have practiced a dry run.

Also in July 2004, a passenger from Syria was taken into custody at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport while carrying anti-American materials and a note suggesting he intended to commit suicide.

A pilot reported that he watched a man of Middle Eastern descent at the Minneapolis airport using binoculars to get airplane tail numbers and writing the numbers in a notebook to correspond with flight numbers.

An airline spokeswoman says they have received the request from CAIR for a meeting, as well as a meeting request from Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, Minnesota Democrat, the first Muslim elected to Congress, but no date has been set.

"As far as we are concerned, we are done, and we will continue to back the crew, but we do want to reach out to the passengers," said spokeswoman Andrea Rader.

Muslims held a pray-in recently at the Minneapolis airport and called for a prayer room to accommodate their rigorous prayer schedule.

"Actually, the topic of a prayer room never came up in our meeting," said airport spokesman Patrick Hogan. "They mentioned it to the press before the meeting."

The airport already has two areas where anyone of any faith can pray -- a privately operated Community Counseling Center operated by a minister who encourages people of all faiths to pray in his facility and another area on the mezzanine level.

"Our intent at present is simply to increase public awareness of those facilities through signage and other outreach activities," Mr. Hogan said.

"If over time we find we need more space to accommodate people's needs, we would consider looking at other alternatives. In any case, the space would be for people of all faiths -- or none, for that matter -- and not dedicated to the practice of a particular belief system," he said.

Will Real ID Cause Chaos At The DMV? (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

Back in May 2005, few really considered the broad implications of the Real ID Act, a bill designed to improve the security of driver's licenses in every state. Attached to an emergency funding measure for the Iraq war, Real ID slipped through Congress and was signed by the president-with little scrutiny but big effects. "The amount of congressional attention paid to something so game changing," says one Washington lobbyist, "was ... microscopic."

These days Real ID is hard to miss, and the nation's governors are up in arms over it. In less than two years, it will require states to begin issuing upgraded driver's licenses to roughly 245 million Americans. Although most governors say they'd like to improve identification security, many say the Real ID Act creates a multibillion-dollar unfunded mandate and deadlines that are impossible to meet. It may also mean longer lines at Department of Motor Vehicles offices nationwide and new costs for consumers. Governors like Mike Huckabee of Arkansas hope the new Congress "will throw us a lifeline" and make changes to Real ID. Whether that's necessary is the subject of debate. But if changes aren't made, Washington is in for a bipartisan revolt in the states.

There's little question driver's licenses could use some securing. In the current system, easily forged birth certificates or utility bills are often taken as proof of identity or residency. Jonathan Frankel of the Department of Homeland Security says that means there's "no guarantee ... the person holding the document bears a relationship to the name and identity on the license." The 9/11 commission found that the 19 hijackers secured 13 driver's licenses, seven of them by falsely claiming that they lived in Virginia.

Real ID aimed to fix that. By May 11, 2008, all licenses must be machine readable, meaning any law enforcement officer will be able to, say, scan your license's bar code and make sure the digital information matches what's on the front; that will make tampering more difficult. DMVs will also have to verify identity documents like birth certificates or baptismal records. In most cases, images of those documents will be scanned into computers, where they must be held for up to 10 years. States must share, at minimum, the information printed on the license to prevent fraud. Residents of states that don't comply will no longer be able to use their license for federal purposes like boarding an airplane.

Obstacles. But states are questioning whether Real ID is feasible. Many DMVs haven't started needed upgrades because they're still waiting for detailed DHS guidance on how to proceed. Meanwhile, a report released in September by the National Governors Association and other groups estimated that Real ID, which would require more DMV employees and the purchase of new technology, could cost states over $11 billion in five years. The report also said the time it takes for a consumer to renew a license would more than double. In many cases, conveniences like renewing by mail will be abolished. DHS disputes claims about longer lines and is working on a new cost estimate. Still, "if this bill really goes forward," says Jim Harper of the Cato Institute, "I think you'll see many red-blooded Americans leaping over DMV counters in sheer rage."

Huckabee says governors are already "universal" in their rage. Places as varied as New Hampshire, Washington, and Kentucky have considered bills that would prohibit participation in the effort or at least urge Real ID's repeal. Also controversial: special Real ID licensing rules for certain legal immigrants. Illegal immigrants can't have a Real ID license at all.

All that anger falls to a new Congress, which must sort out what, if anything, to do. The September report called for extending the deadline and handing more dough to states. Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi opposed Real ID when it first came up in early 2005, but Democrats, eager to "get tough" on security, "haven't committed to much of anything yet," says David Quam of the governors association. In coming weeks, though, they may have to take a stand. Sitting on the fence on Real ID looks like a license for trouble.

Katrina Begets A Baby Boom By Immigrants (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — First came the storm. Then came the workers. Now comes the baby boom.

In the latest twist to the demographic transformation of New Orleans since it was swamped by Hurricane Katrina last year, hundreds of babies are being born to Latino immigrant workers, both legal and illegal, who flocked to the city to toil on its reconstruction.

The throng of babies gurgling in the handful of operational maternity wards here has come as a big surprise — and a financial strain — to this historically black and white city, which before the hurricane had only a small Latino community and virtually no experience of illegal immigration.

“Of all the myriad things that have changed after Katrina, this wasn’t high on anybody’s priority list,” said Dr. Mark Peters, chief executive of East Jefferson General Hospital in Metairie.

Because many immigrant mothers cannot afford to pay for prenatal care or delivery services, New Orleans’s newest citizens are adding an unexpected load to the decimated health infrastructure in a city abandoned by many of its doctors. Much of the state-financed Charity Hospital system, which before Hurricane Katrina provided the bulk of care to New Orleans’s uninsured and indigent population, remains closed.

Lacking health insurance and barred from most government assistance, expectant immigrant mothers can go to only the handful of charitable clinics that are still operating and that do not question a woman’s immigration status when offering low-cost prenatal care.

"Prenatal care is our daily nightmare," said Shaula Lovera, the program coordinator for the Latino Health Access Network, an outreach service operated by Catholic Charities.

The two health units providing prenatal care run by the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals saw more than 1,200 pregnant women from January to mid-November. Virtually all were Latino immigrants.

"Before the storm, only 2 percent were Hispanic; now about 96 percent are Hispanic," said Beth Perriloux, the head nurse in the department's health unit in Metairie.

There are so many pregnant women that the clinics have reached capacity. Dr. Erin Brewer, the department's medical director, said, "We've gone from having a maternity clinic two to three days a week to five days a week."

Many immigrant women are forgoing prenatal care and showing up, ready to deliver, in hospital emergency rooms, where they are required to be seen even if they are in the country illegally.

"When I felt the pains I just went to the women's and children's hospital," said Noemi, an illegal immigrant from Oaxaca, Mexico, who arrived in New Orleans right after the storm as part of a cleaning crew from North Carolina. She left the city but then returned in October, a month after giving birth to her daughter Alejandra in Lake Charles, 200 miles west.

"If they hadn't received me, my girl would have been born in the hall," Noemi said. (She asked that her last name be withheld to protect her identity.)

There has been a small Latino population in New Orleans for several decades, mostly Hondurans who came after Hurricane Mitch battered Central America in 1998. But that population has started to grow.

According to the Louisiana Health and Population Survey, released in November, the number of Latinos living in households in Orleans and Jefferson Parishes has increased by about 10,000 since 2004, to 60,000, even as the total population has fallen by about a quarter, to roughly 625,000.

Last summer, researchers at Tulane University estimated that there were 5,000 to 7,000 illegal Latino workers in Orleans Parish alone, excluding nonworking relatives. But some community workers estimate that tens of thousands have arrived since the storm.

Immigrants can be seen working on roofs, installing Sheetrock and laying tile all over town, from the up-market Lakeview neighborhood in the west to East New Orleans. At the Lowe's home improvement store in the city's Bywater neighborhood, clusters of day laborers mill about in the parking lot every morning, waiting for jobs.

Most are not new to the United States. They come from Texas, Florida or California, seeking construction work that can pay $150 a day. But there are some newcomers, including Sara Alvarado, a 26-year-old Honduran, who arrived in the United States in August after a monthlong odyssey through Mexico with her partner, Tony, 32.

When Ms. Alvarado finally got to New Orleans, brought into the country by coyotes, or smugglers, who charged $6,000, she was more than six months pregnant. The last time she had seen a doctor was four months before.

"The coyotes wanted to charge me more and bring me across in a car," Ms. Alvarado said, sitting in her cramped room in a shotgun shack in the Upper Ninth Ward that she and Tony share with four other people. "But I didn't take a single vitamin, and I came across that desert jumping fences and all that, and look, here is this boy."

She cradled a plump bundle: Jackson Antonio, an American citizen who came into the world at Tulane-Lakeside Hospital 12 days early on Oct. 17, the day the 300 millionth American was born.

At Tulane-Lakeside, doctors are delivering 215 to 240 babies a month, which is 60 percent to 70 percent more than before Hurricane Katrina, said André du Plessis, the hospital's chief operating officer.

Some of that increase is because of the lack of hospitals. But the numbers also reflect the new population. "Approximately 20 to 25 percent of the babies are Hispanic," Mr. du Plessis said. "Pre-Katrina, we largely didn't have a Hispanic population."

Dr. Kevin Work, an obstetrician who started a private practice a year before the hurricane, decided to focus almost exclusively on the Latino population when he saw the abundance of immigrant women at the maternity clinics run by the Department of Health and Hospitals, where he works two and a half days a week.

"The demographics of the health units used to be 85 percent African-American, who had Medicaid, and 15 percent other," Dr. Work said. "When the clinics reopened, I started seeing the faces changing. Now 85 to 90 percent are Hispanic undocumented, and only 10 to 15 percent have Medicaid."

Dr. Work has been offering a low-cost prenatal care package, charging about $800 for the full term of a pregnancy, a small fraction of the typical bill. He also runs advertisements on the two local Spanish-language radio stations.

The boomlet of Latino babies in New Orleans poses particular challenges. Nonemergency Medicaid is not available to illegal immigrants or even to legal immigrants who have been in the country less than five years. Virtually none of the immigrant mothers-to-be have private insurance. They are mostly poor. Many fear being deported.

Hospitals will deliver these women's babies only if they arrive in labor through the emergency room. There, emergency Medicaid pays for up to a 24-hour hospital stay for a vaginal delivery and a 48-hour stay for a Caesarean section, Dr. Work said.

Most of Dr. Work's patients do not speak English. At the Department of Health and Hospitals' unit in Metairie, where he sees patients Tuesday mornings, he relies on the "language line," a phone-based translation service. Sometimes women arrive with one of the Latina translators who prowl the clinics and charge the patients $60 per session.

Dr. Work said he delivered 50 to 70 babies a month, most born to Latino immigrants. He even delivered Jackson Antonio, though he could not remember doing so, the memory lost in a blur of births.

The new population is having a tough time in New Orleans. Jackson Antonio was required to stay 48 hours in the hospital. But Ms. Alvarado had to leave after 24. "If I stayed longer they would charge me," she said. She spent the next day looking for a car safety seat, which hospitals require to discharge new babies.

Health workers at Catholic Charities eventually found a car seat. They also gave her a crib, so her baby would not have to sleep on a mattress on the floor. Volunteers at Common Ground, a nonprofit assistance organization that opened a health clinic after the storm, have been trying to help Ms. Alvarado apply for assistance for her child.

Still, Ms. Alvarado's life is mostly an endless hustle at the limit of subsistence. She started Jackson Antonio straight off on baby formula because she expected to go to work as soon as she recovered from the delivery. But she cannot leave home, because there is nobody to care for the baby.

Her partner, Tony, who declined to provide his last name, spends most days waiting with the day laborers at a Shell gas station near their home. But with demand for workers slackening, he is having a hard time finding a job. Just before Thanksgiving he worked 10 hours on an apartment building, but the woman who hired him disappeared before paying him his promised $120.

Meanwhile, bills are piling up, starting with repayment of the $6,000 they borrowed to pay the coyotes' fee. They have repaid only about $1,300, Ms. Alvarado said. And they need $350 a month just for their share of rent and utilities.

Ms. Alvarado must also send money to Honduras for her two daughters, ages 7 and 9, who live with her mother. Tony has three daughters in Honduras, too, living with their mother.

Because Jackson Antonio is a United States citizen entitled to Medicaid, Ms. Alvarado gets a monthly ration of nine cans of baby formula, as well as powdered milk, canned juice, and eggs and cheese for her. But the staff at the food stamp office told her they were required to report any applicant who was an illegal immigrant to the authorities, so Ms. Alvarado did not apply.

She said she might return to Honduras because there was no point to staying if she could not work. "I came to make a future for my mother and my girls," she said.

But if she can work, she will probably stay. And the baby boom may even provide an opportunity. She said she might go into business taking care of the babies of other Latino mothers.

WAR NEWS:

No Rift With Administration, Baker And Hamilton Say (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Former secretary of state James A. Baker III said for the first time yesterday that the Iraq Study Group remains committed to democracy in Iraq, as he and Co-Chairman Lee H. Hamilton offered conciliatory words to a Bush administration that has reacted coolly to the panel's key recommendations.

The group's report makes no mention of President Bush's oft-stated goal of establishing democracy in Iraq; in the five days since its release, Baker and Hamilton have talked in more modest terms, referring to Bush's recent formulation of creating an Iraq that can govern and defend itself. But in an interview on "Fox News Sunday," Baker emphasized: "We don't negate the goal of democracy."

"The goal of democracy has always been a goal and foundation and basis for American foreign policy, and it will always remain that," Baker said.

The comments appeared part of an effort by Baker and Hamilton to use the Sunday talk shows to play down talk of rifts between the panel and the Bush administration, which is finishing its own review of strategy in Iraq. In televised interviews, Baker said he understands the administration's internal studies call for some of the things his panel urged, such as changing the focus of the U.S. military presence in Iraq from combat to training.

Baker also sought to portray the panel's proposal for a more aggressive Middle East diplomatic effort as less ambitious than its critics have suggested. At a news conference last week, Bush seemed to take issue with the panel's suggestion that his administration should engage in high-level dialogue with Syria and Iran without preconditions.

Baker said that he wanted to make sure "everyone understands . . . the limited nature of what we are proposing with respect to Iran and Syria." He said the administration should find out whether Iran is willing to do what it did several years ago to help stabilize Afghanistan. He also said Syria would be required to meet several key obligations, including cooperating in the investigation of political assassinations in Lebanon and persuading Hamas to recognize Israel's right to exist.

"We're not talking about sitting down with Iran and talking to them about everything under the sun," Baker said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

White House press secretary Tony Snow dismissed speculation that the White House is hostile to the Baker-Hamilton group's recommendations, saying there is a "moment of opportunity here" for the two parties to come together on a new policy for Iraq. But he stressed in an interview: "Obviously, the president is the one who is going to be offering the final call about the way forward."

The president plans to spend much of the coming week on the Iraq review with officials at the Pentagon and State Department, and will also consult with outside experts. Snow said he expects the results of the review to be announced before Christmas, but "at this point it isn't a nail-down promise."

On the talk shows, Hamilton and Baker pushed back against some of the criticism their group has received in recent days, particularly from hawks such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who want the administration to deploy more troops in Baghdad to quell the violence.

"We do not think we have" 50,000 to 100,000 troops "to put there on a sustained basis," Hamilton said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "Furthermore, if you do that, you are going to get the Iraqis to react by saying, 'Oh well, let the Americans take it.' That's exactly what we don't want. We want the Iraqis at the point of the spear, not the American forces."

Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, also appeared to acknowledge, but reject, criticism from some in the administration that the panel's estimate of how quickly new Iraqi units can be trained is unrealistic. The panel stated that U.S. combat brigades can be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008.

"In the last year or so, we have sharply improved that training, and it can be done if we put the priority on it that we're emphasizing. It's the best way forward with the options that we have," Hamilton said on "Meet the Press."

Baker said on "Face the Nation" that he is not surprised by some of the criticism for his panel's work from conservatives who have been ardent supporters of the war and the Bush administration.

"The situation is such that politics as usual is not going to come up with the answer," he said. "There has to be a unity of the American people and a unity of the country behind an approach if this is going to work."

The two men's comments came after Iraqi President Jalal Talabani harshly criticized the panel's report for "dangerous" recommendations that would "undermine the sovereignty of Iraq and the constitution."

Bush And Iraq Study Group: Competing Visions For Middle East (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON

With President Bush turning a cold shoulder to key recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, one explanation is the wide gulf between the group's prescription for addressing the Middle East and the president's vision for the region.

The study group, co-chaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton, places a high priority on restarting the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and reenergizing America's role in it. Mr. Bush, who has never viewed that conflict as ripe for the kind of intense US diplomacy Mr. Baker had dedicated to it, continues to see success in Iraq as the demonstration project for peace and reform in the region.

"Bush had this idea that Baghdad was going to radically alter the Middle East," says Henri Barkey, a former State Department specialist on Iraq now at Lehigh University in Bethlehem, Pa. "For him, the road to Jerusalem goes through Baghdad. Baker is saying you get to Baghdad through Jerusalem," he adds, "but it's hard to see Bush embracing that thinking now."

As Bush considers an array of alternatives and prepares for a speech that the White House says he hopes to give before Christmas laying out his plan for a new direction in Iraq, the broader question of how best to reform the Middle East will be a determining factor.

Last month in Riga, Latvia, Bush extolled the transformational power of a democratic Iraq. He has not given up on the idea of a functioning democracy as the answer to Iraq's ills - indeed, Weekly Standard editor William Kristol has taken to calling him "the last neocon." In stark contrast, the study group's report emphasizes stability as the most pressing need, passing over goals of regional freedom and democracy. Iran and Syria

One of the report's central proposals - seen by the panel as a necessity for progress in Iraq - is a broad and intense regional dialogue that includes both Iran and Syria. But the Bush approach, one fine-tuned and doggedly pursued by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, has been to isolate those two countries as troublemaking cats that must first change their spots before being welcomed to the negotiating table.

Bush remains at heart a believer in regime change in the case of regimes deemed to be supporters of international terrorism, some analysts say. And some White House officials say the president sees much about the Baker-Hamilton report as better-suited to the Middle East of the former secretary of State's heyday in the late 1980s and early '90s, while not so much a response to the post-9/11 world.

For Bush, talks with the United States should be dangled as a reward: for Iran once it gives up its nuclear ambitions, and for Syria as a prize for disengaging from Lebanon and relinquishing support for Hizbullah. "The truth of the matter is these countries have now got the choice to make," Bush said last week in comments on the study group's recommendations.

The study group recommends decoupling Iran's nuclear programs from the Iraq issue and leaving it to the United Nations Security Council.

For Baker, diplomacy is not about talking to your friends, but is really about dealing with your enemies. As Mr. Hamilton says, "How do you solve problems without talking to people?"

Baker acknowledges that Iran might not even want to join talks on Iraq. But he adds that finding that out would be useful: If Iran rejects an outstretched hand, he says, it would be a clear demonstration to the world of Tehran's intransigence and rejectionist approach.

Still, the study group placed such emphasis on regional diplomacy and in particular on Iran and Syria because it concluded the stakes in Iraq are such that no country wants deeper chaos. "We do not think it's in the Iranian interest for the American policy to fail completely and lead to chaos," Hamilton said last week.

That position is supported by experts and former diplomats who have worked with the Iranians in the past. "The Iranians may feel no compulsion to rush to Washington's assistance," notes James Dobbins, director of international security and defense at the RAND Corp. in Arlington, Va.

Mr. Dobbins, who was the Bush administration's envoy on formation of a post- Taliban government in Afghanistan, says the Iranians were instrumental in that process.

Calling it a "Washington myth" that the US formed an international coalition in late 2001 to defeat the Taliban, he says the US actually joined a preexisting coalition of countries - which included Iran.

"Iranian diplomats were being killed, and refugees were pouring into their country," says Dobbins, a former emissary for several administrations. "Our interests were coincidental." Iran's post-Taliban input

But the Iranians went beyond mere cooperation, says Dobbins. "It was the Iranians who suggested the word 'democracy' be inserted in the Bonn agreement" that set out the guideposts for the new regime in Afghanistan, he says. "It was also their suggestion that the Afghans cooperate with the international community on terrorism."

In addition, the Iranians were ready to work with an American-run program to build an Afghan national army - which could have begun to melt the two-decades-thick ice between Iran and the US, he says - before the US nixed the idea. (When the US suggested to an Iranian military official that cooperation might be difficult because army training procedures would be so different, the officer said that, in fact, the Iranian military was still using manuals the US left behind in 1979, Dobbins says.)

Still, working with Iran now would be harder, he acknowledges: The reform government that helped out on Afghanistan was replaced by the more radical regime of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and trends in the region, including American difficulties in Iraq, have left the regime "feeling confident," he says.

But the "coincidental interests" are still there, Dobbins says. Like the US, the Iranians want a "democracy" in Iraq, if only because it puts the majority Shiite population in power.

Some experts say the emphasis that the study group report places on Iran and Syria exaggerates the influence they have in Iraq. But they say there is little doubt both could help make things better: Syria, for example, through a better control of its border.

One option that a Pentagon study for a redirection in Iraq is considering is a redeployment of US troops - from fighting in Iraq's increasingly sectarian strife to concentrating on Al Qaeda forces in Iraq. Control of the Syrian border is considered a key part of addressing the international terrorist presence among the Iraqi population.

But how far Bush will go in embracing the regional approach - and accepting avenues he has rejected in the past - probably won't be known until he gives his speech. "All administrations deny they are changing policy," Dobbins says, "up to the moment they change it."

Sunni And Shiite Insurgents Remain Mystery To U.S., Iraq Report Charges (NYT)

By James Risen

WASHINGTON, Dec. 10 — Nearly four years after the invasion of Iraq, the United States still does not understand the enemy that American troops are fighting, according to last week's report by the Iraq Study Group.

The commission's final report harshly criticized United States intelligence officials for failing to answer basic questions about the nature of the Sunni insurgency or the increasingly powerful Shiite militias, both of which pose grave threats to American forces.

The intelligence community has had some success hunting Al Qaeda in Iraq, the report found, but that terrorist organization is small and is not the main enemy confronting American troops. The far bigger Sunni insurgency and Shiite militias are still largely mysteries to American intelligence, according to the report.

"While the United States has been able to acquire good and sometimes superb tactical intelligence on Al Qaeda in Iraq, our government still does not understand very well either the insurgency in Iraq or the role of the militias," the report said. It said that American intelligence agencies were "not doing enough to map the insurgency, dissect it, and understand it on a national and provincial level" and that intelligence analysts' "knowledge of the organization, leadership, financing, and operations of militias, as well as their relationship to government security forces, also falls far short of what policy makers need to know."

A spokesman for John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence and the Bush administration's top intelligence official, issued a written statement that said Mr. Negroponte planned to review the study group's findings. The statement did not seek to argue with the report's assertions. Carl Kropf, the spokesman, said the "Iraq Study Group offered some concise, but important, assessments of our intelligence analysis and collection activities on Iraq."

"We want to study those assessments and how they were reached carefully before offering any judgments about them," he added.

The study group's findings echo complaints quietly voiced in recent months by a number of current and former American officials, who have warned of the failure by American intelligence officers in Iraq to adequately penetrate the Sunni insurgency. These officials say the level of violence in Baghdad makes it extremely difficult for American intelligence officers to move around the country to gather information, and as a result they rely far too heavily on Iraqis who come to them in the Green Zone or to other major American bases, and on information from the intelligence service of the new Iraqi government.

That leaves the Central Intelligence Agency and American military intelligence vulnerable to manipulation by Iraqis who feed the Americans disinformation because they have an ax to grind or simply as a way to make money by selling information to the United States.

The report quoted an unidentified United States intelligence analyst who told the Iraq Study Group that "we rely too much on others to bring information to us" and "do not understand the context of what we are told."

Bureaucratic obstacles in the American government and a failure by the Bush administration to make the issue a top priority have left the United States with gaping holes in its understanding of the insurgency, the report found.

For example, the report found that the Defense Intelligence Agency rotates its analysts from one posting to another so frequently that few develop any real depth of understanding of the insurgency. "We were told that there are fewer than 10 analysts on the job at the Defense Intelligence Agency who have more than two years' experience in analyzing the insurgency," the report said. "Capable analysts are rotated to new assignments, and on-the-job training begins anew. Agencies must have a better personnel system to keep analytic expertise focused on the insurgency."

An agency spokesman disputed the numbers used by the report and said that the agency had "hundreds of analysts focused on the Iraq situation," adding that a "considerable number of experienced analysts are forward deployed and are directly working the counterterrorism-insurgency issues."

Meanwhile, the Bush administration has not sought to significantly improve on-the-ground intelligence about the enemy, the report said. "The Defense Department and the intelligence community have not invested sufficient people and resources to understand the political and military threat to American men and women in the armed forces," the report said. "Congress has appropriated almost $2 billion this year for countermeasures to protect our troops in Iraq against improvised explosive devices, but the administration has not put forward a request to invest comparable resources in trying to understand the people who fabricate, plant and explode those devices."

The study group recommended that the director of national intelligence and the defense secretary "devote significantly greater analytic resources to the task of understanding the threats and sources of violence in Iraq."

At the same time, the study group found that United States officials had underreported the level of violence in Iraq, providing misleading information to American leaders and the public about the scale of the problem facing American troops.

The study group determined that on one day in July, American officials in Iraq reported 93 attacks or significant acts of violence, but the study group's review found that 1,100 violent acts actually occurred that day. "The standard for recording attacks acts as a filter to keep events out of reports and databases," the report said.

For example, the report said that a killing of an Iraqi might not be counted by American officials as an attack, and that sectarian violence was not included in American databases if the source of the attack could not be determined. In addition, it said, “a roadside bomb or a rocket or mortar attack that doesn’t hurt U.S. personnel doesn’t count.”

The group did not charge that the widespread underreporting of attacks was politically motivated. Still, it raised questions about whether the underreporting was intended to conform with Bush administration policies. “Good policy is difficult to make when information is systematically collected in a way that minimizes its discrepancy with policy goals,” the report stated.

Baker-Hamilton's Fine Print: Stay In Iraq (LAT)

By Niall Ferguson

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

The Iraq Study Group didn't pin Iraq's hope on Iran and Syria, nor did it call for complete troop withdrawal.

'PERSUASION involves both incentives and penalties," Henry Kissinger once remarked. "So there is an element of implied coercion." Last week saw the publication of a masterpiece of persuasion. But whom will it persuade? And with what sticks and carrots?

Most commentators have interpreted the report of the Iraq Study Group as a well-crafted admission of defeat. Predictably, that was exactly how President Bush himself reacted to it. "I … believe we're going to succeed," he told reporters Thursday. "One way to assure failure is just to quit." Addressing one of the report's key recommendations, he bluntly declared that Iran and Syria "shouldn't bother to show up" for negotiations about Iraq if they don't understand their "responsibilities to not fund terrorists" and if the Iranians don't "verifiably suspend their [uranium] enrichment program."

Yet anyone who bothers to read the report carefully — as opposed to skimming the executive summary — can see that it neither proposes "quitting" Iraq nor pins serious hope on Iranian or Syrian assistance. Quite the reverse.

Persuasion in the realm of grand strategy is more a matter of rhetorical art than science. The first essential step is to identify your target audience. Most readers of the report assume that it is directed at Bush. That is wrong. Its principal target audience is Congress, and particularly the new Democratic majorities in both houses. And the aim is not to persuade a stubborn president to admit defeat. Rather, the report's aim is to convince legislators that withdrawal from Iraq — no matter how much their constituents may yearn for it — is not an option. The report's other intended readership is Arab governments throughout the Middle East. The message for them is the same: A U.S. exit from the region is what you most have to fear.

The second step in the process of persuasion is to conjure up a nightmare vision of the future if the action you envisage is not taken. The worst-case scenario proposed by the Iraq Study Group is the one about which I have been writing since February: "Sectarian warfare, growing violence or a slide toward chaos," leading to "the collapse of Iraq's government and a humanitarian catastrophe." Here are the report's most important lines: "Neighboring countries could intervene. Sunni-Shia clashes could spread … across the Islamic world. [There could be] Shia insurrections — perhaps fomented by Iran — in Sunni-ruled states. Such a broader sectarian conflict could open a Pandora's box of problems."

The consequences would be much more than a propaganda victory for Al Qaeda and a humiliation for the United States, which is what they worry about on Capitol Hill. In such a conflagration, no Mideast government — with the exception of the fundamentalist Shiite regime in Tehran — could feel secure. And that is precisely why Arab rulers should dread an American exit.

Step 3 in the art of persuasion is to propose remedies that sound attractive to your target audience. These the Iraq Study Group has certainly produced — in profusion. But you need to read the small print of all 79 recommendations. Consider the long-anticipated "diplomatic offensive to build an international consensus for stability in Iraq and the region," involving Iran, a reviled member of Bush's "axis of evil," as well as Syria, no friend of the U.S.

"A nation can and should engage its adversaries and enemies," declares the report (in a sentence that Co-Chairman James A. Baker III must surely have written) and should offer them "incentives as well as disincentives." Note that word "disincentives." Baker's idea here is not to go cap in hand to Damascus and Tehran. Rather, as he explained to the media last week, it is to "flip the Syrians" by appealing to Sunni solidarity, and to isolate the Iranian regime by exposing its "rejectionist attitude." In other words: Get the leaders of all Iraq's neighbors into the same room and play "spot the Shiites."

Now let's read the small print on troop withdrawals. "By the first quarter of 2008," the report says, "all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq." This has been widely interpreted as the first step toward the exit. It says "out of Iraq," right?

Wrong. Look more closely at some of the report's other recommendations:

· The number of U.S. military personnel "embedded" in Iraqi army battalions and brigades should be increased from 3,000 or 4,000 to between 10,000 to 20,000.

· The number of U.S. police trainers should be expanded.

· The U.S. Department of Justice should lead the work of organizational transformation in the Interior Ministry.

DOJ_NMG_0104392

· A senior advisor for economic reconstruction in Iraq is required.

· The U.S. State Department should train personnel to carry out civilian tasks associated with a complex stability operation; it should establish a Foreign Service Reserve Corps.

Does that sound like "out of Iraq" to you? I'd say it sounds more like "stay in Iraq" — only this time, let's not screw it up.

The media have fixated on the possibility of a quantitative reduction in U.S. troops — which is in any case conditional on there being no "unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground" — while missing the underlying argument for qualitative improvement.

Hats off, then, to Baker and his team. This turns out to be a classic work of persuasion. Its target audiences have been well chosen. Its worst-case scenario is plausible. And its recommendations are so carefully phrased that they sound like disengagement while actually signifying better engagement.

It is certainly not the exit strategy Americans want. But it might just help avoid a Middle Eastern Armageddon.

The Time Is Now (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

On Wednesday, as if the release of the Iraq Study Group report needed some form of dramatic punctuation, 11 more American G.I.'s were killed in this misbegotten war that just about everyone, except perhaps the president, now sees as a complete and utter debacle.

Senator Gordon Smith, a Republican from Oregon who supported the war, delivered an emotional speech on the Senate floor Thursday evening in which he said:

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day. That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore."

If the U.S. is ultimately going to retreat in Iraq, he said, "I would rather do it sooner than later. I am looking for answers, but the current course is unacceptable to this senator."

The primary value of the Baker-Hamilton report is that it embodies, in clear and explicit language, the consensus that has emerged in the U.S. about the current state of the war. It's not so much a blueprint for action as a recognition of reality.

"The level of violence is high and growing," the report says. "There is great suffering, and the daily lives of many Iraqis show little or no improvement. Pessimism is pervasive."

With the situation in Iraq deteriorating, and support for the war in the U.S. having all but collapsed, the only real question on the table is how long the U.S. is going to drag out its inevitable pullout of combat forces. And the inevitable moral question that is inextricably linked to that slowly evolving set of circumstances is how to justify the lives that will be lost between now and the final day of our departure.

There is something agonizingly tragic about soldiers dying in a war that has already been lost.

The scale of the debacle is breathtaking. According to the study group: "In some parts of Iraq — notably in Baghdad — sectarian cleansing is taking place. The United Nations estimates that 1.6 million are displaced within Iraq, and up to 1.8 million Iraqis have fled the country."

Americans, including the members of the study group, continue to insist that the key to an American withdrawal over the next couple of years is the improvement of Iraqi security forces to the point where they can successfully step into the breach. That is a complete fantasy, as a reading of the study group's own assessment of the Iraqi forces will attest.

The study group found that, among other things, the Iraqi Army units "lack leadership ... lack equipment ... lack personnel ... [and] lack logistics and support."

"Soldiers are given leave liberally and face no penalties for absence without leave," the report said. "Unit readiness rates are low, often at 50 percent or less."

The report went on: "They lack the ability to sustain their operations, the capability to transport supplies and troops, and the capacity to provide their own indirect fire support, close-air support, technical intelligence and medical evacuation."

Other than that, they're fine.

So what's next? The Bush administration has lost all of its credibility on the war. What is needed now are leaders with the courage to insist, perhaps at the risk of their reputations and careers, that it is wrong to continue sending fresh bodies after those already lost, to continue asking young, healthy American troops to head into the combat zone, perhaps for their third or fourth tour, to fight in a war the public no longer supports.

In a foreword to “The Best and the Brightest,” David Halberstam’s chronicle of the Vietnam fiasco, Senator John McCain wrote:

“It was a shameful thing to ask men to suffer and die, to persevere through god-awful afflictions and heartache, to endure the dehumanizing experiences that are unavoidable in combat, for a cause that the country wouldn’t support over time and that our leaders so wrongly believed could be achieved at a smaller cost than our enemy was prepared to make us pay.

“No other national endeavor requires as much unshakable resolve as war. If the nation and the government lack that resolve, it is criminal to expect men in the field to carry it alone.”

The United States lacks that resolve when it comes to Iraq. It is time to pull the troops out of harm’s way.

How Quickly Bush Forgot (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Some people suppose that President Bush's freedom agenda was buried last Wednesday by the report of the Iraq Study Group. In fact, history will show that the administration largely smothered its own baby, even before Iraq's descent into civil war propelled the resurrection of James Baker and other "realist" friends of Middle Eastern dictators.

Evidence of that conclusion could be found in Washington on the same day Baker delivered his report, as administration officials, members of Congress and business executives gathered for a glittering dinner in honor of Mehriban Aliyeva, the visiting first lady of Azerbaijan.

Aliyeva's husband, Ilham, rules a Muslim country wedged between Russia and Iran that is on the cusp of becoming a major exporter of oil and gas, with strategic pipelines that offer Europe an alternative to Russian suppliers. It also is at a tipping point politically. Aliyev, who inherited power from his father -- a satrap of the Soviet Union -- has teetered between installing his own dictatorship and promising to liberalize the political system along Western lines.

For a year after Bush's soaring second inaugural speech, in which he pledged "to seek and support the growth of democratic movements and institutions in every nation," the president seemed to be trying to act on his words in Azerbaijan. Through a letter and State Department envoys, he urged Aliyev to hold free and fair parliamentary elections and promised in return to "elevate our countries' relations to a new strategic level." Unfortunately, Aliyev called Bush's bluff. He staged a vote in October 2005 that even the sympathetic State Department said was marked by "major irregularities and fraud." Days before the election he arrested hundreds of political opponents or would-be rivals, including one of his most pro-Western ministers, Farhad Aliyev.

Last April Bush received President Aliyev at the White House anyway, praising his cooperation with Western energy interests but saying nothing, at least in public, about the rigged elections or political prisoners. U.S. officials argued at the time that it was necessary to ease American pressure on Aliyev because of the risk that he would be driven into the arms of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Putin has been aggressively courting the autocrats of Central Asia while trying to build a de facto Russian monopoly of the region's energy resources.

Aliyev drew a predictable conclusion: that he could be both a dictator and an American ally as long as he delivered energy and security cooperation. So Azerbaijan is pumping oil to Europe, and has promised gas this winter to pro-Western Georgia. It is allowing the U.S. military to use its airspace, and it reportedly hosts CIA monitoring operations of Iran. Meanwhile, Aliyev's government is systematically attacking the country's pro-democracy forces, while favoring Russia's Azerbaijani allies. The losers are the very "democratic reformers" to whom Bush said: "When you stand for your liberty we will stand with you."

Farhad Aliyev (no relation to the president) is one of them. In visits to Washington as minister for economic development, he was outspoken about the need for Azerbaijan to embrace Western democracy and ally itself with the United States. At home, he had famously declared that "Russia is Azerbaijan's past, the West is its future."

He's now been in prison for nearly 14 months, denied visits from his family or even from doctors seeking to treat his known health problems. Variously accused of coup plotting, corruption and the murder of an opposition journalist -- in each case without evidence -- he has never been tried or even formally charged. Inquiries on his behalf by the State Department (which recognized his "commitment to reform") and several members of Congress were ignored or spurned by the government. Meanwhile, his energy-related business interests and those of his brother Rafiq, who was also imprisoned, have been confiscated and sold to "pro-Russian business enterprises favored by the Azerbaijan authorities," according to a study of the case by Washington lawyer Charles R. Both.

On Nov. 24 Aliyev's administration closed down the country's only independent radio and television station, ANS. The network was charged with "unauthorized broadcasts of several foreign radio programs" -- i.e., the Voice of America, Radio Liberty, and the BBC. Two Russian television networks controlled by Putin's government continue their broadcasts into the country unhindered. U.S. officials who protested the shutdown were told, improbably, that it was the result of excessive zeal by licensing authorities.

Despite this provocation, the Bush administration offered its full cooperation for the visit of Aliyev's wife, a member of parliament who is building her own political career. The trip has received saturation coverage by Azerbaijan's remaining, state-controlled media, which portray it as proof of the close ties between Aliyev and Bush. And no wonder: The day after that gala dinner, Mehriban Aliyeva was received at the White House by First Lady Laura Bush. Did the subject of political prisoners such as Farhad Aliyev come up? Sadly, less than two years after the freedom agenda was born, the very idea of such principled pressure from the Bush White House has become ludicrous.

The Point Of No Return (NSWK)

By Weston Kosova

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - Gary Ackerman is the last man you'd expect George W. Bush to turn to for advice. Just elected to his 13th term in the House, the New York Democrat thinks the president's handling of the Iraq war has been "totally inept." So Ackerman was a bit surprised when Bush invited him and other members of Congress to the White House last Wednesday morning, just hours after the long-awaited Baker-Hamilton report was released. The president told them he wanted to hear their thoughts and concerns about the war. Ackerman was skeptical. "In my experience, you usually went in, and Bush would do most of the talking," Ackerman says. Instead, the president made a few brief remarks and then went around the table letting people speak their minds.

For more than an hour the lawmakers, Democrat and Republican, "ripped into" the administration's Iraq policy, Ackerman recalls. "It was like a group intervention. It was ... certainly the most pointed discussion I've ever had with any president." When they were finished, Bush thanked them for coming. "I take your comments very seriously," he said. Ackerman was puzzled, but impressed. "He really seemed to be listening," he says.

That was precisely the reaction Bush and his aides wanted. For months, the White House had been girding for the release of the Iraq Study Group report. They knew from press leaks that it would be critical in tone and that the president wouldn't like some of its ideas—especially a suggested pullback of U.S. troops and a proposal to reach out to Syria and Iran for help in quelling violence in the country.

The challenge for Bush's team was to make the president appear as though he were taking the release of the report seriously, without necessarily embracing its conclusions. In the days following the report's release, Bush the Decider transformed himself into Bush the Listener. Usually prickly with war critics—on the rare occasions he spoke to them at all—the president now invited them in from the cold and kept quiet.

The Baker-Hamilton report may not change Bush's military or diplomatic strategy in Iraq. But the report has had one noticeable effect: it marks a point of no return in the way Bush talks about the war and deals with his critics. He may not always be as accommodating as he seemed to be last week. But from here on in, the president can no longer plausibly dismiss Democrats as wanting to "cut and run" or blame the media for overplaying the violence and ignoring the "good news" from Baghdad. The change in Bush's approach had its beginnings well before the Baker group put pen to paper. It came about in part because of a slow, careful effort by Bush's closest aides—under the direction of chief of staff Josh Bolten—to convince the president that he had to listen to different voices on Iraq, and ultimately change direction. The results of that effort will be unveiled next week, when Bush is expected to announce what he calls "The New Way Forward," his latest plan to salvage the mission in Iraq.

When Bolten took charge of the West Wing last April, he was one of the few people in the White House who were willing to admit that Iraq was broken and that the president was stuck. He worried that Bush had been hearing the same bad advice from the same people for nearly three years. Over the summer, Bolten began the first of his efforts to puncture Bush's bubble by having the president sit down with some of the harshest critics of the war—conservatives who had turned against the effort. At one session last summer at Camp David, Bolten sat Bush, Vice President Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld across from a group of academics. "They were folks who had actually been to the region and spent the time talking to noncommissioned officers and generals," Bolten says. The academics were told not to hold back. A couple of weeks later, Bolten staged another session with Iraq experts, who met with the president at the Pentagon. Among them: Vali Nasr, an authority on the rise of the Shia. Bolten, who is known to obsess over the smallest details, makes careful seating charts for Oval Office briefings to put certain advisers directly in Bush's line of sight so the president will be more likely to listen carefully to their opinions.

That was just the start. In the weeks before the Republicans lost Congress, while Karl Rove was predicting victory, Bolten tasked a small group of trusted aides to plan for electoral defeat and its aftermath. The first step was to fire the abrasive, out-of-touch Rumsfeld and replace him with straight-talking Robert Gates. The second was to ready a respectful response to the pending Baker-Hamilton report but to downplay its importance by stressing it is just one of several government reports on the war effort that Bush is reviewing. The final phase was to move past the elder statesmen by introducing Bush's own strategy.

The White House won't say exactly what the president will propose in his New Way Forward plan, but aides say Bush still believes in standing behind the government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. He has yet to make critical decisions about repositioning U.S. forces inside Iraq and especially about embedding more American trainers within Iraqi units.

The Baker commission discovered just how hard it is to come up with new ideas on Iraq. The group was lauded for its bipartisan spirit. But the desire for agreement may have resulted in a report that is stronger on rhetoric than recommendations. For example, it calls for troop withdrawals but suggests no firm deadlines. One member, former Clinton Defense secretary William Perry, wanted to set dates. Baker was concerned, however, that Bush would write off the report as unrealistic.

Lawrence Eagleburger, George H.W. Bush's last secretary of State, also opposed a timetable; he said if the report set down specific withdrawal dates, it would be "an invitation to the Iranians to march right in after we go." At that point, Perry drafted a proposal for gradual withdrawal with the goal of getting combat brigades out of Iraq by early 2008. At least one Democratic member, Chuck Robb, argued for a short-term increase in troops. But even Republicans were reluctant to go along. The report's final language said only that the United States "could" support a short-term redeployment.

The White House has signaled that there is no way to "win" the war in the next year or two. The American people seem to agree. According to the new NEWSWEEK Poll, 68 percent now say the United States is losing ground in Iraq. And last week Bush suffered a surprise defection from within GOP ranks, when Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith called for a quick withdrawal of American troops. Bush's forthcoming plan will extend well beyond his time in office. Bolten told NEWSWEEK he can imagine his last day in the Bush White House. West Wing staffers will be cleaning out their desks on Jan. 20, 2009, when the cable news networks cut into their Inauguration coverage for a breaking story: a car bomb has gone off in Baghdad. Bolten knows he can't do much to stop that from happening. What he can do is try to limit the number of political explosions between now and then.

Advice And Grudging Consent (TIME)

By Michael Duffy, Mike Allen

Time, December 11, 2006

The motorcade flew down Pennsylvania Avenue just after 8 a.m. last Tuesday, sirens screaming and lights flashing--two white police cruisers, five black town cars and a gray staff van. Was it the President? Or the Vice President? Nah--it was just the Iraq Study Group, Washington's new shadow government, on another emergency run, this time from the White House, where its members told George W. Bush how to get out of Iraq, up to Capitol Hill, where they preached bipartisanship and renewed diplomacy--as well as the promise of withdrawal from Iraq by 2008. It's not often that 10 unelected people, all in their 60s and 70s, can supersede the elected government of the U.S., but last week the panel, led by ex--Secretary of State James Baker and former Congressman Lee Hamilton, pulled it off for a couple of days.

Most blue-ribbon studies start gathering dust the minute they are printed. This one, with 79 recommendations in just 99 pages, was unveiled on network TV and in the first few days shot up to No. 3 on the Amazon best-seller list. The panel members worked overtime on the launch, doing carefully choreographed rounds of interviews with reporters and anchors before Baker and Hamilton motored back to the Hill to start selling their plan to Congress. The core message: the Bush Administration has to work and think a lot harder to achieve even modest goals in Iraq--and should start by accepting the report in its entirety. "I hope," said Baker, "we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say, 'I like this, but I don't like that.'"

The big rollout was designed to exert maximum pressure on the White House because, despite all the fanfare, the report was aimed at an audience of one--Bush. For most of the week, he looked none too pleased about the round-the-clock talking-to he was getting. As he received the report, he told cameras it was "interesting." Later he said it has "some very good ideas." But within a day, he was putting some distance between himself and the best seller: "I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation."

That comment reflected the West Wing's exceeding bitterness about the report. Some of the pushback was substantive. The suggestions on how to engage directly with Iran and Syria--the parts resisted most unambiguously by the President--were surprisingly specific and prescriptive, not the platitudes the Administration had expected. Bush aides chafed at the patronizing directive "The President and the leadership of his national-security team should remain in close and frequent contact with the Iraqi leadership." Even some Democrats thought that Bush might have a point. "If you want to help the President," said Paul Goldman, a Democratic strategist, "you give the President a chance to lead. You don't set it up to look like he got forced into doing something."

But some White House reaction was plain personal. This is the second time in six years that Bush has had to turn to Baker to save his skin (the first was Tallahassee in 2000). All the stories about the father's vaunted foreign-policy team riding in to save the son had become "an irritant," admitted a senior Administration official. A former Bush adviser who worked closely with the President speculated that Bush and Karl Rove "don't want Baker to get instant gratification" and won't make concessions at the outset. But that will change. "After the short-term ego fit, he will eventually come around. He is a political realist," said the former adviser.

So, apparently, is Senator Gordon Smith, a Republican from Oregon who voted for the war. He went to the Senate floor last week to say the Iraq adventure was "absurd ... it may even be criminal." A few more speeches like that by Republicans, and the debate about a course correction will be over.

Already, Bush and his aides have promised changes. He said he would give a pre- Christmas speech that would chart what he last week alternately called "a new course" and "a new way forward." A presidential adviser said the address would include "a new policy direction but no apology." A senior Administration official said some aides hope for a note of contrition ("Things haven't turned out the way I intended") similar to Ronald Reagan's 1987 mea culpa after the Tower Commission concluded that his inattention had contributed to the Iran-contra arms scandal.

"They know this is the time," the official said, of Bush's inner circle. "We're not going to have many of them left. This is the moment. We have to take these recommendations and show that we're listening. They know that."

A Grim Verdict, Some Tough Calls To Make (USNEWS)

By Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

The violence has been mounting at an alarming rate for months, but it was only last week that the debate over Iraq in Washington truly shifted. First, there was incoming Secretary of Defense Robert Gates, whose forthright admission that America is not "winning" in Iraq contrasted sharply with the dismissive doublespeak of Donald Rumsfeld. Then came the verdict of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group: "Current U.S. policy is not working."

While its specific recommendations might have been anticlimactic, the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Congressman Lee Hamilton, has already succeeded in one of its main objectives-changing the tenor of the debate in Washington. As recently as early November, President Bush was still telling cheering crowds, "We got a strategy for victory that will work." Last week, following the panel's report, a more chastened Bush struck a different chord. "It's bad in Iraq," he said, standing next to his close ally, British Prime Minister Tony Blair. "I believe we need a new approach." (Not everything changed, however: The front page of the New York Post derided the Iraq Study Group as "Surrender Monkeys.")

"Not enough time." It is unclear how many of the group's 79 recommendations President Bush will embrace-or even whether any changes in U.S. policy can have much effect on the ground in Iraq. Broadly, the Iraq Study Group calls for U.S. troops to transition to support roles and for combat units to be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008. This would be accompanied by ambitious milestones for the Iraqi government and a broad new U.S. diplomatic offensive that would include reaching out to Iran and Syria. Bush's initial reaction to the specific proposals was chilly, but panel members are pressing him to use the report as an opportunity to change course. "He doesn't want to have these last two years be the failure of some stubborn president who didn't listen-some cowboy president," panel member and former Republican Sen. Alan Simpson tells U.S. News.

The shortcomings of the U.S. effort in Iraq-which costs American taxpayers $2 billion a week-are clear enough in the report. For example, only 33 of the 1,000 staffers in the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad speak Arabic (and only six of them are fluent). The group also says that U.S. intelligence is lacking, adding that fewer than 10 of the analysts "on the job" at the Defense Intelligence Agency have been tracking the insurgency for more than two years (a point DIA disputes). And the option of sending more U.S. troops to quell the violence cannot even be considered because "we do not have the troops or equipment to make a substantial, sustained increase," the report says.

Perhaps most damning, the Iraq Study Group blasts the Bush administration for routinely undercounting the violence by, for instance, excluding sectarian attacks when the perpetrator cannot be determined. So while 93 attacks or violent incidents were recorded on one day last July, an Iraq Study Group review turned up 1,100 violent incidents that day. "Good policy is difficult to make when information is systematically collected in a way that minimizes its discrepancy with policy goals," the report concludes.

A Gift For The President (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

The panel was about as blue-ribbon as a commission can get--with membership including a former Supreme Court justice, two former Republican secretaries of state, an ex-Democratic defense secretary and White House chief of staff, and assorted onetime members of Congress. Bipartisan. Old Washington hands. Steeped in the ways of government-- and compromise. One of its leaders, Jim Baker, had come as the emissary of the unhappy Bush 41 crowd--eager to help guide the son out of the Iraq mess. Even so, he wouldn't take on the job until he received the president's blessing, after sending a direct message: You may not end up liking what we have to tell you. Now that seems like an understatement given the report's grim assessment that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating."

It was a group journey that surprised even the members themselves. Bipartisan panels often come up with mush; this was a report girded in steel. It was the result, members say, of some eye-opening moments--including an interview with the president and his national security team. At one point, Vernon Jordan, a skilled Washington insider, put it pretty bluntly to the president, according to a panel member's paraphrase:

Jordan: What do you mean by victory? When my mama told me to clean the garage, I cleaned the garage because I knew what she meant. But I don't understand what you mean.

Bush: You have to speak to the American people with a simple message here. They understand what victory is, and if you come off of it, they'll think you're giving up.

Some members say they were stunned by the response. And when they left, they were puzzled by one more thing: During their entire session, Vice President Dick Cheney--a key architect of the war in Iraq--never said a word. Not one.

Tense days. The group had come a long way, conducting more than 170 interviews (during which ex-Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was the "most penetrating questioner," according to one panel member), traveling to Iraq, debating constantly. It was, one group member told me, "a civil process with serious people." But easy? "No," he says. "There was plenty of tension. Iraq breeds tension."

Baker--considered the "big picture diplomat"--focused largely on his plan to engage in talks with Syria and Iran. Baker apparently believed this proposal would "turn out to be the biggest and most controversial news" in their final product. As it turned out, he was wrong.

The hardest part to deliver--and probably for the president to swallow--was taking combat troops out of Iraq by early 2008. Baker was initially opposed to any target date. But a turning point came for many members during a trip last summer to Iraq, where they had to enter the Green Zone in Black Hawk helicopters. They spent four days there, and Leon Panetta, President Clinton's former chief of staff, tells me he came away believing "we were walking into the middle of chaos and observing a completely dysfunctional government." He brought his colleagues together and said, "I think we really have to worry this government is not going to get its act together." Indeed, he said, "we have to have a strategy that says this is what we will do--no matter what you [the Iraqis] do." He was convinced that some timetable--or benchmarks-- had to be a part of any plan.

How To Avoid Iraq Syndrome (TIME)

By Richard N. Haass

Time, December 11, 2006

Not much about Iraq can be predicted with confidence, but this much can: for the foreseeable future, it will be a messy country with a weak central government, a divided society and regular violence. At worst, as the Iraq Study Group report warns, Iraq will become a failed state racked by civil war that could spill over and engulf several of its neighbors.

Either way, the human, economic, political and military costs of the Iraq war will mount. Scenes of chaos and human misery in Iraq would fuel bitterness against the U.S., first for having initiated the war, then for leaving Iraqis to their terrible fate. The domestic American reaction would be one of relief at being out of a terrible situation, but anger at having been involved in the first place and having invested so much, only to have so little to show for it.

Almost as important as what actually happens in Iraq is how it is understood. One possibility is that people around the region and the world would come to judge Iraq's failure as largely the result of American policy, the product of an ill-advised war inadequately followed up. If this is the case, Iraq would cast a cloud over the U.S. reputation for competence and reliability, and it would last for years. This scenario would create doubts in the minds of America's friends--and, correspondingly, increase the assertiveness of its foes.

An alternative view is that the lion's share of responsibility for what has taken place in Iraq over the past few years belongs to the Iraqis themselves. Under this narrative, the U.S. would be seen as having failed there less for any lack of effort or resolve than for the absence of an effective national partner. This narrative is more likely to take hold if the U.S. publicly sets clear benchmarks for what Iraqis must accomplish regarding political reform and security performance and what they should expect if they come up short.

Whichever story line prevails, the intensity of today's anti-Americanism would fade as Iraq recedes from center stage. The domestic American reaction may persist somewhat longer, however. There is the possibility of an Iraq syndrome, akin to the reaction that followed the U.S. involvement in Vietnam a generation ago. That defeat led Americans and their representatives to be wary of new overseas undertakings.

But it is important not to exaggerate the likely consequences of Iraq's endgame for the U.S. America will remain the world's most powerful country regardless of how Iraq turns out and how much U.S. foreign policy is blamed for it. The U.S. will continue to enjoy a benign international context in which it faces no great power rival, as it did throughout the cold war and as great powers have traditionally done throughout history. And ironically, the winding down of the U.S. involvement in Iraq will have a salutary effect--namely, it will slow the draw on American economic, diplomatic and military resources, all of which are in dire need of replenishment.

In fact, U.S. diplomacy will in some ways be liberated as American involvement in Iraq recedes. The U.S. could, if it so chose, be an effective proponent for Arab-Israeli peace. If the U.S. and Iran prove able to cooperate over Iraq, they might manage broader talks on other issues that divide them, including Iran's nuclear program. Outside the region, more must be done to lessen the odds that Afghanistan will go the way of Iraq. The Bush Administration could table a comprehensive package of requirements and assurances regarding North Korea and directly negotiate them with its leaders. New ideas could also be put forward about how best to resurrect international-trade talks, tackle global climate change, stop genocide in Darfur and reduce American dependence on imported oil.

Here again, the Vietnam parallel may be relevant. Defeat in Vietnam did not prevent the U.S. from maintaining close cooperative relationships with other regional countries, including Japan, South Korea and the Philippines. Nor did it stop the U.S. from forging sometimes productive ties with Vietnam's backers (including China and what was then the Soviet Union) or, with the passage of time, with Vietnam itself. Today Asia is the most dynamic part of the world, and the U.S. is a central participant in that dynamism.

Even more than Vietnam 30 years ago, Iraq constitutes a major strategic setback. There is no getting around this. But Iraq is just that--a setback. What is essential is that the U.S. cut its losses there, contain the consequences and look for new opportunities to advance its interests around the world. The sooner the post-Iraq era of U.S. foreign policy dawns, the better.

Trouble From The Top Down (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - In government, the tone set at the top can be as powerful as the mightiest army. It reverberates through everything. The history of the American presidency is the story of the character and temperament of the man in the Oval Office coursing through thousands of smaller decisions, often thousands of miles away. If the president is supple and open-minded, those decisions made many layers below him are more likely to be agile and empirical. If he's stubborn and too sure that he has all the answers, the modeling of his behavior is likely to result in decisions you would ground your teenager for.

This process is uncanny and usually unconscious, the product less of explicit orders or egregious boot-licking than of bureaucratic osmosis. The temperament of the chief leaches into the performance of functionaries he has never met.

Fortuitously, presidential personality traits have often led to major accomplishment. FDR was a great believer in experimentation, so the legions below him launched hundreds of experimental programs to fight the Depression. Ike was a champion of logistics during World War II, so it figured that the Interstate Highway System got built on his watch. LBJ was a master legislator, so it was no coincidence that his presidency featured scads of legislation. (His insecurities, in turn, contributed to the Vietnam debacle.) In recent years, George H.W. Bush's habit of writing endless thank-you notes bore indirect fruit in the gracious and face-saving way he managed the demise of the Soviet Union. Bill Clinton's messy but thorough policy analysis led to dozens of small, well-built initiatives that worked with surprising consistency.

The United States in the Second Bush Era has not been as fortunate. Beyond the headlines and major policy recommendations, the Iraq Study Group's mercifully readable report shows how President Bush's personal shortcomings manifest themselves in appalling miscues on the ground.

Consider this largely overlooked portion of the report: "Our embassy of 1,000 has 33 Arabic speakers, just six of whom are at the level of fluency. In a conflict that demands effective and efficient communications with Iraqis, we are often at a disadvantage."

Disadvantage? Nah. Who could imagine that having only .6 percent of our personnel who speak the native language might cause us some problems over there? If the damn Iraqis would just learn English we wouldn't be in this mess! Bush did not set out to miss the mark, of course, but his inattention to the execution of his grand ideas has had fatal consequences. At $8 billion per month in Iraq, you would think we'd have a few more people there who could find their way to the bathroom.

After 9/11, the absence of Arabic speakers was a big story. Analysts all agreed that we could not stop terrorism without addressing the problem. A different kind of president would have ordered a Manhattan Project-style crash program to teach the difficult-to-learn language in schools. Such a "National Security Language Initiative" was finally launched—with little notice, money or presidential attention—this year, five years late.

In the meantime, several reports highlighting the shortage have "gathered dust," the president's words for what usually happens to Washington studies. They show that as of 2006 only 33 FBI agents—1 percent—have even limited proficiency in Arabic. (The bureau claims its outside contractors can do the job.) One of the tiny handful who is actually fluent, Special Agent Bassem Youssef, is currently engaged in a lawsuit over his rough treatment inside the FBI. (The fact that he is of Arab descent apparently made him suspicious.) Among other terrifying revelations, the suit has shown in eye popping videotaped depositions that the men who run FBI counterterrorism efforts don't know the difference between Sunnis and Shiites.

This is what happens when you have a president who is incurious and impatient with inconvenient facts he doesn't "need to know": hundreds of thousands of dead Iraqis, nearly 3,000 dead Americans and what the Baker-Hamilton Commission estimates as a $2 trillion tab for our children.

Another part of their report touches on an even darker example of presidential tone-setting. In identifying a "significant underreporting of the violence in Iraq," the commission explains how the administration cooks the books on Iraqi casualties: "If we [the U.S. government] cannot determine the source of a sectarian attack, the assault does not make it into the data base. A roadside bomb or a rocket or a mortar attack that doesn't hurt U.S. personnel doesn't count."

Ponder that. For more than three years, those whining, negative journalists who reported "too much bad news" out of Iraq were actually soft-pedaling the problem, thanks to the bogus statistics on which they still depend. A war that was launched by twisting intelligence is being lost while twisting body counts. Shakespeare's "tangled web" of deceit was woven at the top, but its threads extend everywhere.

Looking The Other Way (TIME)

By Mark Kukis

Time, December 11, 2006

Captain Adam Grim readies his men for a nighttime raid in Mekanik, a gritty neighborhood in southern Baghdad. The target: a suspected militia safe house. Grim's platoon won't be leading the raid, however. Instead, the Americans will be supporting Iraqi forces led by a wiry police commander named Colonel Salih Hashim. Hashim knows the neighborhood well and chose the target himself. Together the two men discuss the plan one last time. Hashim and his men will storm the house while Grim's platoon secures the street outside and provides cover.

The raid should be a model of U.S.-Iraqi cooperation, capturing bad guys while building the confidence and skills of the Iraqi police. But there's a problem. Grim has reason to believe that in the daily struggle between U.S. forces and the armed Shi'ite groups suspected of carrying out most of the executions in the area, Hashim "plays both sides." Grim certainly doesn't trust Hashim and suspects him, at the very least, of giving ammunition to Shi'ite gunmen and sometimes even letting them sleep in the same Iraqi police compound where U.S. troops meet with Hashim during the day.

There are now more than 4,000 U.S. soldiers serving as advisers to Iraqi security forces. If the recommendations made by the Iraq Study Group are put into practice, that number will grow substantially. The Baker commission's report calls for the number of U.S. troops embedded with Iraqi units to increase to as many as 20,000 over the next year. The report argues that boosting the number of advisers will lead to improvements in the quality of Iraqi forces and pave the way for a pullback of all U.S. troops from the front lines by 2008.

But based on where Iraq's forces stand today, such a timetable is wildly optimistic. Iraq's 300,000-strong security forces--in particular the national police, which is overseen by the Interior Ministry--have been so thoroughly infiltrated by militias that some U.S. trainers will have to bring in new recruits and retrain much of the current batch before they can turn combat responsibilities over to the Iraqis. There are already concerns that by rushing to strengthen the Iraqis, U.S. forces may be ignoring abuses committed by the very people they're training. "I am greatly concerned that U.S. aid--including weapons--has gone to Iraqi security forces who have violated human rights," says Senator Patrick Leahy, a senior Democrat from Vermont who sits on the Senate Appropriations Committee. "We want to build up the Iraqi forces, but that does not mean we should support people who commit atrocities."

The experience of the troops assigned to Mekanik, a mixed neighborhood that is home to both the powerful Shi'ite Mahdi Army and a Sunni militant group called the Omar Brigade, illustrates the U.S.'s dilemmas. The neighborhood had suffered months of killing between Sunnis and Shi'ites before U.S. forces found a solution: to make the murders stop, keep the cops, who were overwhelmingly Shi'ite, out. Lieut. Colonel Jeffrey Peterson, the U.S. troop commander for Mekanik, says, "Whenever we would talk to locals about [the violence], they always implicated the national police as starting it. I could never prove it. But the bottom line was--whether it was true or false--the people did not trust the national police." In early October the Americans created what they called an isolation zone, ordering all police out of Mekanik. Before the U.S. cordon went into effect, there had been up to eight murders a day in the district of 50,000 inhabitants, and Sunni mosques were frequently attacked by Shi'ite gunmen. The Army says that as soon as the police left, Mekanik's murder rate dropped about 60%, and the mosque attacks stopped altogether.

The question now is whether the U.S. can rebuild a force that is trusted enough to take back responsibility for the neighborhood. U.S. troops who work with Iraqi security forces sometimes investigate and even arrest Iraqi police. The Pentagon points out that Iraq's Interior Ministry has fired or suspended roughly 3,000 officers for offenses ranging from corruption to "breaking the law." But a senior official at the ministry who spoke to TIME on the condition of anonymity says the dismissals were little more than a charade. Police officers who quit for their own reasons accounted for about 500 of the supposed dismissals, he says. Most of the others the ministry let go were employees with medical problems or nearing retirement. Virtually nothing had been done to remove ministry officials implicated in abuses ranging from mistreatment of detainees to working with death squads.

That leaves the job of cajoling good behavior from Iraqi police largely in the hands of junior officers like Grim, 28. The square-jawed West Point grad from Orange Park, Fla., is on his second tour in Iraq. He says his job is something equivalent to "armed social work." He feels responsible not just for making arrests and advising Iraqi soldiers but also for protecting the civilians of Mekanik. So while he says he trusts most of the officers, it's clear that he lives uneasily with the possibility that at least some of the Iraqis may be accomplices to murder when he's not around.

The raid with Hashim--the first such joint operation since Iraqi police were allowed back into the district--was typically disquieting. The house, it turns out, was empty. Grim and the other U.S. soldiers walked away uncertain about what had happened. It could have been an honest mistake, but the Americans couldn't help wondering whether Hashim was really looking for "terrorists," as he claimed. Maybe he was looking for a Sunni family to rough up, Grim says. Or perhaps the raid was just a diversion to keep U.S. troops busy while crimes were committed elsewhere in the neighborhood.

Still, the level of mistrust between U.S. and Iraqi forces runs so high that some U.S. soldiers speak openly about the possibility that they could be led into an ambush or attacked directly by the same police officers they have armed and trained. Grim says he doesn't share that concern because Hashim and his men know that Grim's platoon is ready for any situation. "It goes back to trusting your fellow American soldier to watch your back and keep you out of trouble," says Grim. "If the police did turn on us during a patrol, it would be the last thing they ever had the misfortune of doing." In today's Iraq, that may be as close as U.S. and Iraqi troops come to a mutual understanding.

The Perils Of Partnership (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, Kevin Peraino And Sarah Childress

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - You don't usually see sergeants chewing out captains in the U.S. Army. But the unusual happens every day at Fort Riley, Kans. Out here at its training center on the prairie, not far from the Oz Museum (as in "Wizard of"), the Army has created a small, simulated Iraq intended to make soldiers think they're not in Kansas anymore.

Modular trailers have been set up to look like a FOB, or forward operating base, in Iraq. Four "urban clusters"—fake villages with names like Al Amir and Al Hawaej—have been erected. And since July, 11-man squads of U.S. advisers have been going through a crash 60-day training program that is the core of America's effort to draw down its presence in Iraq. The idea: replace the 140,000-strong U.S. combat force there now with smaller, far less visible advisory teams. Embedding as many as 20,000 of these U.S. advisers with Iraqi Army and national police—a fourfold increase over current plans—is the key military recommendation of the Iraq Study Group report just released to thunderous attention. But the U.S. Army doesn't need any prodding. "I'm not waiting with bated breath on the Baker report. We have a feeling for what has worked and what hasn't," says Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, commander of the Iraq Assistance Group, which operates the base north of Baghdad where the Fort Riley trainees go for one week of "finishing school" before joining their units.

As the Army ramps up the program, however, its many perils are becoming clearer. Most of the trainees are career U.S. military officers, many of them thirty- to forty something desk jockeys who are logistical wizards, intelligence specialists and administrators. They have all the expertise the Iraqi Army needs and more, but many have barely used their weapons since basic. That's why Sgt. 1st Class Curtis Fuller, an Iraq combat vet with a face that looks hewed out of granite, treats his superior officers almost like raw recruits. "All right, let's talk about what didn't go right," Fuller barks to a group of sheepish-looking captains who have just returned from a disastrous training run. The team's three-Humvee convoy—the basic unit of travel they'll use in Iraq—was torn apart by fake IED blasts and sniper ambushes. One rattled captain couldn't get his .50-caliber machine gun to work and kept aiming it at the Humvee to his rear. "They're learning," says Fuller's commander, Lt. Col. John Nagl, forcing a smile. "Fuller won't let them leave until they do."

Then there are the risks involved in leaving small groups of U.S. advisers in the hands of under equipped Iraqi Army units of dubious skill and loyalty. Over in Iraq, Lt. Col. Rodrick Arrington, an adviser attached to the First Marine Expeditionary Force in Ramadi, notes that the Iraqi troops he works with answer their cell phones while on patrol. Because of absenteeism and lack of pay, the Iraqi units are usually about 50 percent under strength, and Iraqi officers often prove unwilling to conduct risky raids. Some units are infiltrated by militias or insurgents, though not to the degree the Iraqi police are. "We're setting ourselves up for a potential national disaster in which some Iraqi divisions could flip and take 5,000 Americans hostage, or multiple advisory teams go missing in action," says retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey.

Pittard says no U.S. advisers have been killed by their Iraqi counterparts thus far, although there have been some "incidents." Even so, to a degree little understood by the U.S. public, the "transition team" program could put the elite of the Army's professional corps in harm's way for years. And that's even if most combat forces are pulled out in early 2008, as recommended by the Baker-Hamilton panel. Currently, the 11-man teams are assigned to Iraqi battalions of some 500 men made up of four companies. Most U.S. commanders say that, to be truly effective, each Iraqi company needs its own U.S. team. And there is increasing support inside the Army for fleshing out the advisory teams to about 30 U.S. soldiers each to improve security. In all, that could require as many as 20,000 to 30,000 new advisers, up from the 5,000 now budgeted.

This in turn means that a large U.S. supporting force must remain in Iraq. ISG member Leon Panetta told NEWSWEEK that the group agreed, in a private discussion not included in its report, that about 60,000 to 70,000 U.S. troops would have to stay on after 2008. That includes advisers and the quick-reaction forces needed to protect them, as well as logistical support and Special Operations troops. "So if a team finds themselves at risk," says Maj. Gen. Carter Ham, the commander at Fort Riley, "they can pick up a radio and the cavalry can come to the rescue."

Another question is whether the Fort Riley program is too little, too late. Until six months ago, the training of the Iraqi Army was still fairly slapdash, with U.S. brigade commanders offering up their least-valued soldiers to be detached as advisers. "Some would send us guys they could afford [to lose]," Pittard says. Now the training program has top priority, with a standardized curriculum at Riley, including Arabic-language training—the Army calls it "tactical Iraqi"—and lessons in cultural awareness. "Army resource command is saying, 'OK, who are the best people across the Army to do this?'" says Ham. But he and other top commanders acknowledge that the U.S. Army is so institutionally biased toward fighting its own battles—the "kill-capture mission," as Ham says—that it resisted training advisers for far too long. "Should we have started this sooner? I think all of us would say that," Ham says.

The program could easily go for 10 years before the Iraqi Army is considered competent. "Historically, defeating insurgencies has taken about a decade on average," says Nagl. "And key to that has been training host-nation forces." Some U.S. trainers suggest the Iraqi Army may never be able to operate completely on its own. There are no plans to give the Iraqi Army the kind of superior firepower—helicopters, planes and artillery—that U.S. advisers can call upon. "Our teams will be like reinforcing steel rods in concrete," says Nagl.

On the ground, says Pittard, the basic security strategy is to have what he calls "a FOB within a FOB"—a secure forward operating base for the American advisers within an Iraqi FOB. In practice, this generally means some kind of sealed-off living area. At Combat Outpost Falcon in Ramadi, U.S. and Iraqi units live in sandbagged forts a few paces from one another. All transition-team members are also issued a "personal locator beacon" to stick in the cargo pocket of their pants; this lets their commanders keep track of them in the field. Even so, "if they're not out on the streets with the Iraqi units, it's really hard to advise them," says Lt. Col. Kevin West, a training officer. "You've got to make yourself a little vulnerable to make things work." Pittard says he has no illusions. "I've told our guys: 'Don't be fooled'," he says. "The fact is, we invaded this nation. Under the surface, you're not loved." It remains to be seen whether President Bush will expand the teams as quickly as the ISG wants. The reason? It requires rotating out U.S. combat brigades in Iraq so their officer corps can be trained as advisers. And military trainers say nothing will work without more money for reconstruction, which the administration has slashed. But with many of the other ISG recommendations likely to be discarded—like a new Mideast diplomatic offensive—Fort Riley may well be the last, best hope for America to extricate itself from a quagmire.

Men In Black (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD-When U.S. Army Maj. Mark Brady drives through a once well-heeled section of western Baghdad, he is often greeted by flocks of doves, released in advance of his patrol's arrival. Symbols of peace and welcome? Not here, not now. What they are is a warning signal by militia lookouts that U.S. and Iraqi government forces are in the area.

The doves are the least of Brady's worries. As an adviser to the 5th Brigade of the 6th Iraqi Army Division, he is most concerned about the brigade's own soldiers, who use their cellphones to tip off allies in the militia. It's information that's particularly helpful to members of the Mahdi Army, followers of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who have set up checkpoints and lately stepped up attacks on Sunni enclaves, reprisals for the recent bombings that killed more than 200 in the the capital's Sadr City neighborhood. So now, for operational security, brigade commanders collect soldiers' cellphones before presenting the day's plans. "The cellphones," Brady says, "were killing us."

Tit for tat. As the violence in Baghdad grows worse, the militias are gaining strength, in part by promising safety and services for Iraqis in desperate need of both-and by delivering retribution in the tit-for-tat cycle of sectarian attacks by Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. In its report last week, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group stressed the corrosive effect of Shiite militia activities that "undermine the authority of the Iraqi government and security forces, as well as the ability of Sunnis to join a peaceful political process." Reining in the militias is just one of the hurdles to implementing the panel's prescriptions for national reconciliation (Page 38). The committee's report raises doubts about the willingness and ability of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki even to confront the militia problem: "He owes his office in large part to Sadr and has shown little willingness to take on him or his Mahdi Army."

Taking on the militias will be no easy task, as they are now woven into the fabric of so many communities. "Militias exist when, in the eyes of the people, the standing government isn't providing something-and in this case that something would be security," Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, the senior American commander in Iraq responsible for training and equipping Iraqi security forces, tells U.S. News. "It seems to me that the issue we're all concerned about is the degree of militia influence on serving members of the Army and police."

To complicate matters, the greatest fear among some U.S. military officials here is that some of the militia directives may be coming from within Iraqi government ministries. Col. Steven Duke, a brigade military transition teams commander and adviser to the 6th Iraqi Army Division in Baghdad, cites a raid last month in which company commanders captured two members of the Mahdi Army. Upon hearing of the Mahdi Army connection, Iraqi Army officials turned their new prisoners over to U.S. forces. "They thought they would get pressured by the MOD [Ministry of Defense] to let these guys go," says Duke.

Shaping Up The Iraqi Forces (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

U.S. News Pentagon Correspondent Anna Mulrine recently spoke with Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, the senior American commander in Iraq responsible for training and equipping Iraqi security forces. Excerpts from their discussion:

On dealing with militia infiltration in the Ministry of Interior:

Obedience is extraordinarily important in their value system, far more important than [in] ours. So we've got to get at the leaders. Secondly, militias exist when in the eyes of the people the standing government isn't providing something-and in this case that something would be security. So we've got to continue to demonstrate to the people by accelerated transition to legitimate Iraqi security force control-because the more the Iraqi government can be seen as being in charge, the more the people will gain confidence in them, and the better off we'll be in terms of dealing with the militias.

On more U.S. forces for Baghdad:

It seems to me that we have to watch the balance point there. If we get too many in here and we're perceived as completely owning the problem, then it will retard the development of the legitimate security forces, No. 1. And No. 2, what Iraqi security forces are probably most in need of in their developmental evolution is logistics capability. And to the extent that we bring more U.S. forces in here that draw on our logistics expertise to help ourselves, the less that logistics expertise can be used to help the Iraqi security forces. So I tend to be of the school that what we really need is more Iraqi forces and an increasing capability on their part.

On the precariousness of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki:

The contacts I've had with the prime minister indicate that he's very much in control of his government. But let me sharpen my language a bit there. There's no question in the way this government was formed-where cabinet ministries were negotiated as part of the outcome of the popular vote-that Prime Minister Maliki has had some challenges pulling together a government that could follow a single agenda. And I think those problems persist, but I think he's prevailing, and I think we owe him our support.

On whether Iraq is in a civil war:

As long as the legit security forces remain intact and act in a coherent, responsible way for the betterment of all Iraqis, then I'm not prepared to declare that we've got a civil war on our hands. If the legitimate security forces fragment, polarize, and take sides, then I think we have a problem.

On a phased withdrawal:

They're not going to handle their external security for some time. But we should not abandon them until they're ready to handle their internal security. And then if you want to call that a conditions-based withdrawal, phased, find your own adjectives- but it should be when we've done what we've promised them we're going to do.

Retaking Ramadi: All The Sheik's Men (NSWK)

By Sarah Childress

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - Ramadi's chief of police gazed at his latest graduating class of officers. Three months ago they had been recruited for the force by the leaders of their desert tribes—and now, the chief declared, the newly minted cops were no longer tribal members: they were his men. The cadets nodded solemnly. Their sheiks, watching from the audience, were outraged. Maybe they had finally agreed to lend some of their gunmen to the provincial government, but they never intended to give up actual power. The U.S. forces' liaison, Lt. Col. Jim Lechner, had to spend the next two hours calming them down. "I used a metaphor," he says. "I told them, 'You can't tear the house down and build a new one. But you can help fix this one'."

No part of Iraq needs fixing more desperately than insurgency-ravaged Anbar province and its capital, Ramadi. And U.S. forces are increasingly sure it can't be fixed without the help of tribes who have always been more loyal to their sheiks than to the government. Before the 2003 invasion, Saddam Hussein had to buy the sheiks' support with wealth and special privileges, and Anbar's tribes fought fiercely long after he was gone. Then Al Qaeda muscled in, claiming the Sunni-dominated region and killing sheiks who dared to challenge the jihadists' aims. After one well-known tribal leader was assassinated this summer, a group of 15 Ramadi sheiks banded together for survival's sake. They called themselves Sawa—Arabic for "the awakening"—and cut a deal with the Americans: in exchange for protection against Al Qaeda, they would bring local police ranks up to strength.

They've lived up to that end of the bargain at least. Monthly police enlistments in Ramadi have soared from the low double digits before the deal to the full Coalition quota of 400 a month. Recruits keep pouring in: the Americans had to set up a special 3,000-member Emergency Response Unit to accommodate the flood of volunteers. Elders of the Abu Soda tribe recently helped U.S. forces find IEDs that had been planted by their own tribesmen, and they have identified kidnappers and other local bad guys for the Americans to arrest. Their effectiveness against Al Qaeda is another question: while the Americans say attacks by local resistance fighters in Anbar have dropped by 40 percent, U.S. deaths there have continued at a rate of more than two dozen a month.

Still, Sawa's membership has risen to some 60 tribal leaders. Its founder, Sheik Abdel Sittar, does TV spots to encourage more police recruits. "All the honest people follow me," he says. "The good people. Even some tribes that were with the insurgency follow us." The sheik, who wears alligator shoes beneath his traditional robes, is building a marble-lined council meeting hall (funded by Sawa) inside his compound.

Some lawmakers in Baghdad fear that Sawa could become one more sectarian militia, but Lechner scoffs at such worries. "We would turn that off in a heartbeat," he says. All it would take is a threat to withdraw police protection from the offending sheik's neighborhood. Can Sawa restore law and order in Anbar? The Americans can only hope so. No one seems to have a better plan.

Iraqi President Calls U.S. Report Dangerous And 'An Insult To The People Of Iraq' (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD (AP) — The Iraqi president on Sunday sharply criticized the bipartisan U.S. report calling for a new approach to the war, saying it contained dangerous recommendations that would undermine his country's sovereignty and were "an insult to the people of Iraq."

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd and one of the staunchest U.S. supporters within the Iraqi leadership, also said U.S. training of Iraq's army and police had gone "from failure to failure."

He criticized the recommendation by the Iraq Study Group calling for increasing the number of U.S. troops embedded with Iraqi units to train Iraq's forces from 3,000 to 4,000 currently to 10,000 to 20,000.

"It is not respecting the desire of the Iraqi people to control its army and to be able to rearm and train Iraqi forces under the leadership of the Iraqi government," he said during an interview with several reporters in his office in Baghdad.

Talabani was the most senior government official to take a stand against the report, which has also come under sharp criticism from American conservatives who claim it amounts to a veiled surrender in the war against terror.

Outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, in a surprise farewell visit to U.S. troops in Iraq this weekend, said the consequences of the war's failure would be "unacceptable."

"We feel great urgency to protect the American people from another 9/11 or a 9/11 times two or three. At the same time, we need to have the patience to see this task through to success. The consequences of failure are unacceptable," Rumsfeld said at Asad air base in western Iraq. "The enemy must be defeated."

Talabani said the Iraqi government planned to send a letter to President Bush "expressing our views about the main issues" in the report. He would not elaborate.

"I believe that President George Bush is a brave and committed man and he is adamant to support the Iraqi government until they've reached success," Talabani said. He said setting conditions was "an insult to the people of Iraq."

Talabani's criticism of U.S. training was directed at a key part of the study group's recommendation, which called for accelerated training of Iraqi forces and the withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops by the first quarter of 2008.

Some U.S. military experts have expressed concern that Iraqi forces will not be ready to assume full responsibility for the fighting by then. However, opposition to the war is rising within the United States, increasing pressure on Bush to shift strategy.

A roadside bomb killed one U.S. soldier and wounded another Sunday west of Baghdad, the military said. The death raised to 43 the number of troops who have died this month and pushed the total U.S. military death toll to 2,931 since the war started nearly four years ago.

Talabani said the 2008 date was realistic if the Iraqi government is given more responsibility for security.

"If we can agree with the U.S. government to give us the right of organizing, training, arming our armed forces, it will be possible in 2008 (for U.S.-led forces) to start to leave Iraq and to go back home," he said.

"If you read this report, one would think that it is written for a young, small colony that they are imposing these conditions on," Talabani said. "We are a sovereign country."

He also pointed to the report's call for the approval of a law that would allow thousands of officials from Saddam Hussein's ousted Baath party to return to their jobs.

Meanwhile, sectarian violence raged on the streets of Baghdad on Sunday, with a fresh outburst of retaliatory attacks and clashes between Shiites and Sunnis. At least 83 people were killed or found dead throughout the country, including 59 bullet-riddled bodies that turned up in Baghdad.

Late Saturday, gunmen attacked two Shiite homes in western Baghdad, killing nine men and seriously wounding another, police said. Nobody claimed responsibility for the attack, which police said occurred in the mostly Sunni Arab al-Jihad neighborhood, but it apparently was in retaliation for a bold assault earlier in the day against Sunnis.

Witnesses said Shiite militiamen entered a Sunni enclave in Hurriyah — a predominantly Shiite neighborhood — after Sunnis warned the few Shiites living there to leave or be killed. Heavy machine gun fire was heard on Saturday and three columns of black smoke rose into the sky, the witnesses said on condition of anonymity, also out of concern for their own safety.

Baghdad has been suffering from a series of attacks aimed at driving Sunnis or Shiites out of neighborhoods of the capital where they form a minority. Omar Abdul-Sattar, a member of the Sunni Arab Iraqi Islamic Party, said Sunday that an organized effort was underway in Hurriyah to force Sunnis out, and he accused Iraq's Shiite-led government of doing little to stop the violence.

Abdul-Sattar claimed that during the past five months, more than 300 Sunni families have been displaced from Hurriyah, more than 100 Sunnis killed and 200 wounded, and at least five Sunni mosques burned, along with houses and shops.

Clashes also erupted between Sunni and Shiite militants in Baghdad's mixed western Amil district, a policeman said. One Shiite militiaman was killed and six people — five Sunnis and one Shiite — were wounded, the officer said on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to talk to the media.

The fighting ended with U.S. and Iraqi forces rushing to the area to contain it, he said.

Rumsfeld, casually dressed in a gray jacket and an open-collar shirt, traveled to several different U.S. bases in the country on Sunday, shaking hands and joking with troops.

"For the past six years, I have had the opportunity and, I would say, the privilege, to serve with the greatest military on the face of the Earth," Rumsfeld said to more than 1,200 soldiers and Marines at al-Asad, a sprawling air base in western Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold.

Rumsfeld did not meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki during his visit. He kept the trip low-profile, with his office declining to discuss his itinerary or schedule in detail for security reasons.

U.S. Report Rejected By Iraqi President (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 10 -- Iraqi President Jalal Talabani on Sunday strongly rejected a bipartisan U.S. panel's report on U.S. war strategy in Iraq, calling some of its recommendations "dangerous" and a threat to his country's sovereignty.

"The report does not respect the will of the Iraqis in dealing with their problems," he said in a statement released by his office.

The report by the Iraq Study Group, which was released Wednesday, has drawn criticism from several Iraqi political leaders across sectarian lines. Talabani, a Kurd, is the highest-ranking political leader to oppose the study.

Talabani was particularly critical of recommendations to embed thousands of U.S. troops with Iraqi security forces to train and advise them, to centralize control of the country's oil revenue and to allow former loyalists of deposed president Saddam Hussein back into their old government jobs.

"I think that the report is unjust and unfair and contains some dangerous articles which reduce the sovereignty of Iraq and its constitution," he said, according to a Washington Post translation of his comments.

The Iraq Study Group said most U.S. troops should be withdrawn by early 2008. Talabani demanded that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki be given full control over Iraqi security forces before then.

"The report does not respect the will of the Iraqi people in controlling its army and its capability to arm and train the army," he said.

Maliki's political adviser said Sunday that the prime minister had not yet formed an opinion on Talabani's statements. "It's too early to speak for the prime minister to say he's concerned about this point or that point," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, the adviser.

Talabani criticized the report's recommendation that the government reconcile with former enemies, including members of Hussein's Baath Party.

When asked about Talabani's comments on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday, former secretary of state James A. Baker III, who co-chaired the study group, said the war would be won politically, not militarily. "And a part of that is national reconciliation, and amnesty is a big part of national reconciliation," he said.

Talabani embraced the group's recommendation that the United States and Iraq engage in talks with Iraq's neighbors, especially Iran and Syria. The Bush administration has been reluctant to do so.

Iraq has already opened the lines of communication with both countries. Last month, Talabani met with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran. On Sunday, he said he planned to make an official visit to Syria but did not specify when.

As Talabani criticized the report, Saudi Arabia's foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, praised it for emphasizing the need to focus more attention on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and reexamine the Iraqi constitution, which he said has divided the sects vying for power, according to wire reports of comments he made in Riyadh.

Over the weekend, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld visited American troops in Iraq to thank them for their service.

Speaking to about 1,200 soldiers and Marines at an air base in the volatile western province of Anbar on Saturday, Rumsfeld acknowledged that the United States had become polarized over the war but said the country must finish its work.

"These public debates may be heated or even nasty. But that's not new . . . I can say that it has always been so, and particularly so during wartime," he said, according to the Department of Defense's Web site. "But we ought not confuse the political debate that takes place at home with a wavering of support or appreciation for your service or your achievements."

On Sunday, a soldier was killed and another wounded when a roadside bomb detonated near their patrol as it was finishing an early-morning security mission west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

Iraqi President Denounces U.S. Strategy On Security (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 10 — President Jalal Talabani said Sunday that the American program to train Iraq's security forces had been a repeated failure and he denounced a plan to increase the number of American advisers working with the Iraqi Army, saying it would subvert the country's sovereignty.

Mr. Talabani's remarks, in an interview with Western news service reporters that was summarized and distributed by his office, amounted to an extraordinarily harsh denunciation of a central American strategy in Iraq and challenged a major recommendation by the Iraq Study Group in Washington. He is the highest-ranking Iraqi official to criticize the report, adding to anger among Iraqi leaders who have disagreed with some of its recommendations.

American commanders have poured more than $12 billion into training and equipping Iraq's security forces and have tied a withdrawal of American troops to success in these efforts. But Mr. Talabani ridiculed them. "What have they done so far in training the army and the police?" he said. "What they have done is move from failure to failure."

Mr. Talabani, who is Kurdish, said the Iraq Study Group report offered some "very dangerous" recommendations that undermined the country's ability to control its own army and police force and threatened Iraq's sovereignty.

He did not offer specific criticisms of the American training program, except to say that the Americans had inadequately screened recruits to the Shiite-dominated police force to ensure their loyalties to the state rather than to a sect.

American and some Iraqi officials say some Iraqi police and army units are more beholden to Shiite militias than to the government and have helped to drive the cycles of retributive violence by attacking Sunni Arabs. Some Iraqi officials have also said that Sunni Arab officers have abetted the Sunni-led insurgency.

The Americans, Mr. Talabani said, "gathered them from the street regardless of their loyalty to the new Iraq, their capacity, their ability. These mistakes would be repeated if the Iraqi Army would be under the control of foreign officers, and we would never accept it."

His remarks were likely to dismay the American leadership, which has regarded him as one of its more reliable and like-minded partners here.

The Iraq Study Group called for increasing the number of American trainers to as many as 20,000 from the current level of more than 4,000, in the hope that it would help Iraqi units move more quickly to assume full control of the nation's security.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, told Congress last month that he envisioned doubling the number of American trainers, but senior military officers now say they are planning to at least triple the number.

The shift has been endorsed in general terms by President Bush, and in recent weeks, commanders in Iraq have started moving hundreds of combat troops to training teams.

American commanders have argued that expanding the training teams would allow trainers to work more closely with Iraqi soldiers and police officers. In addition, trainers would be able to watch more closely for sectarian biases and abuses.

But Mr. Talabani said the proliferation of American advisers threatened Iraq's control of the security forces and violated its sovereignty.

"What would it mean for Iraqi sovereignty if the army became a tool in the hands of officers coming from outside the country?" he said. "We want our hands to be free, not paralyzed, in fighting terror."

Mr. Talabani's attack on the Iraq Study Group report was wide-ranging and vociferous.

He criticized a recommendation for a law that would allow some former members of the outlawed Baath Party to return to government. The measure would reverse a "de-Baathification" process that has marginalized thousands of Sunni Arabs who worked in the Baathist government of Saddam Hussein.

He also said he supported a statement issued Thursday by Massoud Barzani, the president of the Kurdistan region, who objected to elements of the report that could weaken Kurdish autonomy by delaying an opportunity for the Kurds to govern the contested oil city of Kirkuk, and by giving the central government control over all oil revenue.

Mr. Talabani bristled at the report's recommendation that a continuation of American military and financial assistance to Iraq be contingent on Iraqi performance. Setting conditions, he said, "was an insult to the people of Iraq."

The leaders of the Iraq Study Group, James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, defended their report on Sunday against Mr. Talabani's attack. "Up until this point, we've given a blank check to the Iraqis," Mr. Hamilton said on CNN. "And I'm not surprised that the president would like that sort of a deal. But we believe that the American people want our aid to be conditional. We want that aid to be given only if there is a response from the Iraqi government that shows performance."

Mr. Baker called Mr. Talabani's comments "disappointing" but said that unless Iraq's leaders could unite under a national reconciliation plan, the world could expect "not just a broad-based civil war but a wider regional war."

Sectarian violence continued on Sunday. Gun battles broke out between Sunni and Shiite militias in a predominantly Shiite enclave of Al Amil, a neighborhood in southwestern Baghdad. The police said at least five people were killed. Gunmen stormed a home in Jihad, a mostly Sunni Arab neighborhood in southwestern Baghdad, killing nine people, an Interior Ministry official said.

The attacks came a day after gangs of armed Shiite militiamen rampaged through Hurriya, a mixed neighborhood in north-central Baghdad, driving scores of Sunni Arabs from their homes in what a Sunni colonel in the Iraqi Army described as one of the most flagrant episodes of sectarian warfare in the capital.

The police reported Sunday that they had found five bodies near a mosque in the neighborhood, all presumably victims of the Shiite attack on Saturday. At least 46 other corpses were found by the authorities elsewhere in the capital.

Agence France-Presse reported that Iraqi authorities had detained the chief of the prison in Badush, near Mosul, in connection with the escape of Ayman Sabawi, Mr. Hussein's nephew, on Saturday.

The American military command said Sunday that an American soldier was killed and another wounded when a bomb exploded next to their patrol west of the capital.

The departing defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, said during a two-day visit to Iraq that American troops should remain there until "the enemy" was defeated.

“We feel great urgency to protect the American people from another 9/11 or a 9/11 times two or three,” Mr. Rumsfeld said Saturday, in remarks that were posted Sunday on the Defense Department’s Web site.

Iraqi Leader Denounces Report (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's president lashed out at the Iraq Study Group report Sunday, saying it undermines his nation's sovereignty and constitution and "works against Iraq's long struggle against dictatorship."

President Jalal Talabani, head of state for two consecutive Iraqi governments and a longtime U.S. ally, accused the bipartisan U.S. commission of condescension and ignorance.

"They are dealing with us as if we are an emerging colony, doing whatever they like," Talabani said.

The report, on ways to end the war, is "not fair, not just," he said. "I think it contains some very dangerous articles."

The president balked at such key proposals as the commission's suggestion that Iraq further strengthen and centralize government authority in Baghdad and that it strip provincial governments of authority over Iraqi security forces.

He also criticized recommendations to postpone a Kurdish bid for control over the northern oil hub of Kirkuk, to double or triple the number of U.S. trainers traveling with Iraqi army and police units, and to weaken a law that bans members of Iraq's former Baath Party from holding government jobs.

"No for the return of Saddam's Baath Party," Talabani said. "This is against the constitution, and those who are negotiating to bring them back are violating the constitution."

Talabani's criticisms could lend support to Bush administration critics of the commission findings and to some conservatives who have called the study a plan for capitulation.

Talabani also took a swipe at former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a Republican who, along with former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), led the commission.

Under President George H.W. Bush, Baker argued against toppling Saddam Hussein during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, and against supporting uprisings in the Kurdish north and the Shiite south, which Hussein then crushed.

"We detect from this report the same stance Baker took before the war when they decided to liberate Kuwait and left Saddam in Baghdad," said Talabani, whose Kurdish militia fought against Hussein's rule for decades. "Generally, I reject this report."

Some of the Iraqi president's complaints echoed those of Massoud Barzani, the president of the semiautonomous Kurdistan region in northern Iraq, who last week rejected the report's proposal to centralize oil revenue. Oil-rich Kurdistan is in the process of negotiating several deals with international petroleum exploration firms.

Talabani plays a unique role in Iraqi politics, bridging the divide between the Kurdish regional government and the national government.

The president also has a long relationship with the United States that began during his days as a member of the peshmerga, a Kurdish paramilitary force that opposed Hussein's government and received protection from the no-fly zone established by U.S. forces after the Gulf War.

But Iraqi politicians say Talabani's anger over the Iraq Study Group report represented something larger than a factional point of view.

Talabani's disagreements with the commission findings are partly shared by Iraqi Shiite leaders such as Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and Abdelaziz Hakim, who leads the powerful Shiite political party the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

During a Sunday interview on CNN's "Late Edition With Wolf Blitzer," Hakim voiced opposition to the commission's recommendation to avoid regionalizing governmental control and instead to centralize authority in Baghdad.

Hakim has advocated voting on whether to create a Shiite regional authority in oil-rich southern Iraq, a move Sunni Arabs oppose.

Hakim and other Shiite leaders, including Maliki, have argued against the report's contention that Iraq should allow more Baathists to rejoin the government.

Talabani and Maliki are also wary of increasing the number of U.S. military trainers and assigning them to Iraqi units as a way to root out death squads and corruption and to accelerate the development of Iraqi troops.

"These so-called trainers with various Iraqi army units would undermine the sovereignty of the Iraqi state," said Hiwa Osman, Talabani's spokesman. "If every small unit has an Iraqi commander and an American 'trainer,' who do you think will be in charge?"

Mahmoud Othman, an Iraqi legislator and a Kurdish ally of Talabani, said that the Iraq Study Group findings could derail painstaking efforts to find consensus among Iraq's fractious ethnic and sectarian groups.

Othman said he feared that the report would endanger talks between Kurds and central government officials over oil profit-sharing, and cease-fire talks between Iraq's government and Sunni Arab insurgents.

"The top leaders inside and outside of the government have become less flexible because of this report," he said. "The Sunni Arabs think that they are supported by this report, and this will make it harder to reach consensus. They have not attended reconciliation meetings since this report came out."

Othman also objected to the report's recommendation to negotiate with Muqtada Sadr, leader of the Al Mahdi militia.

"Sadr is leading a militia that is the most dangerous group on the street," he said. "They didn't try to be practical."

Talabani vowed to send the White House a letter formally expressing his reservations about the panel's findings.

Meanwhile, Iraqi police in Baghdad reported the discovery of 60 bodies. Three of the victims had been beheaded, and their bodies were found in the Hurriya neighborhood, where Shiite militiamen and Sunni Arab gunmen had clashed Saturday.

A bomb blast killed a U.S. soldier and wounded another soldier in west Baghdad.

In Saqlawiya, west of Baghdad, U.S. Marines killed three suspected insurgents attempting to plant a bomb beneath a tractor-trailer.

And in eastern Diyala province, north of Baghdad, gunmen opened fire on a wedding party, killing a man and his 3-year-old grandson.

On Saturday night, U.S. forces in Ramadi staged an airstrike on two suspected insurgents who were detonating a bomb.

Talks Under Way To Replace Iraq PM (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi And Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, December 11, 2006

Major partners in Iraq's governing coalition are in behind-the-scenes talks to oust Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki amid discontent over his failure to quell raging violence, according to lawmakers involved.

The talks are aimed at forming a new parliamentary bloc that would seek to replace the current government and that would likely exclude supporters of the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who is a vehement opponent of the U.S. military presence.

The new alliance would be led by senior Shiite politician Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who met with President Bush last week. Al-Hakim, however, was not expected to be the next prime minister because he prefers the role of powerbroker, staying above the grinding day-to-day running of the country.

A key figure in the proposed alliance, Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni Arab, left for Washington on Sunday for a meeting with Bush at least three weeks ahead of schedule.

"The failure of the government has forced us into this in the hope that it can provide a solution," said Omar Abdul-Sattar, a lawmaker from al-Hashemi's Iraqi Islamic Party. "The new alliance will form the new government."

The groups engaged in talks have yet to agree on a leader, said lawmaker Hameed Maalah, a senior official of al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI.

One likely candidate for prime minister, however, was said to be Iraq's other vice president, Adil Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite who was al-Hakim's choice for the prime minister's job before al-Maliki emerged as a compromise candidate and won.

News of the bid to oust al-Maliki, in office since May, came amid growing dissent over his government's performance among his Sunni and Shiite partners and the damaging fallout from a leaked White House memo questioning the prime minister's abilities.

Washington also has been unhappy with al-Maliki's reluctance to comply with its repeated demands to disband Shiite militias blamed for much of Iraq's sectarian bloodletting.

Bush publicly expressed his confidence in al-Maliki after talks in Jordan on Nov. 30. But the president told White House reporters four days later that he was not satisfied with the pace of efforts to stop Iraq's violence.

It was not immediately clear how much progress had been made in the effort to cobble together a new parliamentary alliance. But lawmakers loyal to al-Sadr who support al-Maliki were almost certainly not going to be a part of it. They had no word on al-Maliki's Dawa party.

They said al-Maliki was livid at the attempt to unseat him.

"We know what's going on and we will sabotage it," said a close al-Maliki aide who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivities involved. He did not elaborate.

A senior aide to al-Sadr, who insisted on anonymity for the same reason, said the proposed alliance was primarily designed to exclude the cleric's backers and they would resist.

Al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militiamen fought U.S. troops for much of 2004 in Baghdad and across central and southern Iraq. It is blamed for most of the sectarian violence raging in Iraq.

The cleric's supporters have been among al-Maliki's strongest backers, ensuring his election as prime minister. Relations have recently frayed, however, with the 30 Sadrist lawmakers and five Cabinet ministers boycotting the government and parliament to protest al-Maliki's meeting with Bush in Jordan.

The al-Sadr aide said recent contacts with the office of Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, spiritual leader of most Iraqi Shiites, indicated the Iranian-born al-Sistani was not averse to replacing al-Maliki. Al-Sistani issued an unusually harsh criticism of the government in July.

Al-Hakim's SCIRI, along with parliament's Kurdish bloc and al-Hashemi's Islamic party, are likely to be the major powers of the new alliance. Independent lawmakers are also expected to join, legislators said.

Al-Hashemi's Islamic party said Sunday it would not join any future government unless it had a real voice.

Mahmoud Othman, a prominent Kurdish lawmaker and a sharp government critic, said talks on a new parliamentary alliance were initiated early this year, abandoned and recently resumed.

"This government must offer a remedy for all the problems we have in Iraq or publicly announce that it's unable to do so," said Othman, who is close to the negotiations.

Al-Maliki's government, under the Iraqi constitution, could be ousted if a simple majority of parliament's 275 members opposed it in a vote of confidence. Parties in the talks expressed confidence they had enough votes.

"The question of confidence in this government must be reconsidered," Parliament Speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni Arab, told legislators Sunday. "Why should we continue to support it? For its failure?"

For Iraq's Sunnis, Conflict Closes In (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 10 -- A few blocks from Ali Farouk's three-story home, an empty house provides a glimpse of what he fears will be the future. Once owned by a Sunni Muslim, the paint is peeling, the windows are blown out. Two scarlet X's mark the pale blue front door.

To the door's right are the words: "Not for Sale. Wanted."

According to neighbors, "Wanted" refers to the former owner, who fled after crossing paths with the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia of firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The gunmen accused the owner of killing four of their own at a checkpoint. Then they took over his house.

To the door's left, the words: "This is vengeance for the other day."

Farouk, a Sunni Muslim, fears his home might be targeted next. In the past two months, Shiite militiamen have tightened their grip on his central Baghdad neighborhood of Tobji, purging dozens of Sunni families, by fear and by threats. His world has become even more precarious since a barrage of car bombs, mortar shells and missiles killed more than 200 on Nov. 23 in Sadr City, the Baghdad slum that is home to many of Sadr's loyalists.

So Farouk began preparing to do what neither his father nor his grandfather could have imagined in their Iraq: flee Tobji, an enclave where Shiites and Sunnis have coexisted for more than half a century. Farouk plans to join the more than 400,000 Iraqis who have fled their homes, an exodus that is reshaping the face of Baghdad into neighborhoods polarized along sectarian lines.

On Saturday, Farouk's mission grew more urgent. In the latest spasm of revenge attacks, gangs of Shiite gunmen stormed Hurriyah, a mixed neighborhood adjacent to Tobji, torching houses, killing at least two Sunni Arabs and driving out dozens of Sunni families. On Sunday, in interviews across Tobji, Sunni Arabs worried that their fate could soon mirror their brethren's.

"It is coming like a wave," said Khudir Mahmoud, 32, after his midday prayers. "If the government doesn't intervene, the wave will reach here. We are only one street away."

The unraveling of Tobji and Hurriyah is the latest setback for the nation's Sunni minority, which is still seeking a political foothold in Iraq in the fourth year of war. Sunnis were once part of the country's privileged class, with government jobs, but their days and nights are now filled with fear and dread unlike anything they felt since the toppling of President Saddam Hussein.

"We are stuck in a big hole waiting for Lucifer to take our souls," said Farouk, 46, a father of seven. "At any moment we can die."Worry Despite Precautions

Rabiaa Street, a dusty, congested thoroughfare, flows through central Baghdad west of the Tigris River. Along one stretch, near a patch of machinery shops, Hurriyah and Tobji face each other across the street. In Arabic, Hurriyah means freedom. Tobji's official name is Salaam. It means peace.

On one side, the road streams into Hurriyah's core, past a Sunni mosque that was destroyed, past a satellite office of Sadr, where clusters of young men lingered, past signs that read "Long Live Shia."

On the other side of Rabiaa Street is a set of railroad tracks nestled on the edge of Tobji, a working-class community of Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds. In recent months, bodies of both Shiites and Sunnis have been dumped along the tracks, residents said Sunday. The killings are evidence of how the war to control the capital is spreading and how Shiite militiamen are increasingly pushing into western Baghdad, where Sunnis dominate.

Farouk's house sits in the heart of Tobji, around the corner from walls with black markings that read "Long Live Sadr." He is burly, with a long, oval face and a thin gray mustache, one of three Sunnis who live on the block.

He met a journalist first on Nov. 30, a week after the Sadr City attacks, on the condition that his father's, grandfather's and tribe's names not be used. Farouk is his great-grandfather's name. He told his Shiite neighbors that he was receiving a visit from co-workers at the government ministry where he is employed.

Even with those precautions, he was worried. Fearful of attracting attention, he rushed his visitor to the second-floor living room of his house. At the top of the narrow staircase, a large poster of Imam Ali, the most revered Shiite saint, along with several other important Shiite figures, stared from a wall. Farouk said he put up the posters the day of the Sadr City attacks -- in case Shiite militiamen came that night. He has no plans to take them down, he said.

"I am scared. I am Sunni," he said that day.A Showcase of Dangers

In the 1950s, Farouk's Sunni father moved to Tobji. Farouk's mother was a Shiite, and his first name, Ali, is given to both Shiites and Sunnis. He went to school with Shiites and had Shiite friends. Neither sect nor ethnicity defined his identity, even when Hussein, a Sunni, brutally oppressed the Shiite community after he took power.

The war didn't reach Tobji in full force until this year. In January, gunmen wearing police uniforms and driving police vehicles abducted 53 Sunnis. Most were never seen again. The next month, a Shiite shrine in the town of Samarra was bombed, triggering cycles of revenge killings.

Mixed neighborhoods across Baghdad, including this one, started to rip apart. Still, after each attack, Tobji managed to heal momentarily, because of a tribal leadership of Sunnis and Shiites that is struggling to preserve the bonds between their communities.

Today, the last mile to Farouk's house is a showcase of the danger that threatens to overtake their efforts. Around the corner from an Iraqi army checkpoint, young men wearing dark clothes and clutching AK-47 assault rifles stand guard, a testament to the fact that they, not the Iraqi soldiers, are in charge. Some clutch black two-way radios; others stare fixedly into cars. On Sunday, one man stood in the middle of the street with a small piece of white paper, checking the license plates of cars.

The affiliation of the men with guns can be discerned by looking at a nearby concrete barrier. Scrawled in red paint are words boldly expressed in Arabic: "Yes for the Mahdi Army."

Women in black, head-to-toe abayas float like shadows in the sun here. A few blocks away, residents walk past the empty, disfigured house of the Sunni Arab without casting a glance. On a visit four weeks ago, Mahdi Army militiamen, including one who sat in a yellow plastic chair in the middle of the road, stopped cars and demanded:

"Why are you here? What is your tribe?"A Shiite, Killed in Error

His tribal name didn't help Khelan Jassim Muhammed, 46, a grocer and father of six girls, from becoming a victim of the killing in Hurriyah.

Two weeks ago, he moved from Tobji to Hurriyah to occupy a house left empty by relatives who had moved to the United Arab Emirates. Muhammed, his relatives said, felt safe. He was a Shiite from the Ajaeli tribe.

Last Wednesday, he left his home in the morning and never returned. After a frantic search, his brothers found his body the next morning in the morgue. His corpse had been discovered in a trash dump in a Shiite neighborhood.

"He was handcuffed from the back and had two bullets holes in the back of his head," Khatan Jassim, 41, one of his brothers, said Sunday. As he finished the sentence, silence fell upon his family's spare, white-lit living room, where seven relatives were seated in a semicircle. Before they sat down on a large red carpet, they said a prayer, their palms facing upward in the Shiite tradition. They had lived all their lives in Tobji, just down the road from the empty Sunni Arab house.

Khatan Jassim, a taxi driver with a wide nose, thick neck and sun-leathered skin, said his brother's death bore the trademark of the Mahdi Army.

There are Sunnis and Shiites in the Ajaeli tribe, he explained. His brother, he added, was also carrying an identification card issued in Abu Ghraib, a Sunni area.

"There was a misunderstanding from the Sadr office," Jassim said. "They didn't know he was a Shia."

At the funeral, Sadr's representatives came to offer their condolences. Jassim confronted them. They denied any involvement.

"They gave us an excuse," Jassim recalled. "They said, 'Why would we kidnap him and dump his body in a dumpster? We control the neighborhood. We could have gone inside his house and killed him.' "A Feeling of Siege

Across the street from the concrete barrier with the Mahdi Army proclamation, 25 Sunnis gathered Sunday at the Suhail Mosque for midday prayers. Young and old, they prayed solemnly, their hands at their side. Their small numbers spoke of their fears.

"This is half of what it used to be," said Khalid Mahmoud, 45, a mosque official and Khudir Mahmoud's brother. "People are staying home. They are worried about their security. Even if they come, their minds will be preoccupied."

"Most of the Sunnis here feel like they are under siege," he added.

As Mahmoud spoke, Abdul Wahad, 26, nodded in agreement. Dressed in a blue and orange Puma tracksuit jacket, he said he no longer hangs out on the streets. He has stopped pursuing his degree in economics because he's worried about getting killed.

"We don't trust the checkpoints," he said.

Added Khalid Mahmoud, "After the Sadr City bombings, none of us have left Tobji."

Ten days ago, three Sunnis were kidnapped, including the brother of the mosque's custodian. He still hasn't been found. On Sunday, Khudir Mahmoud sent a woman to the morgue to inquire whether his body had turned up. He was too afraid to go by himself because the Health Ministry is controlled by Shiites loyal to Sadr. The custodian now plans to quit and move his family to Samarra.'I Am Like a Prisoner'

On the day Sadr City was attacked, a Shiite friend a few blocks away phoned Farouk to warn that Shiite militiamen were rumored to be roaming Tobji in search of Sunni men. He invited Farouk to stay at his house. Farouk and his two grown sons gratefully accepted. His wife and five smaller children stayed behind. The next day, Farouk and his sons returned. He loaded his AK-47 and kept it in his bedroom.

The day after a three-day curfew was lifted, Farouk went to work, switching taxis in case he was being followed. He was stopped at a checkpoint, he said. A Shiite policeman asked whether he was a Sunni or Shiite. Farouk replied that he was Iraqi, then flashed his government identification card. "You son of dogs," the policeman said but waved him through.

For the next three days, Farouk stayed inside his house. "I can't even walk to the main street," he said Nov. 30. "At 6 p.m., I lock my door and stay inside."

At night, the family slept together in the living room while Farouk kept watch for a possible attack. One night, a sound on the roof sent him rushing up with his gun. It was water dropping into a tank. "I am like a prisoner," he said.

In the living room that day, Farouk was expressing anger at the United States for invading Iraq, for disenfranchising the Sunnis. Listening in was his nephew, Ihab Bashir, 30. Farouk framed his plight in political terms, blaming the Shiite-led government for settling scores from the past. "There is no democracy," Farouk said, shaking his head in dismay.

Farouk's 10-year-old son, Omar, entered the living room. Thin with an angular face, he wore jeans and a yellow shirt. When asked his name, he replied in a voice not much louder than a whisper: "Amar."

Amar is a common Shiite name. Farouk had instructed him to lie about his name to strangers. Why didn't he use his real name?

"Because of those people, the Mahdi Army," Omar said.

Why is his father still staying at home?

Omar paused. "Perhaps the Mahdi Army will come and raid the Sunni homes and kill him."

Seven video compact disc recordings of Sadr's sermons, his stern, bearded visage splashed on every cover, sat on the brown sofa. Farouk's 15-year-old son had bought them the day after the curfew. When he came home, he slipped one of the discs into the VCD player and turned up the volume so all the family's Shiite neighbors could hear.

Omar pointed at them and said, "We have those VCDs for the Mahdi Army not to hurt us."Inviting the Neighbors Over Farouk's plan is to flee to Baqubah, the capital of Diyala province, one of the most violent places in Iraq. He said he does not care about the danger. His sect is the majority there. Just as the Shiites turn to the militias for protection, he now views the Sunni Arab insurgents as his family's guardians.

"The mujaheddin will protect us," Farouk said. "We heard they are helping Sunnis who move there with cooking oil, rice, sugar and fuel."

In the interim, he's decided that the best protection is to rekindle his ties to his Shiite neighbors. In recent days, he has invited some of them to have soda or tea inside his house. He hopes they will notice the poster of Imam Ali. He hopes they will vouch for him if the Mahdi Army attacks.

"I tell everyone that my mother is a Shiite," Farouk said. "I am trying to get closer to them. It's about saving my life."

On Sunday, Farouk was still bracing for a Shiite attack. Two days ago, he bought another poster of Imam Ali and other revered Shiite saints for the living room.

Iraq Is Failing To Spend Billions In Oil Revenues (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 10 — Iraq is failing to spend billions of dollars of oil revenues that have been set aside to rebuild its damaged roads, schools and power stations and to repair refineries and pipelines.

Iraqi ministries are spending as little as 15 percent of the 2006 capital budgets they received for the rebuilding — with some of the weakest spending taking place at the Oil Ministry, which relies on damaged and frequently sabotaged pipelines and pumping stations to move the oil that provides nearly all of the country's revenues. In essence, the money is available — despite extensive sabotage, the oil money is flowing — but the Iraqi system has not been able to put it to work.

The country is facing this national failure to spend even as American financial support dwindles. Among reasons for the problems — like a large turnover in government personnel — is a strange new one: bureaucrats are so fearful and confused by anticorruption measures put in place by the American and Iraqi governments that they are afraid to sign off on contracts.

The inability to spend the money raises serious questions for the government, which has to demonstrate to citizens who are skeptical and suspicious of government corruption that it can improve basic services, and that at a time when American funds for reconstruction are being reduced, it can prove to other foreign donors that it can quickly put to use the money they may be willing to commit.

After the expenditure of roughly $22 billion in American taxpayer dollars on Iraq reconstruction, the increase of the Iraqi capital budget was seen by many as a sign that oil revenues could finally begin paying for the rebuilding, four years after Bush administration predictions that the country could afford the program on its own.

Iraq's overall capital budget in 2006 was nine trillion Iraqi dinars, or about $6 billion, said Abdulbasit Turki Saeed, president of the Iraqi Board of Supreme Audit and a member of the Iraqi cabinet's economic committee.

But Mr. Saeed said that across the entire government, only about 20 percent of the capital budget had been spent, according to the committee's recent figures. A senior Western official agreed with that estimate.

"It's slow. It's disappointing," the Western official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the subject publicly. "In general, they have had trouble getting projects started."

The problem was briefly acknowledged in the report last week by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which gave similar figures for capital expenditures and said that "many ministries can do little more than pay salaries."

In interviews, alarmed Western and Iraqi officials sought to put the best face on the problem, saying they thought that the pace of spending had picked up in the last two to three months as the government began taking steps to improve its performance.

Those officials said that in a nation with reconstruction needs around every corner, the puzzling phenomenon of unspent money was partly explained by the rapid turnover in governments, security woes, endemic corruption and a lack of technocrats skilled at jobs like writing contracts and managing complex projects. In short, nearly all the ills that have undermined the American rebuilding program seem to be plaguing the Iraqi one.

Hussain al-Shahristani, the Iraqi oil minister, said he thought that he could spend substantially more of this year's budget if he could resolve administrative bottlenecks, like Finance Ministry delays in authorizing payments.

"It's the bureaucracy," Mr. Shahristani said. "Particularly financial people take too long to change their old habits."

But some American and Iraqi officials here are also saying that the stringent measures they had favored to slow the rampant corruption may be especially daunting for bureaucrats who have little experience with Western-style regulations and oversight. Those officials say that Iraqis who have seen their colleagues arrested and jailed in anticorruption sweeps are reluctant to put their own name on a contract.

"As it's applied right now, this new thing scares the hell out of everybody," one Western official here said.

The colliding priorities of oversight and spending have left American and Iraqi officials in a quandary as they work behind the scenes on the so-called "Compact with Iraq" — the centerpiece of the American Embassy's effort to create economic and political milestones that this nation promises to meet in exchange for pledges of foreign investment and support.

Anticorruption officials themselves are facing a loss of support, with the most serious impact felt by Rathi al-Rathi, the head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, who has been privately accused by Western and Iraqi officials of zealotry, political bias and other failings.

A previously undisclosed letter to Mr. Rathi from prime minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, dated Sept. 6, is close to an accusation that Mr. Rathi himself is guilty of corruption. The letter, a copy of which was provided to The New York Times, directs him to account for what the prime minister asserts are hundreds of thousands of dollars of undocumented expenses by the commission.

Ali al-Shabot, a spokesman for Mr. Rathi, who was traveling last week, at first insisted that the letter was secret and that he could not discuss it. But finally he dismissed its charges as based on bad information. Mr. Shabot indicated there was at least one good reason that, despite the pressure, the commission would remain in business. He confidently pointed out that international donors who provide financing to Iraq do so "with the guarantee that there are institutions to oversee the money."

While it is clear that new financial support is unlikely without a strong anticorruption campaign in place, Iraq's inability to spend its own money undermines the message that the country will actually be able to use the support if provided.

"People we are trying to deal with and obtain additional funds for Iraq will come back and say, 'Iraq is not spending its own resources,' " said Yahia Said, a research fellow at the London School of Economics who is working as a consultant to the United Nations on the compact.

Mr. Shahristani, the oil minister, who has put new anticorruption measures in place on top of those imposed from the outside, said the solution was to teach the bureaucrats how to cope with the new rules.

"Obviously I've heard of these complaints," he said of the criticisms of the anticorruption organizations. "I don't think that they have gone too far. I think this is necessary given the level of corruption that we have inherited."

Iraq's total budget is about $32 billion in 2006 and is projected to be more than $40 billion in 2007, said Bayan Jabr, the Iraqi finance minister, in an interview. Most of the budget, which comes almost entirely from oil revenues, is consumed in operating expenses, including roughly $8 billion for ministry salaries and pensions and $6 billion for Iraq's socialist-style food and fuel subsidies.

The nation has spent those funds much more easily than it has spent the $6 billion for capital improvements — a number that by some projections could roughly double next year in view of Iraq's vast infrastructure needs.

According to a report by the Oil Ministry, about half of the money was to go for repair of pipelines, building refineries, improving oil fields, repairs on export terminals, and other improvements to the oil industry. The remainder was to be spent on projects ranging from improving the electrical system to irrigation systems to roads and government buildings of various types.

The same report says that, for example, Iraq is in need of major new oil storage tanks, a 42-inch-diameter pipeline in the south and better electrical generation to run the oil pumps.

Officials are still sorting out what went wrong in the early months of the 2006 program, but some of the problems were similar in kind if not in detail to the ones that derailed major portions of the American effort.

First, after the December 2005 elections, politicians jockeyed for ministerial posts for months, creating uncertainty about whether priorities would change, and then the newly seated officials were unfamiliar with their jobs. At the same time, deepening security problems not only made purchasing and construction difficult, but also continued to drive skilled midlevel ministry employees out of the country.

Final numbers across the ministries will not be available until year's end, but Mr. Jabr, the finance minister, said that a few trends had emerged. Expenditures at the Housing and Construction Ministry and the Oil Ministry were low, while at the other end of the spectrum, the Electricity and Water Resources Ministries were spending as much as three-quarters of their allocations.

But the overall picture is clear, said Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, who as commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq works extensively with the Interior and Defense Ministries, which he expects to spend about half of their capital budgets this year.

"I think the government of Iraq has got a challenge writ large," General Dempsey said. "The 27 ministries will not execute their 2006 budgets."

American and Iraqi officials are already taking steps to improve the situation, streamlining the contracting process, giving training sessions on the process to ministry employees and, Mr. Jabr said, putting in place measures to penalize ministries that do not spend money fast enough.

General Dempsey said the unspent money in the security ministries in 2006 would not be lost, because Iraq had agreed to allow the funds to be held in the same foreign accounts that are used to coordinate the Pentagon's military purchases until the agencies were ready to use it.

As the financial and political stakes rise within the Iraqi-financed rebuilding program, few officials have escaped blame.

The public integrity commission is cited most often as intimidating. But those who deal with investigations of questionable deals and officials on the take in a historically corrupt country are not surprised by those complaints. "This is normal," said Mr. Shabot, the integrity commission spokesman. "They hate us because we are monitoring them."

Mr. Jabr expressed deep impatience with ministry officials who, he said, told him that part of the reason they were moving so slowing was to avoid running afoul of the integrity commission.

"I said, 'Why are you afraid? If you are not a thief, don't be afraid,' " Mr. Jabr recalled.

Ex-hostages In Iraq Opt For Forgiveness (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley And Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104414

LONDON AND CAIRO

Three pacifists who were held hostage for 118 days in Iraq and were released only after a fourth colleague was murdered, publicly forgave their captors Friday.

At a press conference in London, the members of the Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT) said they were reluctant to testify against four alleged captors in Iraqi custody because of the possibility that they will face harsh punishment, especially the death penalty.

Canadian James Loney, Briton Norman Kember, and Canadian Harmeet Singh Sooden, who now lives in New Zealand, said they did not want "punitive" justice for their suspected captors, scheduled to stand trial early next year.

"Justice is about restoring relationships that have been broken," says Mr. Loney. "We are very, very concerned about the death penalty. It would be the worst possible outcome for us if they were to be sentenced to death."

"To lock then up and throw way the key," he says, "that is not justice. Punishment comes from the same mind-set that is behind the escalating spiral of violence that we see in Iraq that is being fueled by the governments in Washington and London. If they are punishing them on my behalf, that doesn't do anything for me."

Loney was a member of the four-man CPT unit seized outside a mosque in Baghdad on Nov. 26 last year. The lone American member, Tom Fox, was killed by their captors. The kidnappers, a group of Sunni Arab insurgents, appeared to have ties to the kidnappers of Jill Carroll, a Christian Science Monitor reporter who was held for 82 days earlier this year following the murder of her translator Allan Enwiya.

After Ms. Carroll was freed from captivity, she revealed that one of her captors said they had killed an American because the US had failed to meet a demand to release Sheikh Omar Abdel-Rahman, a blind cleric convicted of involvement in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and currently serving a life sentence in a US penitentiary.

In an earlier interview with the Monitor, Mr. Loney said the captors had spoken of demanding Abdel Rahman's release in exchange for their safety; this demand was never made publicly.

The three surviving members of the team say they would be hypocrites if they gave in to the anger created by their ordeal, and participated in the traditional avenues of justice. Loney, a committed Christian, said he would even return to Iraq to meet with his captors. "It would be wonderful to sit down and talk to them and talk about what [prompted] this thing that they did ... what did it mean to them, what does it mean to them now."

Mr. Sooden added that the men have doubts about the fairness of the Iraqi court system, particularly giving the raging war there. "I don't know if the Central Criminal Court of Iraq can act as per its mandate because of the security situation."

Despite the country's ongoing war, the wheels of justice have haltingly moved forward in Iraq, where the death penalty is enforced. And not all hostage advocates share the CPT members' forgiving view.

In June, Mustafa Salman al-Jibouri was sentenced to life imprisonment for aiding the men who kidnapped and later murdered Margaret Hassan, the British national who had run the charity CARE's Baghdad offices and had made aiding Iraq's poor her life's work.

Mrs. Hassan's family charged afterward that "inept" handling of the case allowed Mr. Jibouri to escape the death penalty, and also led to the acquittal of two other men on trial in her murder. They said the acquittals would encourage more kidnapping in Iraq.

In November, Hussein Fahmi, whom authorities described as a member of Al Qaeda in Iraq, was sentenced to death for his role in the kidnapping and beheading of Shosei Koda, a young Japanese man who was abducted while traveling in Iraq in 2004. Mr. Fahmi was of mixed Egyptian and Palestinian descent.

Also, the Iraqi justice system has come under criticism from human rights organizations for frequent torture of captives.

If the three don't testify, either by identifying suspects in a photo lineup or by giving video evidence (there is no suggestion that they should actually travel to the Iraqi court) the case could unravel. "We were told there would be a possibility that they could walk away from this if we don't testify," said Loney. "Not to excuse what they were doing but there was a rationale for it. They saw themselves being part of a fight to defend their country."

The three CPT survivors said a lot of forensic evidence was collected after they were released in a raid following a tip. "There was a fair bit of forensic evidence in the house that we left," says Mr. Kember. "When I got to the hospital, they stripped me ... they said we could get fingerprints off clothes."

Some of the alleged kidnappers of Carroll have been arrested, and Iraqi officials say they are building a strong case against them, but no court dates have yet been set.

Taliban And Allies Tighten Grip In North Of Pakistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Ismail Khan

DOJ_NMG_0104415

PESHAWAR, Pakistan — Islamic militants are using a recent peace deal with the government to consolidate their hold in northern Pakistan, vastly expanding their training of suicide bombers and other recruits and fortifying alliances with Al Qaeda and foreign fighters, diplomats and intelligence officials from several nations say. The result, they say, is virtually a Taliban mini-state.

The militants, the officials say, are openly flouting the terms of the September accord in North Waziristan, under which they agreed to end cross-border help for the Taliban insurgency that revived in Afghanistan with new force this year.

The area is becoming a magnet for an influx of foreign fighters, who not only challenge government authority in the area, but are even wresting control from local tribes and spreading their influence to neighboring areas, according to several American and NATO officials and Pakistani and Afghan intelligence officials.

This year more than 100 local leaders and government sympathizers or accused "American spies" have been killed, several of them in beheadings, as the militants have used a reign of terror to impose what President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan calls a creeping "Talibanization." Last year, at least 100 others were also killed.

While the tribes once offered refuge to the militants when they retreated to the area in 2002 after the American invasion of Afghanistan, that welcome is waning as the killings have generated new tensions and added to the region's volatility.

"They are taking territory," said one western ambassador in Pakistan. "They are becoming much more aggressive in Pakistan."

"It is the lesson from Afghanistan in the '90s," he added. "Ungoverned spaces are a problem. The whole tribal area is a problem."

The links among the various groups date to the 1980s, when Arabs, Pakistanis and other Muslims joined Afghans in their fight to drive out the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, using a network of training camps and religious schools set up by the Pakistani intelligence agency and financed by the C.I.A. and Saudi Arabia.

The training continued with Pakistani and Qaeda support through the 1990s, and then moved into Afghanistan under the Taliban. It was during this time that Pakistanis became drawn into militancy in big numbers, fighting alongside the Taliban and hundreds of foreign fighters against the northern tribes of Afghanistan. Today the history of the region has come full circle.

Since retreating from Afghanistan in 2002 under American military attacks, the Taliban and foreign fighters have again been using the tribal areas to organize themselves — now training their sights on the 40,000 American and NATO troops in Afghanistan.

After failing to gain control of the areas in military campaigns, the government cut peace deals in South Waziristan in 2004 and 2005, and then in North Waziristan on Sept. 5. Since the September accord, NATO officials say cross-border attacks by Pakistani and Afghan Taliban and their foreign allies have increased.

In recent weeks, Pakistani intelligence officials said the number of foreign fighters in the tribal areas was far higher than the official estimate of 500, perhaps as high as 1,500 to 2,000 today.

These fighters include Afghans and seasoned Taliban leaders, Uzbek and other Central Asian militants, and what intelligence officials estimate to be 80 to 90 Arab terrorist operatives and fugitives, possibly including the Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and his second in command, Ayman al-Zawahri.

The tightening web of alliances among these groups in a remote, mountainous area increasingly beyond state authority is potentially disastrous for efforts to combat terrorism as far away as Europe and the United States, intelligence officials warn.

They and western diplomats say it also portends an even bloodier year for Afghanistan in 2007, with the winter expected to serve as what one official described as a "breeding season" to multiply ranks.

"I expect next year to be quite bloody," the United States ambassador in Afghanistan, Ronald Neumann, said in an interview last week. "My sense is the Taliban wants to come back and fight. I don't expect the Taliban to win, but everyone needs to understand that we are in for a fight."

Foreign Influence

One of the clearest measures of the dangers of this local cross-fertilization is the suicide bombings. Diplomats with knowledge of the area's Pashtun tribes say they have little doubt the tactic emerged from the influence of Al Qaeda, since such attacks were unknown in Pakistan or Afghanistan before 2001.

This year suicide attacks have become a regular feature of the Afghan war and have also appeared for the first time even in Pakistan, including two in this frontier province in recent weeks, indicating a growing threat to Pakistan's security.

In recent weeks, Afghan officials say they have uncovered alarming signs of large-scale indoctrination and preparation of suicide bombers in the tribal areas, and the Pakistani minister of the interior, Aftab Khan Sherpao, publicly acknowledged for the first time that training of suicide bombers was occurring in the tribal areas.

The Afghan intelligence service said last week in a statement that it had captured an Afghan suicide bomber wearing a vest filled with explosives. The man reportedly said he had been given the task by the head of a religious school in the Pakistani tribal region of Bajaur, and that 500 to 600 students there were being prepared to fight jihad and be suicide bombers.

The bomber said that the former head of Pakistani intelligence, Gen. Hamid Gul, was financing and supporting the project, according to the statement, though the claim is impossible to verify. Pakistan intelligence agencies have long nurtured militants in the tribal areas to pressure the rival government in Afghanistan, though the government claims to have ceased its support.

So numerous are the recruits that a tribal leader in southern Afghanistan, who did not want to be named because of the threat of suicide bombers, relayed an account of how one would-be suicide bomber was sent home and told to wait his turn because there were many in line ahead of him.

American military officials say they believe much of the training in Waziristan is taking place under the aegis of men like Jalaluddin Haqqani, once one of the most formidable commanders of the anti-Soviet mujahedeen forces who joined the Taliban in the 1990s.

He has had a close relationship with Arab fighters since the 1980s, when Waziristan was his rear base for fighting the Soviet occupation. Arab fighters had joined him there in the struggle, among them Osama bin Laden.

He later became the Taliban's minister of tribal affairs and was the main protector for the foreign fighters on their exodus from Afghanistan in 2001 and 2002. He and his son, Sirajuddin Haqqani, remain the most important local partners for Al Qaeda in Waziristan.

Mr. Haqqani bases himself in North Waziristan and has a host of other Taliban and foreign commanders, in particular Uzbeks, who are loyal to him, United States military officials say.

Money continues to flow in from religious supporters at home and in the Persian Gulf, as well as from a range of illicit activities like a lucrative opium trade, smuggling and even kidnapping, diplomats, United Nations analysts and local journalists say.

"There are clearly very substantial training facilities that are still operating in Waziristan, both north and south, and other parts of FATA and Baluchistan," a diplomat in Kabul said, referring to the region by the acronym for its formal name, the Federally Administered Tribal Areas.

"Even more worrying is the continued presence of the Taliban and Haqqani leadership networks," the diplomat said, dismayed at what he characterized as Pakistani passivity in breaking up the networks.

"They haven't been addressed at all on the Pakistani side," he added. "They haven't been pursued."

The diplomat also singled out Saddique Noor, in his mid-40s, a Pakistani militant commander who he said was training suicide bombers in Waziristan and sending them into Afghanistan. Mr. Noor fought in Afghanistan alongside the Taliban in the 1990s and is a determined opponent of the American and NATO presence in Afghanistan.

Another commander, Beitullah Mehsud, about age 40 and also from the region, is now probably the strongest Pakistani Taliban commander and may also be dispatching suicide bombers. He also fought in Afghanistan under the Taliban and claims to have 15,000 fighters under him now.

Both men are loyal to Mr. Haqqani, whom Western diplomats consider one of the most dangerous Taliban commanders because of his links to Al Qaeda and his strong local standing.

The other, for the same reason, is Mullah Dadullah, a ruthless Taliban commander from southern Afghanistan, who has emerged as the main figure in the resurgence of the Afghan Taliban.

The one-legged Dadullah — he lost a leg in fighting — has a flamboyant if cruel reputation. He narrowly escaped capture in northern Afghanistan in 2001, often gives boastful interviews to news agencies, and is known to have personally ordered the killings of aid workers. His latest announcement, made in a phone call to [a news agency], was that the Taliban had infiltrated suicide bombers into every Afghan city.

He is widely thought to be based in or around the southern Pakistani town of Quetta but is reported to be constantly on the move. He visited various areas of southern Afghanistan this year and has traveled to Waziristan repeatedly, in particular as the tribes of North Waziristan negotiated their Sept. 5 peace deal with the government, which he sanctioned, according to local reporters and intelligence officials.

Push for Order

The increasingly urgent question for Pakistani, Afghan, American and NATO officials is what can be done to bring the region under control. The Pakistani government's latest attempt was the Sept. 5 peace accord in North Waziristan.

Under the deal, both the government and militants agreed to cease attacks, and the militants agreed to end cross-border help for the Afghan insurgency, the killings of tribal leaders and accused government sympathizers, and "Talibanization" of the area.

Taliban commanders sanctioned the deals, arguing that the militants should concentrate their efforts on the foreign armies in Afghanistan and not waste their energies on clashing with the Pakistani military, journalists working in Waziristan say.

Critics say the agreement is fatally flawed since it lacks any means of enforcement and that it has actually empowered the militants. An international policy analysis group, the International Crisis Group, brands it as a policy of appeasement, in a report to be released on Dec. 11.

The government has taken down checkpoints, released detainees, and returned confiscated weapons and vehicles, and issued an amnesty. But the militants have increased their activities, benefiting from the truce with the Pakistani military, the groups said.

"From the start the agreement was not good because there are too many concessions and no clauses that are binding," said Brig. Mahmood Shah, who served as secretary of the Federally Administered Tribal Areas until 2005. "This agreement is not going to work, and if it is working, it is working against the government interest."

A local politician and human rights advocate, Afrasiab Khattak, spokesman for the Awami National Party in Peshawar, also criticized the agreement. The militants rather than the traditional tribal leaders have the power now, he said.

"They have imposed a new elite in Waziristan," he said. "More than 200 tribal chiefs have been killed, and not a single culprit brought to justice."

Still, Javed Iqbal, the newly appointed Pakistani secretary of the tribal areas, defended the North Waziristan accord as an effort to return to the traditional way of running the tribal areas, through the tribal chiefs. That system, employed by the British and Pakistani rulers alike, was eroded during the military campaigns of the last few years.

"We have tried the coercive tactic, we did not achieve much," he said in an interview in Peshawar. "So what do you do? Engage."

He said the government had let down the tribal elders in Waziristan who had wanted dialogue with the government, but were murdered one after another by the militants. But the big turnout of some 500 to 600 tribal elders at a meeting in Miramshah in North Waziristan in November was encouraging, he said, and showed that the tribes wanted to engage. "We are back in business," he said.

Loss of Control

Some Pakistani officials admit they have made a serious mistake in allowing the militants so much leeway, but only if they will not be quoted publicly.

Afghan and Pakistani Taliban leadership networks run training camps in various parts of the 500-mile length of the tribal areas, from Baluchistan in the south to the hub of North and South Waziristan, and farther north to Bajaur, said a Western diplomat in Kabul.

A diplomat who visited Wana, the capital of South Waziristan, said the government had almost no control over either of the Waziristans.

"They are absolutely not running the show in North Waziristan, and it runs the risk of becoming like South Waziristan," he said. "In South Waziristan the government does not even pretend to have a remit that runs outside of its compounds."

The fundamentalists' influence is seeping outward, with propaganda being spread on private radio stations, and through a widening network of religious schools and the distribution of CDs and DVDs. It can now be felt in neighboring tribal departments and the settled areas of the North-West Frontier Province. In recent months, Pakistani newspapers have reported incidents of music and barber shops being closed, television sets burnt, and threats to girls' schools.

The militants are more powerful than the military and the local tribal police, kill with impunity and shield criminals and fugitives. Local journalists say people blame the militants for a rising tide of kidnappings, killings, robberies and even rapes.

The brutality of some foreign militants has begun causing rising discontent among the Pakistani hosts, many of whom are also armed and militant, making the region increasingly volatile and uncontrollable.

"Initially, it was sympathy," one Pakistani intelligence official said. "Then came the money, but it was soon followed by fear. Now, fear is overriding the other two factors, sympathy and money."

For now, however, the Taliban commanders and the Pakistani militants under them remain unswervingly loyal to jihad in Afghanistan and, despite the tensions, still enjoy local support for the cause, officials and local journalists say.

The failed government military campaigns of recent years, which are seen as dictated by the United States, have further radicalized the local population, many in the region say.

As a potential indicator of local support, the families of two suicide bombers sent to Afghanistan from Waziristan gained renown in the community, according to a local journalist.

"The people support the militants because they are from their own tribe, they are family," said the journalist, who asked not to be named out of fear of the militants.

Morale is high among the resurgent Taliban after their revival in Afghanistan this year, one Pakistani security official said. That will lead to still more recruitment and better organization and planning in the year ahead.

Fighting traditionally dies down in winter because of the inhospitable conditions in the mountains.

But the new fighting season in the spring would be even bloodier, a Western diplomat in Kabul said. “We have to assume that things will be bad again,” he said, “because none of the underlying causes are being addressed.”

Iraq Lessons In Afghanistan? (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

As pressure mounts on the White House to engage Tehran over Iraq, Afghanistan offers an example of how U.S. and Iranian interests can constructively align in the Islamic world.

Senior American and Afghan officials say that in contrast with the situation in Iraq, where Iran is allegedly funding and arming Shiite militias, Tehran today is playing an important role in seeking to stabilize post-Taliban Afghanistan.

The Iranian government has pledged $560 million in development aid to President Hamid Karzai's government since 2002, these officials say, roughly half of which has been disbursed. It is developing road and power projects, largely in the western part of the country near the two countries' shared border. And Iranian companies have provided goods and services -- including cement and banking -- to Afghanistan's war-ravaged population.

Iran also has been among the most active nations seeking to combat Afghanistan's largest ill, opium production, say American and Afghan officials. Tehran seized more Afghan opium than any other country last year, with hundreds of its security forces killed while policing its 600-mile border with Afghanistan in recent years, according to the United Nations.

Critics say Iran has largely acted out of self-interest in Afghanistan. They say Tehran's support for Mr. Karzai's government is in part aimed at ridding the country of Tehran's enemy, the Taliban Sunni militia, while seeking to usher in stable conditions that could hasten a U.S. withdrawal from Central Asia. Its counternarcotics operations, meanwhile, are driven by a desire to cut off supply to its country's estimated two million heroin addicts. Iran is also using Afghanistan as a base to expand its influence and economic interests across the region.

And Iran's intelligence services maintain a "destructive capability" inside Afghanistan that could target American and North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces should tensions between Washington and Tehran escalate, Afghan and U.S. officials say.

"Iran's role has been constructive" in helping to rebuild Afghanistan and fight narcotics, said Said Jawad, Afghanistan's ambassador to Washington. He added that cordial Afghan-Iranian relations are crucial, due to Tehran's economic and political influence inside his country.

Former Secretary of State James Baker III, in unveiling the Iraq Study Group's recommendations on how to improve the situation in Iraq last week, pointed to Afghanistan as a possible model for U.S.-Iran cooperation in Iraq.

"All we're suggesting is doing with [Iraq] what we did in Afghanistan, when we talked to [the Iranians] and they helped us stabilize the situation," said Mr. Baker, co-chairman of the panel.

Outside Afghanistan, the U.S. and Iran have hostile relations, with the two sides at odds over Tehran's efforts to develop a nuclear program and its backing of extremist forces across the Middle East. But that hasn't stopped the two countries from accepting each other's roles in Afghanistan.

In Iraq, Mr. Baker and others say, Iran's Shiite theocracy government could only help -- indeed, may be essential -- to stem the flow of arms and funds to Shiite militias across its border, while providing critical development aid.

Even if the White House were to reach out to Iran -- President Bush so far has made working with Tehran conditional upon its stopping its nuclear program -- it has offered little indication that it would be willing, or even able, to play the same type of stabilizing role in Iraq that it has in Afghanistan. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has rejected repeated White House calls for meetings to coordinate a response to Iraq's turmoil. Still, current and former U.S. diplomats say, Iran may be cooperative in Iraq if Washington offers it a more direct role. In Afghanistan, Iran emerged as an unlikely supporter of U.S. policy, as the Bush administration moved to overthrow the Taliban after the Sept. 11, 2001, al Qaeda attacks, current and former U.S. diplomats say.

Iran's leadership had developed an intense hatred for the Taliban during its five-year rule of Afghanistan. The radical Sunni regime nearly sparked a war with Iran in 1998, after its forces killed nine Iranian diplomats in the central Afghan city of Mazar-i-Sharif, on charges they were spies. The Taliban also persecuted Afghanistan's minority Shiite peoples, known as the Hazara, who share a common language and religion with Iran.

In January 2002, Mr. Bush branded Iran a member of his "Axis of Evil," angering Iran's then-moderate government of President Mohammad Khatami, which had believed its relations with Washington were improving in light of the Afghanistan war. The White House also charged Iran with sheltering and providing safe passage to al Qaeda and Taliban militants who had fled the fighting in Afghanistan. One of them, U.S. intelligence officials say, was Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian terrorist who went on to head al Qaeda's operations in Iraq before his death in June. (Iran has denied that it supports al Qaeda.)

Regardless of the breakdown in U.S.-Iran ties, Tehran has continued to push ahead with development projects in Afghanistan, albeit amid little interaction with the American presence there. Its investments have helped make the country's western and central regions among the most stable there, in contrast with Afghanistan's south and east, where Taliban insurgents have heightened attacks on NATO, U.S. and Afghan forces in recent months, say Afghan officials and businessmen. Perhaps no place is the impact of Iran's assistance as apparent as the western Afghan city of Herat.

Tehran is seeking to help refashion the city as a trading hub linking Asia and the Central Asian states to the Persian Gulf. Iran's cultural and financial influence has traditionally been strong in Herat, though it had eroded under the Taliban.

Central to this effort has been the development of a roads project, costing hundreds of millions of dollars, that connects Herat to Iran's east and then on to the Persian Gulf port of Chabahar. Landlocked Afghanistan has relied on the Pakistani port of Karachi both to ship out products and import many raw materials. But many Afghan businessmen have complained in recent years that shipping through the overloaded Karachi port is expensive and time-consuming.

Tehran's development of Chabahar and its financing of roads linking it to Afghanistan have stimulated competition between Pakistan and Iran for a leading role in Afghanistan's transit business, say Afghan and development officials.

Herat also has some of the best power supply in Afghanistan, thanks to Iran. Much of the rest of Afghanistan is waiting for the government to connect power lines to energy supplies in Tajikistan, a process that is taking years as workers first move to clear the Hindu Kush mountain range. Tehran, however, has directly tied Herat to Iran's power grid.

"Iran has chosen projects that are a high priority and necessary" for Afghanistan, says Alastair McKechnie, the World Bank's country director for Afghanistan. "In that sense, they've played a very positive role."

A number of Afghan and American officials say Iran's increasing presence in Afghanistan may not be all positive. Iranian intelligence agencies are believed to be assuming a larger presence inside the country, mixing in with the Hazara and the more than one million Afghan refugees who have returned from Iran since the Taliban's fall. Tehran continues to maintain strategic ties with many of the former Northern Alliance warlords with whom they were aligned against the Taliban, say U.S. and Afghan officials. In addition, while Sunni-controlled states, such as Saudi Arabia, are reluctantly accepting Iran's influence in western Afghanistan, they are wary of it expanding beyond there through the Middle East. Should tensions between Iran and the U.S. escalate over Tehran's nuclear program, many in Afghanistan say, Tehran could seek to use its own intelligence agents and their Afghan allies to target American and NATO forces inside Afghanistan.

"Iran is very active ... and could play in several ways that is detrimental to Afghanistan," says retired Gen. David Barno, who commanded U.S. forces in Afghanistan up until last year. Tehran still sees Afghanistan "as part of the broader conflict with the U.S."

Escalating Tab Despite Its $168 Billion Budget, The Army Faces A Cash Crunch (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

After Years of Gearing Up For High-Tech Warfare, Service Is Short on Basics Humvees Rise to $225,000

FORT STEWART, Ga. -- With just six weeks before they leave for Iraq, the 3,500 soldiers from the Third Infantry Division's First Brigade should be learning about Ramadi, the insurgent stronghold where they will spend a year.

Many of the troops don't even know the basic ethnic makeup of the largely Sunni city. "We haven't spent as much time as I would like on learning the local culture, language, and politics -- all the stuff that takes a while to really get good at," says Lt. Col. Clifford Wheeler, who commands one of the brigade's 800-soldier units.

Instead, the troops are learning to use equipment that commanders say they should ideally have been training with since the spring. Many soldiers only recently received their new M-4 rifles and rifle sights, which are in short supply because of an Army-wide cash crunch. Some still lack their machine guns or long-range surveillance systems, which are used to spot insurgents laying down roadside bombs. They've been told they'll pick up most of that when they get to Iraq.

The strains here at Fort Stewart -- one of the busiest posts in the U.S. military -- are apparent throughout the Army. They spotlight a historic predicament: The Iraq war has exposed more than a decade's worth of mistakes and miscalculations that are now seriously undermining the world's mightiest military force.

In the 15 years after the Cold War, senior military planners and civilian-defense officials didn't build a force geared to fighting long, grinding guerrilla wars, like Iraq and Afghanistan. Instead they banked on fighting quick wars, dominated by high-tech weapons systems.

The result: At a time when the war in Iraq is deepening, and debate over pulling out the troops is intensifying, the rising cost of waging the fight is outpacing even the Army's huge budget. The financial squeeze is leaving the Army short of equipment and key personnel.

The situation has the Army seeking billions more for next year, even as younger officers, frustrated with the pace of change, say that any improvements depend more on how the money is spent than on how much is spent.

From 1990 to 2005, the military lavished money on billion-dollar destroyers, fighter jets and missile-defense systems. Defenders of such programs say the U.S. faces a broad array of threats and must be prepared for all of them. High-tech weaponry contributed to the swift toppling of the regimes in Iraq and Afghanistan, but has been of little help in the more difficult task of stabilizing the two countries.

Of the $1.9 trillion the U.S. spent on weaponry in that period, adjusted for inflation, the Air Force received 36% and the Navy got 33%. The Army took in 16%, it says. Despite the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, both dominated by ground forces, the ratio hasn't changed significantly.

Overly optimistic predictions by the Bush administration -- and the Army -- have made the Army's budget crunch worse. Both assumed troop numbers in Iraq would drop significantly by 2006 and the Army wouldn't need as much money as it initially requested. Instead, costs have soared, forcing front-line commanders and Pentagon generals to try to meet an ever-growing list of demands with insufficient resources.

"Our ground forces have been stretched nearly to the breaking point," warned the bipartisan Iraq Study Group in its recent report. "The defense budget as a whole is in danger of disarray."

It may seem hard to believe that a country which allocated $168 billion to the Army this year -- more than twice the 2000 budget -- can't cover the costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. But the two pillars of the Army, personnel and equipment -- both built to wage high-tech, firepower-intensive wars -- are under enormous stress:

The cost of basic equipment that soldiers carry into battle -- helmets, rifles, body armor -- has more than tripled to $25,000 from $7,000 in 1999.

The cost of a Humvee, with all the added armor, guns, electronic jammers and satellite-navigational systems, has grown seven-fold to about $225,000 a vehicle from $32,000 in 2001.

The cost of paying and training troops has grown 60% to about $120,000 per soldier, up from $75,000 in 2001. On the reserve side, such costs have doubled since 2001, to about $34,000 per soldier.

At Fort Knox, Ky., the cash crunch got so bad this summer that the Army ran out of money to pay janitors who clean the classrooms where captains are taught to be commanders. So the officers, who will soon be leading 100-soldier units, clean the office toilets themselves.

"The cost of the Army is being driven up by [Iraq and Afghanistan]. That's the fundamental story here," says Brig. Gen. Andrew Twomey, a senior official on the Army staff in the Pentagon. The increased costs are "not from some wild weapons system that is off in the future. These are costs associated with current demands."

Senior Army officials concede they mistakenly assumed prior to the Iraq war that if they built a force capable of winning big conventional battles, everything else -- from counterinsurgency to peacekeeping -- would be relatively easy. "We argued in those days that if we could do the top-end skills, we could do all of the other ones," says Lt. Gen. Thomas Metz, the deputy commander of the Army's Training and Doctrine Command. Iraq has proven that guerrilla fights demand different equipment and skills. "I have had to eat a little crow," says Gen. Metz.

Army officials say they are doing their best to ensure that Iraq and Afghanistan-bound brigades have all the equipment they need when they arrive in the war zone. But to do this, they have had to take equipment from units training back home, which are now short of even the most basic gear, such as body armor and rifles.

The equipment shortages explain why Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the Middle East, recently told lawmakers that the U.S. couldn't maintain even a relatively small increase of 20,000 soldiers in Iraq for more than a few months. "The ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now," he testified in November.

The other big strain on the Army is a shortage of people. The Army has made much of the fact that it met its recruiting goals for 2006, bringing in 80,000 soldiers. But meeting those goals has come at a heavy cost. The Army spent about $735 million on retention bonuses in 2006 to keep battle-weary troops in the service, up from about $85 million in 2003. And it had to pay about $300 million more on recruiting this year compared to the year before.

The extra cash didn't stop the Army from having to lower standards. Although the quality of the force is still considered good, 8,500 recruits in 2006 required "moral waivers" for criminal misconduct or past drug use -- more than triple the 2,260 waivers the Army issued 10 years ago. The Army also took in more troops who scored in the bottom third on its aptitude test.

As it has brought in more borderline recruits, the Army has found itself short of officers and sergeants. Today, it is down about 3,000 active-duty officers, a deficiency that it says will grow to about 3,700 in 2008. It is short more than 7,500 reserve and National Guard officers, according to internal Army documents.

One of the most pressing personnel problems is the lack of sergeants, the enlisted leaders who do most of the day-to-day supervising of the rank-and-file soldiers.

At Fort Hood, Texas, the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment, which returned from Iraq in March, has about 75% of the soldiers it needs to fill its ranks, but only about half of its sergeants. The 5,000-soldier unit likely will go back to Iraq in the fall of next year, and leaders in the regiment say they will get more sergeants before they deploy, but not as many as they would like.

"The sergeant is the one that the soldiers take after," says First Sgt. James Adcock, who oversees about 130 of the unit's soldiers. "He can make or break how effective the privates are."

The large number of young soldiers in the unit combined with the shortage of sergeants has led to problems, say the regiment's leaders. Some also blame the Army's decision to scale back recruiting standards and push more troops through basic training. In May 2005, about 18% of Army's recruits were asked to leave before completing initial training. Today, only about 6% of recruits fail to make it through.

The troops who a year ago might have flunked out of basic training seem to stick with their units, according to Army statistics. But some sergeants say they also seem to cause more problems. Sgt. First Class Rajesh Harripersad, who oversees a 30-soldier platoon, says two of his soldiers were caught using marijuana and methamphetamines. Other leaders have seen an increase in accidents on and off the base. "Discipline has been worse for me this time," says Sgt. Harripersad.

Once units deploy to Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army-wide shortage of officers and sergeants is felt even more acutely. Teams focused on key jobs, such as reconstruction and Iraq governance, are "woefully undermanned," Col. Bill Hix, a senior Pentagon strategist, recently wrote in the Hoover Digest, a Stanford University policy journal. Multiple internal Army studies have concluded that the military advisory teams, charged with developing Iraqi Army forces so U.S. troops can go home, need to be doubled or tripled in size.

Often, the soldiers who serve on these undermanned teams finish their year-long deployments wondering what they have accomplished. "I would say we're an effective force for good, but we're struggling in a sea of meaningless slaughter -- along with everyone else with a job to do here," says Sgt. Mastin Greene, who serves on a reconstruction team in Baghdad.

Some of the Army's problems are a product of its failure to prepare for a guerrilla fight in which there are no front lines. Just prior to the Iraq war, the Army was buying body armor at such a slow rate that it would have taken 48 years to outfit the entire force. It invested huge sums in the years leading up to Iraq in Humvees with canvas doors that are useless for war today.

"The fact that we had certain grim realities that were inescapable for anyone who wore a uniform in a combat zone just wasn't something that was driving our weapons programming," says Maj. Gen. Stephen Speakes, who oversees equipping Army units. Army officials now say that they entered the war short of about $56 billion of essential equipment.

The Humvee stands as a metaphor for the problems the Army faces. First fielded in the early 1980s, it was designed to ferry soldiers around behind the front lines of a conventional war. In recent years, the vehicle, which troops drive on the streets of Iraq, has been modified countless times. The Army has bolted layers of armor onto it to protect troops from roadside bombs. It has added sophisticated electronic jammers, rotating turrets, bigger machine guns, satellite navigational systems and better radios.

The result is a Humvee that is much better than the version the Army took to Iraq in 2003. But the add-ons have driven up its cost. The modified vehicle is top heavy and tends to tip over at high speeds. Army officials say they can't add more weight without overwhelming the engine or breaking the axle.

"The Army recognizes that the Humvee has reached a limit of our ability to improve it for the current fight," Gen. Speakes says.

What the Army says it really needs is an all-new vehicle, designed to better withstand roadside bombs that have become part of life in Iraq. But such a vehicle likely won't be ready until 2010 or 2012, Army officials say. In the interim, the Army wants to buy something on the commercial market -- South Africa, Turkey and Australia all make alternatives. Yet it's not clear whether the Army, which is struggling to equip the current force, has the money.

The Army has told the Bush administration it needs about $24 billion more to pay its bills in 2007. Some key lawmakers, such as Democratic Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island and Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona, have called for a bigger Army. But there are also pressures to restrain spending.

Covering Shortfalls

To cover cash shortfalls, Army posts around the country this summer laid off janitorial crews, closed swimming pools and didn't cut the grass.

In the Pentagon, Army generals cut $3 billion in 2005 and 2006 from programs for weapons that are in heavy use in Iraq, such as armored patrol vehicles, trucks, radios and unmanned surveillance planes, according to Army documents. In June, for example, the Army set aside about $50 million to buy more long-range radios, which are used heavily in Iraq. One month later, Army officials, who were short about $1.5 billion to make end-of-year payroll, took the money back. Army brigades are supposed to have about 1,300 radios. Today, the average brigade makes do with about 1,100.

The shortages have been especially hard on the National Guard, which in some states has only about 40% of the authorized equipment for homeland defense missions, says Gen. Speakes.

Active-duty troops preparing to go off to war at bases such as Fort Stewart, Ga., feel the crunch as well. First Sgt. Bradley Feltman, who will leave in January for his second year-long tour in three years, says his troop was short of Humvees to train on and had only 25% of the mounts it needed for its machine guns. The lack of equipment hindered the unit's ability to train as an entire 130-man unit. Instead, they trained one 30-soldier platoon at a time.

"We got training, but not graduate-level training. In a couple of months, my guys are going to be busting down doors, and it will be the first time they see some of their equipment for real," he says.

At Fort Hood, the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment, which returned from Iraq in March and will go back in fall 2007, is already worried about time to prepare. The regiment will spend most of the winter receiving new soldiers, fielding new equipment and learning to use it. The regiment left most of its tanks and Humvees in Iraq for follow-on units.

That means troops won't have much time to train for other critical tasks. Junior leaders need to know everything from how to assess a water plant to the tribal politics of the area where they are deploying, says Lt. Col. Paul Yingling, the unit's deputy commander. They must know enough Arabic to interact with locals.

'Incredibly Frustrating'

"It is incredibly frustrating for combat veterans to return to Iraq for the third time with only minimal training on the skills we know are essential, like language, culture, intelligence and local security force development" Col. Yingling says. "Army units don't fail to train on these tasks because we're stupid or lazy; we fail because we don't have the time to do it right."

What kind of Army emerges from its searing experience in Iraq will depend, in part, on how long the U.S. stays there and the foreign-policy goals that civilian leaders set in its aftermath. President Bush has said that the best way to protect the nation is to spread democracy. The experience in Iraq demonstrates that such a strategy requires a bigger Army that is more skilled in tasks such as building indigenous forces, fostering local government and economic development. "Revolutionary approaches require a lot of resources," says Conrad Crane, the lead author of the Army's new counterinsurgency doctrine.

A less-ambitious foreign policy that seeks to promote stability and preserve the status quo could reduce the pressure to build a bigger Army with a broader array of skills.

The other big variable is how the Army -- particularly officers now in their 20s and 30s -- reacts to the traumatic experience in Iraq. "We as an Army tend to learn generationally," says Col. Michael Meese, who heads the department of social sciences at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point.

Today's four-star generals, who joined the service in the early 1970s, spent most of their careers rebuilding an Army that had been badly damaged by Vietnam. Officers who came of age in the 1980s and are now colonels and generals were shaped by the Cold War. Their focus was on how to defeat a Soviet-style army.

Today's younger officers, whose defining experiences have been in Iraq and Afghanistan, see the world differently. The gulf was clear last month in their reaction to the dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Many senior officers quietly celebrated his departure. Like the retired generals who earlier this year called for Mr. Rumsfeld to be fired, they placed the blame for the Army's failures in Iraq largely on his shoulders.

Junior officers were more indifferent. They tended to view Mr. Rumsfeld as "part of a larger problem that hasn't been solved yet," says Kalev Sepp, a former Special Forces officer who worked extensively in Iraq. Among many of these officers, there is great frustration not just with the defense secretary but also with the generals who serve above them.

"Junior officers know that success in these wars is about a lot more than killing the enemy. It depends on providing security for the people, finding friends and fixing infrastructure," says Maj. John Prior, who served as a company commander in Baghdad. "A lot of senior officers just don't get it."

While the Army's new draft counterinsurgency doctrine sounds these same themes, senior commanders in Iraq have been slow to embrace them. The doctrine says troops must live among the Iraqi people, on small bases run by junior leaders. But since 2004, commanders have consolidated U.S. troops on 55 large fortified bases, down from about 110 a year ago.

The new doctrine says that when battling an insurgency, reconstruction dollars are as important as ammunition. In recent months, though, more restrictions have been placed on how junior leaders can spend money in their sectors. "What's funny is that all politics and services are local, so the [junior] commanders need the greatest flexibility" said Brig. Gen. Ed Cardon, who returned from Iraq this year, in an interview compiled by the Army for its oral-history archives. "Why don't we just trust the commander who said he spent $100?"

Some question how quickly the Army will be able to shift its thinking. "All our organizations are designed around the least important line of operations in these fights -- combat operations," says Col. Yingling. "If you spend your whole career in tanks, you tend to see the solution to every problem as a tank."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Aides To Congress Switch Sides For Upcoming Probes (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Deee-fense, Deee-fense Deee-fense.

You can almost hear the chant rising from corporate offices all over town. As soon as Democrats take over Congress next month, all sorts of businesses will no doubt face sharp-elbowed congressional hearings called O & I -- oversight and investigations. And they'll need a strong defense.

Luckily for corporate America, many of the people who formerly conducted those nasty and frequently televised inquiries have switched sides and are available for hire to the highest bidders. For the right fee, a company can retain a former chief counsel to almost any of the most marauding committees on Capitol Hill.

Think of it as a cottage industry, and a very large cottage at that.

So many inquisitions are about to be begun by the Democrats newly in charge that dozens of law and PR firms are bulking up with former insiders to cash in on all the trouble those hearings will create. Companies that were harassed in the past by smart young government lawyers have lately been buying the services of those same young lawyers, now in the private sector, for protection from their successors.

"A lot of companies are reaching out to law firms and lobbying shops because they're nervous about what's ahead," said Mark R. Paoletta, chief counsel for oversight and investigations at the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The business of cushioning the blow from congressional inquiries is expected to grow enormously because "Democrats are going to be very, very active," he said.

Certainly he hopes so. Paoletta, 44, is reversing allegiances in January. He has been hired by the law firm Dickstein Shapiro to specialize in guiding clients through congressional investigations -- the same kinds of investigations he's directed for the past nine years. Andrew L. Snowdon, an oversight and investigations counsel for the same committee, is also headed to Dickstein Shapiro.

Why the big turnabout? "I have four kids," Paoletta said. His oldest, he said, attends a private high school that costs $26,000 a year. Of his current post, he said, "I don't think there's a better job in the world." But corporations on the griddle need representation too, and they pay better.

So much better, in fact, that just about every company on K Street is vying for a piece of the soon-to-thrive "crisis management" business. The law firm Holland & Knight is flogging its newly formed Congressional Investigations Response Team. Promotional literature highlights the many former insiders now eager to assist their former nemeses: "Our ranks include two former Members of Congress, a former Minority Chief Counsel to the Senate Government Affairs Committee, a former Rules Committee Counsel, a former Chief of Staff for the House Republican Conference, and a former Chief of Staff to the Attorney General, among others."

Two former aides to the House's Government Reform Committee are also forming a partnership partly in hopes of attracting clients who want to know how to defeat the kinds of investigations they once managed. Barbara J. Comstock and Mark Corallo are setting out on their new venture because, Comstock said, "it helps to know the history of the committee, its subpoena power."

The Carmen Group, a lobbying firm, is building a government investigations division and has allied itself with one of the top names in congressional oversight: Franklin Silbey. He led the Senate Judiciary Committee's oversight subcommittee and was chief of investigations for the Senate Labor Committee. "The group will start as four people and we expect it will get larger," said David M. Carmen, president of the firm.

Public relations companies are also getting into the act. Dittus Communications and Public Strategies are hunting for clients who think they are about to be pounced upon. There ought to be a lot of clients around. "It doesn't take a decoder ring to figure out what the broad focus of the investigations will be," said Jeff Eller, Public Strategies' president. Among the many corporations that should expect a congressional onslaught, he said, are oil and drug companies, contractors to the Pentagon and the Homeland Security Department, hedge funds and any firm that produces anything that contributes to global warming, including electric utilities and auto manufacturers.

Not surprisingly -- but probably with good reason -- Eller recommends that companies that even suspect they're in jeopardy should take precautions. "If you have exposure today and you're likely going to get scrutiny by one or more committees, the best thing a company can do is prepare for that now," he said.

Advice varies widely among consultants about how best to approach an impending congressional investigation. Some say it's wise to hand over as much information as possible. Others say that would be the worst decision of all. Everyone agrees that oversight hearings are a very peculiar beast that require legal smarts, legislative insight and a keen attention to public perception.

"I've seen over and over again clients making the mistake of failing to appreciate the unique nature of this process," said Steven R. Ross, a partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer Feld and a former general counsel for the House. "People try to treat it as a pure litigation battle or as a lobbying exercise. In fact, it is a blend of the two."

Humility is also a good idea. When testifying before Congress, said former representative Gerry Sikorski (D-Minn.), now with Holland & Knight, "you are not a big-time, hot-shot CEO of a multibillion-dollar corporation. You are an American citizen, under oath and with limited rights, providing information to the U.S. Congress under their roof, rules and procedures."

Some targets also take the proceedings too lightly, which is a serious error, experts agree. "I've become more and more conservative with these things over the years," said Stanley M. Brand, head of the Brand Law Group and a veteran of such encounters. "My advice is to batten down the hatches, assert your rights if you have them, and don't go in and disgorge documents. These investigations are stalking horses for the Justice Department."

Comstock disagrees somewhat, preferring wide disclosure over secrecy. "If you do have some bad news or bad information, get it out yourself, on your own terms and explain it," she said.

Eller thinks flexibility is a key. For example, he prefers that his clients under congressional scrutiny say that they are "working with" the committee; he advises against using the word "cooperate." The former allows the client to withhold some information when necessary and not run afoul of the truth.

Boring is also better when it comes to O & I. Indeed, in a proceeding that's so public, targets would rather go unnoticed. That was certainly the case when a lawmaker-turned-lobbyist physically restrained a chief executive from standing in front of a picture of a crumpled car when news photographers were nearby during a hearing about roadway accidents.

Sometimes a good defense is a vigorous offense.Lobbyists' Holiday Cheer

Again, it's that time of year. Please e-mail examples of pro bono lobbying that you've done or that you know about for a special holiday column. Send examples early and often, and no later than this week, please. Thanks and cheers!

CRIMINAL LAW:

Death Penalty Cases Bunch Up In Brooklyn (NEWSDAY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, NEWSDAY STAFF WRITER

Newsday, December 11, 2006

This is the season for the death penalty in Brooklyn federal court.

There have been no capital punishment trials in the federal court on Cadman Plaza East since 2003. But now three such cases are under way, and a fourth is expected to commence late next year.

"It looks like death is rampant in Brooklyn," said Ephraim Savitt, who is defending one of the cases involving Ronell Wilson, 24, who is charged with murdering two police officers.

Monday, jurors will continue to hear testimony in Wilson's trial for the March 2003 murders of undercover detectives Rodney Andrews, 34, and James Nemorin, 36.

In another courtroom, the jury selection process is expected to finish in the case of accused drug racketeer and murderer Kenneth McGriff, 46, whose trial is slated for January.

Next week, another jury begins grappling with whether to execute Martin Aguilar, after convicting him last week of murder for hire. Aguilar, 33, was convicted of killing Jose Fernandez in 2002 and dumping his body in a storm drain at historic Green-Wood Cemetery in Brooklyn. If the jury decides not to execute Aguilar, he will get life in prison.

Also, pretrial hearings are scheduled for Monday in the case of Guyanese immigrants Richard James and Ronald Malley, who face the death penalty in a trial slated for next year . They are accused of killing people in an insurance scam.

Savitt said he believes the spate of capital cases in Brooklyn is a logical result of aggressive decisions by the Department of Justice in recent years to seek the death penalty.

"The overall picture is the maturation of death penalty cases that have increased in the current administration," said Savitt, of Manhattan.

Before he left office in late 2004, former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft overruled his prosecutors on at least 42 of 128 capital defendants and recommended seeking the death penalty, according to published reports.

After the U.S. Supreme Court declared the federal death penalty law unconstitutional in 1972, Congress made changes and in 1994 passed a newer capital punishment law. The statute allows executions for certain federal crimes such as murder for hire and the killing of a witness. (New York's state death penalty law was nullified by the Court of Appeals in 2004).

Only three federal death penalty defendants have been executed since the 1994, including Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh in 2001. The last death case in Brooklyn federal court occurred in December 2003 when Emile Dixon was convicted of murder and drug dealing. But three days before Christmas, the jury gave him life in prison.

The judge in that case was Judge Raymond Dearie, a former federal prosecutor who is presiding over the Aguilar case. Dearie's courtroom demeanor and statements have telegraphed an apparent dislike for capital punishment to some courtroom observers and attorneys.

Claire Hogenauer, an attorney and anti-death penalty advocate, said when Dearie charged the jury in the Dixon case, he stressed that the decision to execute somebody had to be an individual one for each juror.

"I will never forget the charge," said Hogenauer, who has attended vigils for five executions around the country.

The Aguilar case jurors will begin hearing death penalty evidence -- both for and against -- next Monday. They will break for Christmas week and resume after New Year's.

In Wilson's case, the trial has about two more weeks to go until the jury decides whether he is guilty of killing Nemorin and Andrews. If Wilson is convicted, the jury will then begin deciding whether he faces execution.

McGriff's actual trial is slated to get under way in early January. Convicted once before for drug offenses, McGriff is now being tried for killing two people in murder-for-hire schemes.

More cases are in the works. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is now considering whether reputed Bonanno crime family captain Vincent Basciano should face the death penalty for a 1999 mob murder.

Lawmakers Want Probe Of Legal Billings At Amtrak (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Two congressmen have asked the Justice Department to look into Amtrak's use of outside legal counsel.

In a Dec. 4 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Rep. Don Young (R., Alaska) and Rep. John Mica (R., Fla.) complain that the federally subsidized railroad hasn't received fair and reasonable value for fees it has paid to law firms.

"We urge you to conduct an investigation...and take appropriate action," they wrote. Mr. Young is chairman of the House Committee on Transportation & Infrastructure; Mr. Mica recently was chosen to serve as the top-ranking Republican member of the committee when the 110th Congress convenes.

The letter follows two recent public reports that concluded some of Amtrak's outside law firms engaged in sloppy billing practices, in violation of the railroad's internal billing guidelines.

Amtrak spokesman Cliff Black said: "We don't believe the allegations related to Amtrak's use of outside counsel have merit or that they warrant review by the Justice Department, but we stand ready to cooperate and provide information as it is requested." Earlier this year, Amtrak indicated that it had worked to improve its oversight of legal fees.

An October report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the Department of Transportation's inspector general, concluded that law firms had, among other things, engaged in "block billing" in which they lumped tasks under one entry of an invoice, rather than itemizing the cost of each task. Block billing is prohibited by Amtrak, according to the report. According to the October report, from 2002 to 2005, Amtrak spent more than $100 million on outside lawyers.

Separately, in a Nov. 17 letter to Amtrak's inspector general, Messrs. Young and Mica raised concern about Amtrak bills submitted by the law firm Manatt, Phelps & Phillips LLP.

A Manatt spokesman said: "The billing was entirely proper. The client understands that some time entries were subdivided to facilitate accuracy and review."

Amtrak's Mr. Black declined to comment on the Nov. 17 letter. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

Airport's Contracts Still Under Federal Scrutiny (PHI)

By John Shiffman

DOJ_NMG_0104426

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 11, 2006

Retail at Philadelphia International Airport may have entered a gilded age, but federal agents continue to investigate suspected pay-to-play corruption there.

The current FBI and IRS investigation is related to minority business contracts held by airport shops, people familiar with the matter said.

Since 2004, there have been three rounds of indictments related to airport contracts - about concessions, advertising and maintenance.

The latest charges came last month when Mayor Street's brother, Milton, was indicted on fraud and corruption charges for an allegedly sham consulting contract for airport maintenance.

"The investigation at the airport continues," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said during the news conference announcing the indictment. He did not elaborate.

During its wide-ranging City Hall corruption probe, the FBI placed wiretaps on the phones of power broker Ronald A. White and senior airport official James Tyrrell. White was charged with corruption, some of it related to airport concessions, but he died before trial. Tyrrell has not been charged with any wrongdoing.

The focus of the investigation is the federal program designed to help disadvantaged business owners - minorities, women and the disabled - get a fair share of airport contracts. Rich minorities with political connections have abused the program here and at other airports.

In some cases, the minorities have lent little more than their name, ethnic status and political sway - and have done little work. As examples, authorities cite the Milton Street situation and a soda contract won by White's mistress, Janice Knight. According to court testimony, Knight did little more than serve as the middle man for an airport vendor, simply faxing invoices back and forth.

Some Made Men Struggle To Make Ends Meet (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

Richard Martino, a slender 47-year-old, favors Prada shoes and until recently drove a sleek black Mercedes-Benz. He has owned multimillion-dollar homes in Harrison and Southampton, N.Y. He spent much of the last decade running a telecommunications and Internet business to which his expertise helped bring in hundreds of millions of dollars. By one accounting, he made tens of millions for himself.

John Setaro, 57, did not finish high school, and has worked recently managing a fast-food restaurant in Seaford on Long Island. He generally wears neat but casual clothes, and lives in a modest, vinyl-sided, colonial-style house in Franklin Square. During a difficult period several years ago, according to his lawyer, he was making $2,400 a month.

But the two men nonetheless share an extraordinary bond, according to federal authorities: Both swore an oath to the Gambino crime family in a secret induction ceremony.

The striking disparities underscore a simple truth not always understood outside the ranks of the city's five crime families: Some mobsters reap millions from rackets, and in some cases from legitimate enterprises, but many struggle to maintain a middle-class existence, and some are routinely broke. The impoverished gangster barely eking out a living is so commonplace that mobsters have a word for these poorer men of honor: brokesters.

The archetypal Hollywood image of a wiseguy with prodigious appetites, swaggering in a finely tailored suit with a diamond pinkie ring and a fat roll of 50s, conceals the more nuanced reality of mob economics, according to some prosecutors, federal agents, organized-crime experts and a few mobsters. Crime figures are not immune to ordinary financial burdens and woes, like struggling to make car payments and finding money for groceries.

No self-respecting mobster wants to be seen as a brokester — nor would he want his peers to think he struggles to keep up with his middle-class suburban neighbors. But the pressure is great as well to keep up appearances as a successful criminal. Mobsters have even been known to borrow money from loan sharks to throw it around on the street — and to pass it up as tribute to superiors — while at the same time scrimping in the privacy of their home.

"The hours are long, there is no benefits package, there is a high risk of prosecution, and very little job security," said Gerald L. Shargel, a lawyer who has represented a number of mobsters, rich and poor, including several members of the Gotti clan.

By most accounts, mobsters fall into two types, earners and shooters, a division in some measure between the rich and those who wish they were. An earner is a man who can scheme and develop strategies, quickly deciphering the complexities of industry and commerce and labor. He is also someone who can sit down and blend in effortlessly with legitimate businessmen — often big businessmen — and union leaders.

Mr. Martino is an earner, according to federal prosecutors in Brooklyn. His work in an Internet pornography and a phone-cramming scheme was a boon to the Gambinos, netting hundreds of millions by billing people for "free tours" on pornographic Web sites and adding small charges to hundreds of thousands of telephone bills nationwide.

In September, he started serving a nine-year prison term after pleading guilty to wire fraud conspiracy and extortion in the scheme.

Pete Savino, a Genovese family associate, is also said to be an earner. He had a window installation business and was the mastermind of a scheme in the late 1980s and early '90s to earn millions for four mob families by billing the New York City Housing Authority for a few extra dollars on every one of the millions of thermal-pane windows being installed in the authority's buildings.

A shooter is, well, a shooter. A leg-breaker. A killer. Someone who can readily and rapidly use violence as a business practice.

Mr. Setaro's role in the mob division of labor seems clear. He is firmly ensconced in the mob's middle class, according to court papers and interviews with law enforcement officials.

According to an F.B.I. source cited in a report from 2000, Mr. Setaro, in a conversation about how he hated working as a bookmaker, said that "if he is ever going to jail it is going to be for what he really is, 'a shylock and a tough guy,' " referring to his work as a loan shark and a debt collector.

His prediction seems to have been accurate. He served 41 months for extortion.

James Tartaglione, a onetime Bonanno family captain who became a government witness in 2003 and has testified against fellow mobsters in several recent trials, explained the distinction to a jury in 2004.

"There's people that go out there, just have a knack for earning money," Mr. Tartaglione said at the trial of Bonanno boss Joseph Massino, an earner in his own right who was forced to give up more than $9 million in ill-gotten gains after he was convicted of murder and racketeering, and then agreed to cooperate with prosecutors. "They know how to put businesses together, and they are just good at what they do, as far as business. Then you got those tough guys that could go out and kill somebody and do whatever they have to do."

It is not easy to gauge the real net worth or earning capacity of an organized-crime figure. Most are constantly scheming to hide their assets and income — and not only from taxing authorities and federal prosecutors eager to seize them.

They often deceive their own crime families about schemes that are "off the books" and unknown to their superiors.

In New York's crime families, money generally flows up, from associates to soldiers to their captains to the administration and ultimately to the family's boss. But few procedures are set in stone.

The families do not have auditors. They rely on harsh punishment as a deterrent. In many mob murders, the victims were killed because they failed to pay tribute, or so the bosses thought, according to prosecutors and investigators.

Organized crime has many rules. Drug-dealing and prostitution are taboo; one cannot strike a fellow made man, or sleep with his wife or daughters; soldiers cannot borrow from a loan shark without approval; killing a boss is forbidden. But these rules are for people who revel in breaking rules.

Money flows into organized-crime families from almost as many sources as there are schemes in the heads of mobsters, from traditional staples like loan sharking, gambling, labor racketeering, cargo theft and bank robbery to skimming from industries that the mob once controlled and still influences in some cases: garbage hauling, construction, the piers, the garment district and the commercial linen business. Modern innovations include stock manipulation, Internet fraud, identity theft, health care schemes and everything from importing contaminated fish to counterfeiting designer blue jeans.

"There is no generally accepted percentage" that gets passed up, says Mark Feldman, who was in charge of the Organized Crime Section in the Brooklyn United States attorney's office for a decade. "It's a sliding scale driven by the particular greed and need and mentality of the particular individuals who control it."

In the early 1990s, when John Gotti was at the height of his power as the boss of the Gambino family, his 20 captains each handed up $3,000 for him at Christmastime, far less than the $10,000 demanded by his predecessor, Paul Castellano.

Joseph DeFede, who served as the acting boss of the Luchese family from 1994 until 1998, required that $1,000 from each soldier be passed into the family coffers each year. Much of that money went into a fund called the Well, to pay for lawyers' fees, to use for loan sharking and to finance other schemes, according to Mr. DeFede, a gravel-voiced 72-year-old who became a government witness in 2001.

He testified at a 2003 trial that he made about $1.14 million during the four years he served as acting boss and that the organization brought in $6 million, in a stretch of hard times for the crime family that prosecutors say continues.

Since Vincent Basciano, a former acting boss of the Bonanno family, was convicted of racketeering earlier this year, federal prosecutors have sought to seize $11.4 million from him, citing profits they say he has made over two decades, including $5.2 million from gambling operations, $6 million from joker poker and $200,000 passed up to him as tribute in 2004 alone.

Mr. Basciano, who took over the family after Mr. Massino's conviction in 2004, revealed his thinking about the division of lucre and labor in a conversation he had just before Christmas 2003. A captain at the time, he was speaking with Anthony Urso, then the family's acting boss, and Mr. Tartaglione, who was secretly cooperating with prosecutors and wearing a wire.

"Like I told Tony at Christmastime, I'm not taxing any of the guys that are doing the work," Mr. Basciano said, meaning the shooters. Let the earners put up the money, he said.

Mr. Tartaglione underscored the idea that it takes people with different skills to keep the family strong. "You need a lot of different things in the pot to make a good soup," he said.

Inveterate brokesters are a different matter. Few would argue they are a necessary ingredient in any recipe. This colorful cast of crime figures sometimes leaves prosecutors and investigators, not to mention defense lawyers, shaking their heads.

Carmine Russo and Elio Albanese are two such men, according to interviews with law enforcement officials and defense lawyers. Identified by prosecutors as soldiers in the Genovese family, the two were part of a loose-knit but active bank robbery crew in the 1980s and 90s that pulled off several high-profile heists, according to federal authorities. Mr. Russo most recently pleaded guilty to plotting to rob the payroll of a New York Times printing plant in Queens and was sentenced to 57 months in federal prison.

Mr. Russo, known as Baby Carmine, lived with his mother at the foot of Mulberry Street until she died. He and Mr. Albanese, known as Chinatown, often seemed down on their luck, according to investigators who tracked them over the years. As a rule, they quickly burned through their money and often found themselves hustling and lounging along Mulberry Street.

They found ways to scrape by. In the weeks leading up to the Fourth of July, the two men could be seen from the windows in the rear of the criminal court building in Lower Manhattan, selling fireworks by the case to people in cars who pulled up on Mulberry below Canal Street.

Mr. Russo was released from federal prison in January. A person who knows him says he had been selling plastic bags at the Fulton Fish Market before it moved and was now hoping to open a small business in his Chinatown neighborhood.

His sentence included a $7,500 fine. He has been paying it off in monthly increments of $50 or $60.

Is A Serial Killer Stalking Students? (AP)

AP, December 11, 2006

Vanishing students. Dead bodies. Fears something sinister is lurking in the shadows.

A string of college student drownings across the Midwest has all the makings of great mystery. Or does it?

Rumors have persisted for years that a serial killer is prowling Interstate 94, hunting young men in college bars and plunging them underwater. Investigators, though, say there's no evidence of foul play. They say the victims were so drunk they fell in the river and died.

Not so fast, says criminologist Douglas Gilbertson.

An assistant criminology professor at St. Cloud State University, Gilbertson has spent most of the past year researching the drownings. He completed a study this spring he believes shows patterns that indicate some of the cases could be murders -- and could be linked.

"We definitely do have some cases that are just not accidents. When you fill in the patterns that are coming out, that's the next logical step," Gilbertson said.

St. Cloud police Chief Dennis Ballantine, whose department investigated the drowning death of a St. Cloud State student this spring and concluded it was an accident, called Gilbertson's study a collection of coincidences.

"It would make a great TV drama, but there's no evidence to support it," Ballantine said. "The only common denominator I'm aware of is young people, alcohol and water."

According to Gilbertson's study, more than 20 college-age men from Minnesota to Ohio have drowned after disappearing from a bar or party since 1997. One of the hot spots is La Crosse, Wis., which sits on the Mississippi River and is home to three colleges. Eight college-age men have turned up dead in area rivers after vanishing from bars in the last eight years. Police have ruled the deaths accidental.

The St. Cloud area has seen cases, too. In 2002, St. John's University student Josh Guimond disappeared after leaving a party in Collegeville. This past spring 21-year-old St. Cloud State student Scot Radel disappeared after leaving a downtown bar. His body was later found in the Mississippi River.

In 2004 La Crosse police called a town meeting to allay that city's fears, but ended up getting heckled by people who insisted a killer was on the loose. And talk of a possible killer is everywhere on the Internet.

The killer theory got a boost this fall when Minneapolis police abruptly changed course in University of Minnesota student Chris Jenkins' death. Jenkins vanished from a downtown bar on Halloween 2002 and turned up dead along the Mississippi.

Investigators originally ruled Jenkins' death an accident or suicide, but reclassified it a homicide in November.

DOJ_NMG_0104429

The about-face caused other investigators to re-examine their conclusions, but so far no links to Jenkins have emerged. Police in La Crosse have asked the FBI to recheck their findings in the drownings, however.

La Crosse police Lt. Bob Berndt said he's aware of Gilbertson's study, but his department stands behind its conclusions.

"As police officers we have to deal with the facts," he said.

The Mississippi River divides St. Cloud, a city of about 61,000 people on the wooded plains about an hour and 20 minutes northwest of Minneapolis. Just as in La Crosse, the downtown bar district sits less than three blocks from the river.

Radel's death spurred Gilbertson to dig deeper into the drownings. He and two graduate students scoured the Internet, newspaper stories and police reports. They found 22 victims who went to college within 50 miles of I-94 between Moorhead, Minn., and East Lansing, Mich.

The victims fit a profile: white or Asian men in their early 20s, generally around 5-foot-8 and 165 pounds and athletic, with good grades. No victims were women.

They also found nearly 94 percent of the drownings took place within 100 miles of I-94. Nearly 82 percent of the drownings occurred during the first two weeks of the month, and three-quarters of the disappearance occurred when the moon was less than half-full.

Gilbertson said he can't judge some cases because he doesn't have enough information. He also acknowledges some are accidental. But others could be murders.

If the drownings were all random, there should be greater racial and academic diversity among the victims and they should be scattered all over the map, Gilbertson said.

The moonlight factor could support accidents because drunks would have less light to stumble around in, Gilbertson said. But it also could support a killer operating when darkness is deepest.

Amanda Presenger, one of the students who worked on the study, said the findings support the idea of a killer who travels the Midwest, perhaps for business.

"He's traveling back and forth, maybe at certain times of the month or certain times of the year. Maybe he travels closer to the beginning of the month for his job," said Presenger, 26, of Thunder Bay, Ont.

But for every reason to think a killer is at work, there's a counterpoint.

In 2004, weeks after University of Wisconsin-La Crosse wrestler Jared Dion was found dead in the Mississippi, two professors wrote a letter to students arguing the drownings are accidents.

The leading cause of death for young men is accidents; males between the ages of 15-24 have a drowning rate 10 times higher than females, according to the National Safety Council; and 40 percent of males in college binge drink, wrote then-psychology chair Betsy Morgan and sociology chair Kim Vogt.

"It is often harder to accept explanations that hit close to home -- explanations that involve actions we ourselves have engaged in that put us at risk, "the two professors wrote.

St. Cloud State spokeswoman Marge Proell said the university stands behind Gilbertson's research.

"It's a real good thinking piece, a starting place for taking a look at a problem," she said.

Allan Radel, Scot Radel's father, said he hasn't seen Gilbertson's findings. He thinks his son escaped from someone who had him in a car and meant to rob him. Footprints show Scot tumbled down an embankment to the Mississippi as he was running, headed across the frozen river and fell into open water.

"We do not believe Scot was murdered," Radel, of Owatonna, Minn., said. "We believe our son would be alive today if he hadn't been overserved with alcohol and if he hadn't been alone."

Gilbertson isn't giving up. He's still working on patterns in the drownings, and over Christmas he plans to travel from New York to Minnesota to pinpoint the drownings' exact locations.

"Additional research is necessary," Gilbertson wrote in the study, "and I am hard on its trail."

The Foley Report (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Charges of GOP malfeasance helped Democrats in last month's elections, especially those Mark Foley electronic messages to a former Congressional page that became an October sensation. So it's worth noting that the House Ethics Committee report on the episode that was released last Friday concluded with a whimper.

The bipartisan investigation found no evidence of any attempt to cover up Mr. Foley's communications with pages, despite the partisan and media allegations. Instead, the report confirms what was already well known, which is that GOP Members and staff had warned Mr. Foley about being too friendly with pages but should have been more assertive in blocking the gay Congressman from fraternizing with teenage boys. It found no violation of any House rules and recommended no disciplinary action.

The Committee's conclusions have been criticized as weak in some circles, but this is mostly from the same crowd that had shouted "coverup" without any evidence. The 89-page report sorts with care through the various sworn testimony about who knew what and when, and seems fair and sensible in meting out judgments. It also found no evidence that staff or Members knew about the more sexually explicit "instant messages" to a former page until they triggered Mr. Foley's resignation.

This is worth recalling given the hysterical calls from the right and left at the time for Mr. Hastert's resignation. The Speaker's main failing was putting too much confidence in his senior staff, especially counsel Ted Van Der Meid and Chief of Staff Scott Palmer, who failed to confront Mr. Foley or bring the matter to their boss's attention with enough urgency.

Their motives, the report speculates, might have been narrowly political to protect a GOP Member or because "some may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Rep. Foley's homosexuality." Whatever their reasons, their failure created an opportunity for Democrats to leak the emails to the press and create the firestorm that dominated the news at a crucial point in the fall campaign.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Troubled Prisons Push California To Seek A New Approach (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 10 — By nearly every measure, the California prison system is the most troubled in the nation. Overcrowding, inmate violence, recidivism, parole absconders and the prison medical system are among its many festering problems.

Now, with the November election behind them, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and state lawmakers from both parties say the time is ripe for the first major overhaul of the system since the 1970s.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican who easily won re-election, recently took the extraordinary step of declaring a state of emergency in the prison system, a move generally reserved for areas hit by natural disasters.

James E. Tilton, appointed in September by Mr. Schwarzenegger as the secretary of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, described the prison system as a “powder keg” at risk of exploding.

“If you look at the characteristics of other states that have riots, we have an environment that is rife with the same,” said Mr. Tilton, who had been the acting secretary since April.

The creation of new prisons seems likely, but the governor and lawmakers are also seriously contemplating broad changes to the parole system and the establishment of a sentencing guidelines commission — anathema to some just a year ago — like those used by other states to reduce overcrowding and its costs.

“The November election is over, and that is critical in terms of the politics of prison reform,” said the State Senate majority leader, Gloria Romero, Democrat of Los Angeles. “The governor is particularly looking at his legacy, and I do not believe he can have a positive one if he does not solve the prison crisis.”

Overcrowding is so severe that 16,000 inmates are assigned cots in hallways and gyms; last month, the state began asking for volunteers to be moved to prisons out of state.

The system’s medical program is in federal receivership and much of the rest of the system is under court monitoring. Cellblocks are teeming with violence. Seven of 10 inmates released from prison return, one of the highest rates in the country.

The state has the largest number of parole absconders, roughly 20 percent. Life for corrections officers has become so miserable, their union says, that there are nearly 4,000 vacancies. In May, just after Mr. Tilton started work, a corrections officer was held hostage for 10 hours by an inmate with a knife to her throat.

Like so many things in California, the scope of the prison problem stems largely from its size. The system houses 173,000 inmates — second-place Texas has 152,500 — and has an $8 billion budget.

Its population explosion is in large part an outgrowth of a general increase in the state’s population, its unusual sentencing structure and parole system, a legislature historically enamored with increasing penalties, and ballot measures like the three-strikes initiative.

Further, most rehabilitation programs have been eliminated from the system in recent years, which some criminal justice experts believe has increased the rate of recidivism. Some experts also argue that a legislature bound by term limits has created an expertise vacuum on the complex and emotional issue of prison sentencing.

Under laws passed in the 1970s, ironclad sentences for crimes are set by the legislature, with little discretion left to judges. Looked at simply, people sentenced to prison for three years get out in three years, whether they have behaved, gone to school or stared at the wall.

Once out, prisoners are assigned to parole and can be sent back to prison for automatic sentences for technical or criminal violations.

"All of these things lead to this incredible overcrowded prison system," said Barry Krisberg, president of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency.

Changes to the system have been akin to peace in the Middle East — everyone agrees on the outcome, but there has been great debate over its path.

The corrections officers union, among the state's most powerful, has been historically resistant to reducing the prison population. Conservative lawmakers and the governor have resisted any change that smacks of sentence reduction, and their liberal counterparts have been loath to be tarred as soft on crime.

But a consensus has been building over the last six months, with union officials, the governor, public policy experts and many members of the legislature agreeing that a sentencing commission is in order.

Sentencing commissions, made up of a diverse group of experts including former judges and crime victim advocates, essentially treat prison beds as scarce resources that need to be properly allocated.

Used in many states, the commissions, armed with empirical data, establish sentencing grids, with the offense on one axis and the offender's history on another, forming a narrow range of possible sentences.

These grids are presented to judges, who have discretion to go outside the range in light of extenuating circumstances. One of the system's greatest advantages, its proponents suggest, is that it depoliticizes sentencing by taking it out of the hands of elected officials.

Under a sentencing commission, a parole system can also be altered, placing, for instance, violent offenders under intense supervision after their release, and offering nonviolent offenders a chance at early parole.

"The way our current system works, all you have is sticks," said Joan Petersilia, director of the new Center for Evidence-Based Corrections at the University of California, Irvine, and one of the state's leading experts on prisons.

"But we want to give carrots, too," Professor Petersilia said. "If in fact you can show us stable housing and drug treatment program for six months, you are off parole. The benefit of that is self-selection. Inmates who are low risk and who are motivated will do it, and then we reduce caseload size and let officers target very violent offenders."

The best commissions, criminal justice experts agree, are those in which violent criminals spend more time behind bars than they did before the commission's creation, and nonviolent offenders are placed in treatment programs, county jails or other alternatives, paid for in part by the savings accrued from not having them in prison.

Mr. Tilton said that in addition to such a commission, the system would require more prison beds, so prisoners would not be housed in gyms and classrooms and those areas could be used once again for programs to prepare offenders for life outside prison.

These changes have the support of the California Correctional Peace Officers Association, which has regarded the governor warily.

"I am tired of my profession being categorized as a failure when our success is judged on the success of people who everyone else failed with," said Lance Corcoran, a spokesman for the association.

Not everyone is convinced. "If sentencing commission is a code word for shortening terms, I am against it," said George Runner, the State Senate Republican caucus chairman. "It is an interesting discussion, but it cannot be had until we create more beds and have a parole re-entry program that works."

The California District Attorneys Association also regards sentencing commissions with suspicion and will not support a law that does not increase sentences for some offenders.

Those who think a sentencing commission is an antonym for law and order "should look carefully at the statistics in a state like North Carolina," said Tom Ross, the former chairman of that state's sentencing commission, widely regarded as one of the most successful in the nation.

"Violent and career offenders serve nearly twice as much time as they did before the commission," Mr. Ross said, while low-level offenders are sent elsewhere. "What it resulted in here was a substantial reduction in the incarceration rate."

The Road To Reliable Elections (NYT)

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

Two influential federal advisory groups have added their voices to an emerging national consensus that voting machines must produce a voter-verified paper record if they are to be trusted. One of those groups, the one dominated not by scientists but by election officials, was more grudging than it should have been. But their analyses should give further support to members of Congress who plan to push next month for a strong federal law requiring voter-verified paper records.

More than half of the states now have laws requiring electronic voting machines to produce paper records that voters can review to ensure that their votes were correctly recorded. Voters understand that without this paper, there is no way of knowing if the software registered their choices incorrectly, either by accident or by design.

The National Institute of Standards and Technology, an agency that promotes good standards in everything from medical devices to smoke detectors, recently concluded that paperless electronic voting is unacceptable. The agency's scientists said that for electronic voting to be trustworthy, it must be "software independent," meaning there has to be a means apart from the machines' own software to prove that the vote tallies are correct.

The obvious way to do this is a voter-verified paper record. The institute allowed that there could be other ways, like a video or audio record of votes cast, but those technologies remain unproven.

NIST's report went to the technical guidelines committee of the Election Assistance Commission, the federal agency created after the 2000 meltdown to help improve elections. The guidelines committee voted down a resolution recommending that electronic voting be used only if the results are independently verifiable. Instead, it affirmed the need for paper trails or other independent verification going forward, but recommended giving a pass to localities already using flawed machines.

It is unfortunate that the stronger resolution did not pass. There is no excuse for sticking with unreliable voting machines. The guidelines committee has too many election officials on it, a group who often put their own convenience — and their desire not to be embarrassed by paper vote totals that conflict with the machine totals — ahead of the voters' interest in unimpeachable election results. Still, its opposition to paperless electronic voting is significant.

The Election Assistance Commission, whose role is merely advisory, long ago missed the chance to take the lead on electronic voting reform. The states that adopted paper requirements have done that. And it now looks as if Congress may finally resolve the matter for the whole nation.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, and Representative Rush Holt, Democrat of New Jersey, plan to introduce legislation to require voter-verified paper records. That legislation has a good chance of passing. If any members of Congress are uncertain why such a law is needed, the NIST report makes the case convincingly.

ANTITRUST:

Unusual Backlash Germinates Within Crop-Biotech Industry To Proposed Delta & Pine Union (WSJ)

By Scott Kilman

Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Monsanto Co.'s second attempt in seven years to bring southern seed giant Delta & Pine Land Co. to the altar could be running into trouble.

An unusual backlash against the proposed combination is taking root across the U.S. Farm Belt, driven in part by rivals in the crop-biotechnology industry, which Monsanto dominates.

The proposed $1.5 billion deal announced in August would give Monsanto more control over a major crop by a biotechnology company than ever before allowed, a prospect that upsets antibiotechnology activists. Delta & Pine Land's seeds produce half of America's cotton, the nation's fifth-biggest crop. Delta's market share is highest in southern states such as Georgia, where 92% of the cotton is grown from Delta seed.

Wall Street is treating the acquisition as a done deal. Delta & Pine Land stock has hovered just under the $42-a-share offer since Aug. 15, when it jumped 11% on news of the agreement. The shares were at $40.64, down 24 cents, Friday in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Monsanto shares fell 43 cents to $48.08 Friday on the Big Board. Monsanto is trading at more than 25 times estimated earnings for its next fiscal year, according to Thomson Financial, compared with about 16 for the stocks in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index.

Analysts have applauded the proposed combination because it would allow Monsanto to speed penetration of the cottonseed market with new genetically modified traits while ending several years of costly litigation between the two firms over their first breakup. Some biotech-industry leaders are prodding the attorneys general of several states to look into the combination as an antitrust review by the Justice Department extends into its fourth month. "The proposed Monsanto acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is clearly anticompetitive," said Doyle Karr, a spokesman for DuPont Co., the Wilmington, Del., chemicals giant. "We have serious concerns about the impact that it would have on farmers, the agriculture industry and ultimately consumers."

Syngenta AG, the Swiss biotech company, is telling cotton farmers that Monsanto's pending acquisition isn't in their best interest. Lobbyist and former U.S. Sen. Tim Hutchinson of Arkansas is squiring DuPont executives around Congress to press their case against the deal. "There are enough indications of concern that should cause [the Justice Department] to take a careful look," said Rep. Bob Inglis, a South Carolina Republican. Representatives for the North Carolina and Iowa attorneys general said their offices were looking into the deal. Iowa is the home of DuPont's Pioneer Hi-Bred International seed unit. While crop-biotechnology companies have a history of battling in courtrooms, they have tried to present a united front in the face questions over biotechnology safety.

"We are disappointed that competitors are using extreme tactics to try to gin up opposition to a deal that would benefit U.S. cotton growers and the cotton industry," said Carl M. Casale, executive vice president of Monsanto, which is fielding questions about the merger from officials in such noncotton states as Maine and Wisconsin. "The regulators should be allowed to do their job and review this transaction without the background noise," he said.

Delta & Pine Land Chief Executive and President Tom Jagodinski didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

For Delta shareholders, the industry scrape is the latest chapter in what has been an ill-starred romance between the Scott, Miss., company and Monsanto, based in St. Louis. Monsanto offered to buy Delta in 1998 for stock then valued at $1.8 billion. Monsanto backed out in December 1999 after antitrust regulators in the Clinton administration's Justice Department had reviewed the case for 19 months without making a decision. To get executives of Delta & Pine Land to shelve a lawsuit seeking $2 billion in damages over the breakup and consider a new offer, Monsanto promised to hand over $600 million if the new deal doesn't pass antitrust review by August 2007, a deadline that can be extended.

The opposition of DuPont and other firms reflects Delta's role in their plans to challenge Monsanto's decade-long dominance of crop biotechnology. Monsanto owns brands that sell about 25% of the seed used to grow the two biggest U.S. crops -- corn and soybeans -- and has licensed independent seed companies to use its genes.

Today, the majority of genetically modified crops -- including corn, soybeans and cotton -- contain Monsanto genes, which equip plants to make their own insecticide and to tolerate exposure to weedkillers. Such traits make plants so much easier to tend that farmers are willing to pay far more for genetically modified seed than conventional seed. DuPont and others are developing new genes with the aim of replacing Monsanto technology over the next decade. To win, they need to get their inventions into as many bags of seed as possible. DuPont and Syngenta, which own their own brands of corn and soybean seed, don't control any cottonseed. Delta, the last publicly traded pure seed company in the U.S., had been making moves to break its dependence on Monsanto genes.

In July -- a month before the proposed acquisition was announced -- Delta struck a deal to use genes, under development at DuPont's Pioneer seeds unit, designed to give plants the same sort of immunity to weedkillers as Monsanto genes. Likewise, Syngenta had licensed Delta to use genes it is developing that instruct a plant how to make its own bugkiller. To make the deal more palatable to regulators, Monsanto is promising to divest its Stoneville cottonseed business, which controls 12% of the market. Monsanto executives said they would be interested in being able to offer Syngenta and DuPont genes in Delta & Pine Land cottonseed. They stopped short of promising to use competitors' genes.

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

'I thought the law to date was that the Department of Justice is not given by the Sherman Act the authority to remake the entire American economy. But if we accept your view, I guess it is."

--Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer

That was Justice Breyer seemingly at wits' end earlier this month during oral arguments in Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, a class-action suit in which plaintiffs allege that the Baby Bell phone companies conspired to suppress competition in violation of antitrust laws. Justice Breyer was addressing J. Douglas Richards of Milberg Weiss, the law firm that has been indicted for fraud and is well known for stretching class action law. Twombly was brought on behalf of all telephone users in the continental U.S.

The plaintiffs claim that BellSouth, Verizon, and the other Bells agreed among themselves to refrain from competing against each other and to prevent smaller telecom rivals from entering their respective markets. Mr. Richards had just finished explaining to the Court why "proving the facts alleged is not a plaintiff's burden." He said it was contrary to the Bells' self-interest to stay out of each other's territory and therefore a conspiracy can be inferred.

The Justices seemed unpersuaded that actual facts supporting these claims weren't necessary. They also questioned the plaintiffs' underlying assertion that it was in the Bells' self-interest to invade each other's turf, which by the way had been divvied up not by the Bells but by Justice Department lawyers in the wake of Ma Bell's dismantling.

Justices Antonin Scalia and Ruth Bader Ginsburg told Mr. Richards that the Bells didn't have to conspire to figure out that expanding into a competitor's territory might not pay off. "It seems to me perfectly natural [behavior] for companies that have a certain geographic area in which they are the principal," said Justice Scalia. "[A]lthough technically they can enter somebody else's geographic area, they know that if they do they will be subjected to the same thing."

The High Court's skepticism is warranted and we can hope will be reflected in its decision. The telecom landscape has changed dramatically in recent decades, both since the breakup of Ma Bell and the Telecommunications Act of 1996, which never anticipated the Internet's ability to change incentives and topple business models. Congress gave the Bells access to the long-distance market in return for opening up their local networks to competitors. The expectation was that the regional Bells would march right into each other's territory looking for customers. Things didn't turn out that way.

The traditional telephone market continues to shrink. There's no money in residential service, and the profit from business customers is relatively small. The action is in broadband, and the Bells' real competition comes from wireless providers, cable companies and Internet telephony. The Bells understandably have focused on where their competitive advantage allows them to roll out new services in these new markets, not on moving into the territory of fellow incumbent carriers, where they have no infrastructure in place.

Markets can behave in unison -- think of airline tickets or gas prices -- without necessarily engaging in anticompetitive behavior. And that's as it should be. If the threshold for bringing antitrust conspiracy suits is lowered to the point where, well, you need no direct evidence of an actual conspiracy, then the sky's the limit for the plaintiffs bar. And as Justice Breyer's comment makes clear, a lot more than the cost of phone service would be at stake.

Democrats' Energy Policy To Stress Cutting Demand (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In one of its final acts, the Republican Congress modestly increased the nation's domestic oil and natural-gas supplies, permitting more drilling for oil and natural-gas in the Gulf of Mexico. When Democrats take control next month, they will attempt to change the direction of energy policy, focusing more on shrinking demand, especially for gasoline and other products that rely heavily on imported oil.

The House will consider a variety of incentives for vehicles that burn 85% ethanol, or so-called biodiesel, where vegetable oils are substituted for petroleum. President Bush is an enthusiastic backer of ethanol, and boosting federal support could be an area where the White House and the new Congress find common ground.

Senate Democrats will consider more direct approaches to curbing fossil-fuel demand, including raising efficiency standards for auto makers, forcing them to make cars that get more miles per gallon of gasoline.

Because Democrats are more influenced by environmental groups, which strongly oppose offshore oil and gas exploration, they appear less willing to consider the supply-side solutions that have been popular in the Republican Congress. Their most recent big energy bill, last year, was heavy on incentives for coal, as well as for ethanol and nuclear power.

Leaders of the coalition that pushed the last energy bill through Congress -- the offshore-drilling measure passed early Saturday morning -- had hoped to open a much larger area before Republicans gave up control. But they declared victory nonetheless. "When it comes to passing important legislation around here," said Rep. John E. Peterson (R., Pa.), "you learn to shoot for the stars in the hope that you might land on the moon. I don't know that we even approached the stratosphere with this bill, but I do believe it represents an important first step."

Sponsors of the offshore-drilling package, originally called the "Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act," say it will lead to production of 1.26 billion barrels of oil and as much as 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas -- enough to heat and cool six million homes for 15 years -- which lie under the 8.3 million acres in deepwater areas of the Gulf opened for exploration.

The measure is less ambitious than an earlier version passed by the House, which could have opened 356 million acres, but was rejected by the Senate. It would have opened up areas along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts as well as in the Gulf and would have allowed states to waive federal moratoria that prevent offshore drilling.

The new bill doesn't add much beyond what likely would have happened without congressional action. Much of this land already was scheduled for opening by the Interior Department over the next five years. But with the changeover in Capitol Hill, Republicans and energy-industry allies figured it was the best they would be able to get for some time.

Agriculture groups and the chemical industry want more exploration in what are believed to be gas-rich areas along the outer continental shelf. Farm groups want cheaper natural gas because it's a prime ingredient of fertilizer. The chemical industry, which uses natural gas as a feedstock for many chemicals and plastics, argues that many U.S. plants may move overseas, where gas is cheaper, prompting a loss of high-skilled jobs unless gas prices fall in the U.S.

Sponsors of the bill that ultimately passed said it was adequate and timely, coming as the price of natural gas has started moving up, coming out of a mid-year slump. "Just last week," said Sen. Pete Domenici, (R., N.M.), "the price of natural gas was $7.79 per million Btu (British Thermal Units). That is nearly double the price it was two months ago."

U.S. Finds Electric Power Grid Can Fuel Fleets Of Plug-In Cars (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's existing electric power grid could fuel as many as 180 million electric cars, a Department of Energy study estimates.

The study, being released today by the department's Pacific Northwest National Laboratory, is the federal government's first look at the grid's capacity to handle the demands of so-called plug-in hybrids, which can be operated as an all-electric car for most daily commutes. Until now, there have been few detailed studies of the effect of plug-ins, which are championed by environmental groups and the utility industry.

Currently there are only a few hundred plug-ins on the road, most hand-made prototypes or unsanctioned modifications of existing hybrids, which use small gasoline engines that charge their electric motors, but can't plug in to recharge.

General Motors Corp. recently announced it will build a plug-in Saturn, and other makers are thought to be planning similar ventures. The report estimates that the current cost of electricity needed to power a car is roughly one-third the equivalent amount of gasoline.

"It is intriguing to think of the trade and national-security benefits if our vehicles switched from oil to electrons," said Robert Pratt, one of the authors of the study and an energy researcher at the laboratory. "Plus, since the utilities would be selling more electricity without having to build more plants or power lines, electricity prices could go down for everyone."

The report estimates that plug-ins, made in volume, would cost between $6,000 and $10,000 more than existing vehicles -- largely due to the cost of carrying larger battery packs. The study estimates that because electricity is cheaper than gasoline, car buyers would recover the additional cost over five to eight years, depending on the price of gasoline.

The study estimates that if 84% of the nation's 220 million vehicles relied primarily on electricity, emissions of carbon dioxide thought to be accelerating climate change would be cut by as much as 5%. Vehicle-produced smog would drop in major cities.

But sulfur dioxide, which causes acid rain, would rise in rural areas where coal-burning power plants are located. The U.S. gets about half of its electricity from burning coal.

Stronger Rules On Produce Likely After Outbreaks Of E.Coli (NYT)

By Andrew Martin

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

With processed fresh produce like bagged salads and baby carrots growing in popularity in the past decade, the Food and Drug Administration realized as long ago as 2000 that recommendations for safe handling of the products were needed.

The agency went so far as to draft guidelines and kept the issue high on its priority list, but pressed by budget cuts and competing F.D.A. demands, the proposal languished.

Now, with the recent outbreaks of E.coli related to processed vegetables, the F.D.A.'s oversight of produce is likely to be treated with new urgency.

"I think it's fairly clear that something needs to change," said Dr. David Acheson, the chief medical officer for the F.D.A.'s Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition. Regulations for produce could be part of the changes, he said.

The problems are so acute that the produce industry, long wary of regulation but stung more recently by a decline in sales, is now asking for more government oversight. And some Democratic members of Congress who have long agitated for food safety reforms say they will seek oversight hearings, additional money and new legislation on food safety when they assume control in January.

"The food safety process is collapsing," said Representative Rosa DeLauro, Democrat of Connecticut, who has repeatedly called for merging the food safety functions of the F.D.A. and the Department of Agriculture into one agency.

Part of the problem, critics say, is that the F.D.A.'s food safety budget has been repeatedly slashed even as the agency's responsibilities are multiplying. Besides a growing number outbreaks of E.coli and other nasty pathogens, the F.D.A. is also dealing with new food technologies, nutrition-related labeling issues and more than twice as much imported produce as a decade ago.

No one believes that a beefed-up F.D.A. would eliminate all cases of E.coli, salmonella or other food-borne illnesses. Farmers cannot prevent wild animals from polluting their fields, for instance.

But some observers believe that stronger F.D.A. oversight of produce could reduce the number of outbreaks.

Currently the F.D.A. relies on voluntary food safety guidelines, like the "Guide to Minimize Microbial Food Safety Hazards for Fresh Fruits and Vegetables" from 1998.

Additional guidelines are needed to address the growing processed produce industry, the F.D.A. says, because the risk of contamination is increased as food is handled, particularly if the food is cut or broken, "breaking the natural exterior barrier of the produce."

In the most recent cases of E.coli, the source has been traced to bagged spinach and to cut green onions.

But passing voluntary guidelines, like the one for processed produce, has become more difficult because of insufficient staffing, research and the deregulatory environment under the Bush administration, according to former F.D.A. employees.

Overall, the F.D.A.'s food safety budget has been declining for decades, with money being shifted into the agency's oversight of drug and medical devices, said William K. Hubbard, a former F.D.A. associate commissioner. He said the portion of the budget devoted to food safety has fallen to about 25 percent from 50 percent in the early 1970s.

Operating funds for the F.D.A.'s Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition, the division at the heart of its food safety operations, have decreased to an estimated $25 million next year from $48 million in 2003, and the number of full-time positions has fallen to 817 from 950, according to F.D.A. records.

Food inspectors are a separate part of the F.D.A. budget that was not immediately available; however, the number of inspectors has declined to 1,962 from about 2,200 in 2003, F.D.A. documents show.

"Food safety is a shared goal by the food industry and government regulators, " said Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman. "Outbreaks as we've seen recently are not in the interest of the food industry, consumers, or regulators, so no one should be under the misimpression that food saftey is taken lightly. Our goal has been to ensure that F.D.A. has flexibility and the appropriate level of resources to accomplish its mission. Despite these recent cases, F.D.A. and the food industry have been effective," he said.

Tommy G. Thompson, who as President Bush's secretary of health and human services oversaw the F.D.A., is helping to lead a bi-partisan group called Coalition for a Stronger F.D.A. pushing Congress to increase the agency's budget.

"You can't do it on the cheap," said Mr. Thompson, who left the agency in 2005. "You are going to have to put more dollars in the F.D.A."

Mr. Hubbard, who retired last year, said the agency was currently so stretched that they can do little more than react to outbreaks, rather than try to prevent them. The agency needs more money for research, more staff to develop guidelines and regulations and more inspectors, Mr. Hubbard said.

"F.D.A. is in a position that all they can do is send in inspectors after the cow has left the barn," Mr. Hubbard said. "They don't have the ability to set standards and enforce standards."

But the workload keeps growing. For instance, according to the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a nutrition advocacy group, the number of food-borne illnesses linked to produce doubled from 1998 to 2004.

The amount of imported horticulture products, meanwhile, has increased by 145 percent in the last decade, to $27 billion in 2005 from $11 billion in 1995, according to government statistics.

The Agriculture Department is responsible for regulating meat, poultry and some egg products. The F.D.A. oversees seafood, produce and everything else, estimated to be 80 percent of the food supply. Still the U.S.D.A.'s food safety budget is more than twice as large as the F.D.A.'s, and the U.S.D.A. has about 7,700 food inspectors — nearly four times as many as the F.D.A.

A U.S.D.A. report from 2004 said voluntary guidelines had been unsuccessful in the past.

Problems persist because incentives for growers to adopt better food-safety techniques are weak, according to a U.S.D.A. report that examined an outbreak of Hepatitis A from green onions in 2003.

Outbreaks Reveal Food Safety Net's Holes (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

First it was spinach. Then tomatoes. Now possibly green onions.

Over the past three months, fresh produce has been the culprit in one episode of food-borne illness after another, the latest an E. coli outbreak that appears to be linked to green onions served at Taco Bell restaurants in the Northeast. More than 60 people have been sickened in that outbreak.

The patchwork of federal and state regulations that is supposed to ensure food safety has become less effective as the nation's produce supply has grown increasingly industrial. Three months after the spinach scare, there is no agreement on what should be done to reduce health risks from the nation's fruits and vegetables even as each episode of illness has heightened a sense of urgency.

The number of produce-related outbreaks of food-borne illness has increased from about 40 in 1999 to 86 in 2004, according to the Center for Science in the Public Interest. Americans are now more likely to get sick from eating contaminated produce than from any other food item, the center said.

"It's fairly clear something needs to change," David W.K. Acheson, a top federal food safety official, said Friday. "Having illness and repeated outbreaks, especially the ones we've seen in the last couple of months, is clearly unacceptable to everyone."

Consumer advocates think that tougher mandatory food safety standards and stepped-up enforcement are the answer. The country's largest food distributors and restaurants are pursuing self-regulation, arguing that government rules can take years to put in place. Produce growers and packers have suggested a voluntary system with elements of mandatory oversight. But even the industry proposals are months away from taking effect.

Several factors have contributed to the rise in outbreaks: greater consumption of fresh produce, especially cut fruits and vegetables; wider distribution; improved electronic reporting of outbreaks; and an aging population more susceptible to food-borne illness. Produce presents a special food safety challenge because, unlike meat, which can be rid of bacteria through proper cooking, it is meant to be consumed raw. There is no "kill step," as food safety experts put it.

E. coli O157:H7 has been a particular problem. Unlike the usually benign E. coli bacteria that live in warm-blooded animals and humans, the strain produces toxins that destroy the intestinal lining, leading to bloody diarrhea, kidney failure and, sometimes, death. It was first blamed for a food-borne-illness outbreak in the early 1980s, leading some microbiologists to suggest that it arose in industrial livestock, which are force-fed grain and pumped with antibiotics.

The strain that caused September's spinach outbreak, which killed three and sickened about 200, has been found in cattle feces near a California spinach field and in wild pigs that roamed through it.

The source of the Taco Bell outbreak has not been found, but the company suspects green onions -- also from California. Fresh tomatoes served in restaurants this fall, believed to have made nearly 200 people sick, carried another bacterium, salmonella.

Taco Bell President Greg Creed said Saturday that the produce supply system needs better guidelines and procedures.

Although meat and dairy products are regulated by the Department of Agriculture, the safety of fruits and vegetables is the responsibility of the Food and Drug Administration and the states. But they have jurisdiction only over processing plants. Food safety at the farm level is largely self-regulated.

That has left government regulators in the position over the past eight years of nagging the produce industry to improve food safety by publishing voluntary guidelines and sending letters of admonishment.

The FDA's critics say the agency doesn't have the manpower to do more. From 2003 to 2006, the budget for the agency's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition has fallen 37 percent, according to agency data. That has meant fewer inspectors and less frequent inspections. In 2005, the FDA conducted 4,573 inspections of domestic food-processing operations. For 2006, the agency said, it hopes to conduct 3,400. There are more than 12,000 such plants in the nation.

"The reality of FDA's situation is they don't have the basic inspectors to inspect the food supply they're in charge of," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, food safety director for the Center for Science in the Public Interest. "They just don't have the people . . . to manage this problem at the farm level."

In mid-November, the CSPI petitioned the FDA, as well as the state of California, to set mandatory safety standards for fruits and vegetables. Consumer advocates also want Congress to give the agency more resources and enforcement powers. They point to two recent food recalls as examples of how rarely the FDA inspects some processing plants.

The FDA last inspected House of Thaller's processing plant in July 2002 and found deficiencies with the food safety plans, sanitation monitoring and pathogen testing, according to records obtained by the consumer group Food & Water Watch. On May 19 this year, the Knoxville, Tenn., company recalled 160,000 pounds of deli salads and dips because of potential contamination.

The agency inspected the facilities of Albert Lea, Minn.-based Mrs. Gerry's Kitchen three times in five years, most recently in August 2005. During those visits, inspectors identified problems with the company's food safety plans. In May, two days before the House of Thaller recall, Mrs. Gerry's recalled 54,000 pounds of salads because of potential contamination.

The FDA's Acheson said the agency's food safety work hasn't suffered as a result of funding constraints.

"As resources shift around in terms of overall total resources and within different centers, what the agency does is to shift to resources to address the maximum public health risk. The spinach investigation was, no question, a high priority," he said. "We can always do more with more, but do I think a lack of resources will impact efforts to prevent future outbreaks? No."

Buyers such as Safeway and Albertsons have chosen not to rely on government regulators and instead hired their own auditors to do inspections. But both food safety officials and auditors say there is little consistency because the government guidelines aren't specific enough.

"We don't have enough science to base those [guidelines] on to be comprehensive," said Kevin Reilly, a California food safety official who is participating in the investigation of the E. coli outbreak traced to bagged spinach. "What's necessary is an agreed-upon set of agricultural practices. Instead of 'Be aware of water quality,' we need to say, 'Test it with this frequency and in this fashion.' "

The privately funded system of audits and inspections, however, remains the produce industry's main tool for preventing future outbreaks.

In October, executives of eight supermarket chains and distributors, including Safeway, Sysco, Wegmans and Kroger, sent a letter to growers and packers, demanding that they develop a food safety program for lettuce and other leafy greens by Dec. 15. The program has been drafted but is still being reviewed by regulators.

Not content to let the growers write their own standards, the Food Marketing Institute, which represents large retailers and wholesalers, and the National Restaurant Association are developing separate guidelines to update those used by private auditors.

The growers, led by two trade groups, Western Growers and the United Fresh Produce Association, have responded with standards that government regulators would enforce through a marketing order -- an agreement farmers pay to participate in designed to stabilize market conditions for certain commodities. Such orders are enforced by the Department of Agriculture's Agricultural Marketing Service, not the FDA, and food safety is not typically their main purpose.

The California Department of Food and Agriculture is considering the growers' proposal and could put an order in place as early as late January, spokesman Steve Lyle said.

The federal Agricultural Marketing Service hasn't responded yet, a Western Growers spokesman said.

Officials at the FDA who are reviewing the proposal have so far welcomed the market-order approach as part of the solution. "If you look at what might be able to happen before next growing season . . . a rule is not a practical proposition," Acheson said.

There's one area of agreement: the consequences of inaction.

"Unless something changes," Reilly said, "we will have another outbreak."

CDC Reports E. Coli Cases Linked To Taco Bell Holding At 61 (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, December 11, 2006

The E. coli outbreak tied to Taco Bell restaurants in four states may be finally slowing down.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reports that the number of people infected with the dangerous O157:H7 strain is now 61 and holding. The onset of the last reported case was Dec. 2.

Thus far, all the cases have been linked to Taco Bells in New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania and Delaware, the CDC said in a release.

Will Bortz, a spokesman for Irvine, Calif.-based Taco Bell, said Sunday that tests on all menu items have ruled out every ingredient except scallions as a possible source of the outbreak.

The company last week removed the green onions from the menus of its 5,800 restaurants in the USA and Canada after they were implicated in preliminary tests.

"If you walk into a Taco Bell today, it's completely safe for you to eat. Everything that's on our menu has tested negative. Green onions are off the menu," Bortz said.

The Food and Drug Administration has not released results of tests conducted on samples taken from the distributor that supplied Taco Bell's green onions. Backup tests have not yet confirmed the source of the contamination.

This fall has seen a string of produce-borne outbreaks, the largest being E. coli in bagged spinach that sickened more than 200 people.

If there's one good thing to come out of the outbreaks, it's that everyone — from producers to the public — is finally focusing on the farm, which is where food safety has to start, said Douglas Powell, professor of food safety at Kansas State University.

Until now, consumer advocates have called for more federal oversight while most produce commodity and grocery groups have told consumers that "food-borne illness is their fault," that is, if they would only properly cook and clean, there wouldn't be a problem, Powell said.

Mike Doyle, a professor of food safety at the University of Georgia in Athens, notes that food producers often argue that raw produce, without the bacteria-killing step of cooking, can't be rendered entirely safe "and still have an acceptable product from a taste and sensory perspective."

"But I just don't think that's the answer," Doyle said. Safety can be achieved "if commitment is made."

Taco Bell has seen this particular light.

"As we move forward, what we would really like is to work with government regulators and the rest of the industry to figure out how to change how things are dealt with at the farm and supplier level," Bortz said. "We need to see if we can stop this from ever happening again."

The meat industry's food-borne illness wake-up call came in 1993 when hundreds were sickened in an E. coli outbreak tied to Jack in the Box hamburgers.

The industry instituted HACCP, which stands for Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Point. A system designed to identify and control hazards, HACCP was originally used by NASA to ensure food safety on space flights.

Within a decade, E. coli O157:H7 rates began to plummet, Doyle said.

Experts considered the produce industry's wake-up call to be the 1996 outbreak of E. coli O157:H7 in unpasteurized Odwalla apple juice, which sickened dozens of people.

"Hopefully enough has happened now that (the produce industry will) get it together one of these days," Powell said.

Has Politics Contaminated The Food Supply? (NYT)

By Eric Schlosser

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

THIS fall has brought plenty of bad news about food poisoning. More than 200 people in 26 states were sickened and three people were killed by spinach contaminated with E. coli O157:H7. At least 183 people in 21 states got salmonella from tainted tomatoes served at restaurants. And more than 160 people in New York, New Jersey and other states were sickened with E. coli after eating at Taco Bell restaurants.

People are always going to get food poisoning. The idea that every meal can be risk-free, germ-free and sterile is the sort of fantasy Howard Hughes might have entertained. But our food can be much safer than it is right now.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 76 million Americans are sickened, 325,000 are hospitalized, and 5,000 die each year because of something they ate.

Part of the problem is that the government's food-safety system is underfinanced, poorly organized and more concerned with serving private interests than with protecting public health. It is time for the new Democratic Congress to reverse a decades-long weakening of regulations and face up to the food-safety threats of the 21st century.

One hundred years ago, companies were free to follow their own rules. Food companies sold children's candy colored with dangerous heavy metals. And meatpackers routinely processed "4D animals" — livestock that were dead, dying, diseased or disabled.

The publication of Upton Sinclair's novel "The Jungle" in 1906 — with its descriptions of rat-infested slaughterhouses and rancid meat — created public outrage over food safety. Even though the book was written by a socialist agitator, a Republican president, Theodore Roosevelt, eagerly read it.

After confirming Sinclair's claims, Roosevelt battled the drug companies, the big food processors and the meatpacking companies to protect American consumers from irresponsible corporate behavior. He argued that bad business practices were ultimately bad for business. After a fight in Congress, Roosevelt largely got his way with passage of the Meat Inspection Act and the Pure Food and Drug Act of 1906.

The decades that followed were hardly an idyll of pure food and flawless regulation. But the nation's diverse agricultural and food-processing system limited the size of outbreaks. Thousands of small slaughterhouses processed meat, and countless independent restaurants prepared food from fresh, local ingredients. If a butcher shop sold tainted meat or a restaurant served contaminated meals, a relatively small number of people were likely to become ill.

Over the past 40 years, the industrialization and centralization of our food system has greatly magnified the potential for big outbreaks. Today only 13 slaughterhouses process the majority of the beef consumed by 300 million Americans.

And the fast-food industry's demand for uniform products has encouraged centralization in every agricultural sector. Fruits and vegetables are now being grown, packaged and shipped like industrial commodities. As a result, a little contamination can go a long way. The Taco Bell distribution center in New Jersey now being investigated as a possible source of E. coli supplies more than 1,100 restaurants in the Northeast.

While threats to the food supply have been growing, food-safety regulations have been weakened. Since 2000, the fast-food and meatpacking industries have given about four-fifths of their political donations to Republican candidates for national office. In return, these industries have effectively been given control of the agencies created to regulate them.

The current chief of staff at the Agriculture Department used to be the beef industry's chief lobbyist. The person who headed the Food and Drug Administration until recently used to be an executive at the National Food Processors Association.

Cutbacks in staff and budgets have reduced the number of food-safety inspections conducted by the F.D.A. to about 3,400 a year — from 35,000 in the 1970s. The number of inspectors at the Agriculture Department has declined to 7,500 from 9,000.

A study published in Consumer Reports last week showed the impact of such policies: 83 percent of the broiler chickens purchased at supermarkets nationwide were found to be contaminated with dangerous bacteria.

Aside from undue corporate influence and inadequate financing, America's food-safety system is hampered by overlapping bureaucracies. A dozen federal agencies now have some food safety oversight. The Agriculture Department is responsible for meat, poultry and some egg products, while the F.D.A. is responsible for just about everything else.

And odd, conflicting rules determine which agency has authority. The F.D.A. is responsible for the safety of eggs still in their shells; the Agriculture Department is responsible once the shells are broken. If a packaged ham sandwich has two pieces of bread, the F.D.A. is in charge of inspecting it — one piece of bread, and Agriculture is in charge. A sandwich-making factory regulated by the Agriculture Department will be inspected every day, while one inspected by the F.D.A. is likely to be inspected every five years.

Neither agency has the power to recall contaminated food (with the exception of tainted infant formula) or to fine companies for food-safety lapses. And when the cause of an outbreak is unknown, it's unclear which agency should lead the investigation.

Last year, Representative Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut and Senator Richard Durbin of Illinois, both Democrats, introduced an important piece of food-safety legislation that tackles these problems. Their Safe Food Act would create a single food-safety agency with the authority to test widely for dangerous pathogens, demand recalls and penalize companies that knowingly sell contaminated food.

It would eliminate petty bureaucratic rivalries and make a single administrator accountable for the safety of America's food. And it would facilitate a swift, effective response not only to the sort of inadvertent outbreaks that have occurred this fall, but also to any deliberate bioterrorism aimed at our food supply.

The Safe Food Act deserves strong bipartisan backing. Aside from industry lobbyists and their Congressional allies, there is little public support for the right to sell contaminated food. Whether you're a Republican or a Democrat, you still have to eat.

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, December 11, 2006

The Milwaukee suburb of New Berlin gets half its water from the Great Lakes and half from underground wells that are tainted with radium, a radioactive element.

The city of 38,500 has a simple solution to its water problem: draw more water from Lake Michigan, 10 miles away. That probably won't happen.

New Berlin may look like a typical Midwestern suburb, but it's really a border town — on the edge of the Great Lakes watershed — and the west side of town is on the wrong side of the water slope.

A new multistate agreement working its way through state legislatures builds a legal wall around the largest source of fresh water in the world. The deal would ensure that no Great Lakes water is ever shipped outside the region — not in pipes to Arizona, not in ships to Asia, not even to Madison, Wis., or Columbus, Ohio.

The Great Lakes Water Resources Compact was signed last December by the governors of the eight states that border the lakes — Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York — and the premiers of the Canadian provinces of Quebec and Ontario. The agreement requires approval of state legislatures before it is sent to Congress for final approval. Ohio's Legislature is expected this week to become the first to approve the pact. New York's may approve it later this month.

"This is not a water grab," says Sam Speck, director of the Ohio Department of Natural Resources. "It's a commitment to protect a resource in the face of climate change and other challenges."

The Great Lakes contain nine-tenths of the nation's fresh water and supply drinking water to 30 million people in Chicago, Toronto, Buffalo and elsewhere. The lakes are an economic engine and the cultural centerpiece for much of the upper Midwest. But the fragile ecology of the lakes has suffered from pollution, invasive species of fish and the diversion of water to support Chicago and other cities.

The new agreement would control who can use the water and how much.

The eight states started work on the compact in 1999 when a Canadian company proposed shipping water in tankers from Lake Ontario to Asia. Other proposals had been floated over the years about piping Great Lakes water to Arizona, western Canada or elsewhere.

"We realized there was nothing legally to prohibit that kind of project or something similar," says David Naftzger, executive director of the non-partisan Council of Great Lakes Governors, which supports environmentally responsible economic growth.

The states and provinces reached a voluntary water deal in 2001, then spent four years trying to agree on language that could be put into law.

The compromise agreement lets "border communities" such as New Berlin apply to use Great Lakes water if they meet tough standards.

Sunny Slope Road is the dividing line in New Berlin. One side of the road has access to all the Great Lakes water it needs. The other side can't get a drop without approval from the state and probably every other state, too. Michigan and environmental groups already have objected.

"It's such a political thing, I doubt it can happen," New Berlin utilities supervisor Rick Jackson says.

His city is under a federal order to reduce the radium in its west side water. The city will probably spend $4 million on a treatment plant to reduce the radium — a naturally occurring substance found in the area's deep well— instead of getting more water from Milwaukee, which supplies the east side of town.

The water agreement was possible because environmentalists, business groups and political leaders agreed on one thing: Nobody outside the region should get Great Lakes water.

"If we want sunshine, we'll move to Arizona," says George Kuper, president of the Council of Great Lakes Industries. "If they want water, let them move to Michigan."

Water rights advocate Terry Anderson, director of the Property and Environment Research Center in Bozeman, Mont., says it's a mistake to lock up Great Lakes water inside the watershed.

He says water rights should be allocated and traded in the marketplace, even if that means shipping water to Asia at the right price. "It's no different than shipping out cars or iron ore," he says.

Great Lakes water is a powerful economic development tool for industry and tourism in a region that is suffering economically from the decline in the auto industry and other manufacturing businesses.

"Fresh water is our ace in the hole," says Tim Eder, executive director of the Great Lakes Commission, a multistate agency that organizes policy among the states. "If it got to be a humanitarian crisis, I personally might look at letting some water leave the region. But short of that, the water stays here."

Business groups, environmentalists and regulators have practical reasons for locking up the water. Levels in Lake Superior, Lake Michigan and Lake Huron are near historic lows.

The Great Lakes' depths have fluctuated by 4 to 6 feet for the past 4,500 years and the three largest lakes are near the bottom of that range, says Roger Gauthier, a hydrologist at the Great Lakes Commission. Lake Superior entered a drought in 1998 and is at its lowest level in 80 years.

This hurts fishing, hydropower electricity generation, tourism and shipping. Freighters can't carry as much cargo in shallow water. Some islands no longer are surrounded by water.

The big concern: Is the low water level caused by global warming? Warmer winters spur evaporation because the lakes are covered less often with protective ice and snow. "I haven't heard anyone say yet that it's climate change, but we're near record lows, so it makes you wonder," Gauthier says.

Not everyone is thrilled by the water agreement.

"The idea of the compact makes a lot of sense, but it got screwed up a little at the end," says Linda Woggon, a lawyer for the Ohio of Chamber of Commerce. "The last draft had a tiny word change that will make it nearly impossible for any major new development to occur."

The last-minute change says new water withdrawals can't cause a significant change to the quantity or quality of Great Lakes water or any of the rivers or streams feeding into it, Woggon says.

She says the result would mean automatic rejection of a steel plant that wanted to open in the Great Lakes watershed, employ 500 people and use 1 million gallons of water a day.

The business community wanted a balancing test that weighed the value of the new factory or housing development against the environmental impact on the lakes.

Despite these misgivings, the Ohio Chamber of Commerce and other business groups support the deal. They are asking state legislatures to add separate language when approving the compact that interprets the agreement in a less restrictive way. The Ohio bill under consideration has these changes.

Some environmentalists are unhappy, too. Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation opposes the agreement because it puts no limit on the amount of bottled water for consumers that can be withdrawn from the lakes and streams.

"If you fill a truck with water, you have to follow the rules. But if you put the water into bottles less than 5.2 gallons, you can take as much as you want. That makes no sense," says Terry Swier, president of the group, which has sued Nestlé's Ice Mountain water-bottling operation in Stanwood, Mich., for taking water from Sanctuary Springs in the watershed.

But most environmental groups signed on to the compact.

"This sets up a decision-making process and standards," says Cheryl Mendoza, manager of water conservation at the Alliance for the Great Lakes, "so we can take care of water in a responsible way."

Guilty Plea Entered (MARTBULL)

By Charles Boothe, Bulletin Staff Writer

Martinsville Bulletin, December 11, 2006

By ex-deputy in sheriff case

A former Henry County Sheriff's Office deputy has pleaded guilty to two charges in the sheriff's office scandal after reaching a plea agreement with the government. Five charges were dismissed under the agreement.

Bradley Scott Martin, 33, entered guilty pleas on one count of racketeering conspiracy and one count of drug conspiracy in district court in Roanoke on Friday, according to Heidi Coy with the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"It is a written plea agreement that he signed with the government," Coy said, adding that Martin remains free on a $25,000 bond.

A release issued Friday by the U.S. Attorney's Office stated that Martin pleaded guilty to using his position as a county deputy to distribute steroids and ketamine (a Schedule III sedative, also used as a "date-rape" drug), and using his law enforcement connections to avoid detection of his illegal activities by tipping off his co-conspirators.

The penalty for the racketeering conspiracy count is a maximum of 20 years and a $250,000 fine, Coy said. The drug conspiracy count carries a maximum sentence of 20 years and a $1 million fine.

A sentencing date has not been set, she said.

Martin was one of 12 current or former officers, as well as former sheriff H. Frank Cassell and seven others, who were charged in a 48-county, 50-page indictment that was unsealed on Nov. 2. Charges in the indictment include racketeering conspiracy, obstruction of justice, money laundering, perjury and drug and firearm offenses.

Martin was indicted on seven counts related to charges of racketeering conspiracy, drug conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making a false statement to a federal agent.

According to the plea agreement, five of those counts will be dismissed and Martin will be required to offer "substantial assistance" in the case, court records state. That includes "complete and truthful information to attorneys and law enforcement officers of the government," records state.

The indictments were the result of a nearly two-year investigation by federal authorities into an alleged eight-year scheme involving some sheriff's office personnel.

According to the indictment, in 2001, a Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agent from Texas placed a telephone call to the Henry County Sheriff's Office to advise officers that a drug ledger had been seized which indicated shipments of drugs were being delivered to "Brad Martin's" house in Martinsville.

The DEA did not realize that "Brad Martin" was a deputy with the sheriff's office, the indictment said. It added that Martin took the call and allegedly shared the information with co-defendants James Alden Vaught and David Allen King. Both Vaught and King were deputies at that time.

Also, Martin and co-defendant William Randall Reed, who also has pleaded guilty in a plea agreement, allegedly received steroids and prescription pills through the U.S. mail from a man in Mexico, the indictment said. Both Martin and Reed also were accused in the indictment of using and selling ketamine and steroids for approximately eight years.

According to Coy, during the plea agreement hearing on Friday, Bondurant said there were eight covert recordings of Martin during the investigation.

Bondurant also told the court, Coy said, that Martin was interviewed by federal agents on May 30 and at first claimed he had no knowledge of the activities. Later, however, he began to admit to more of the alleged illegal acts, including the steroid and ketamine transactions, she said.

Reed entered a guilty plea to one count of racketeering conspiracy at a hearing on Nov. 27. At that hearing, he told the court he was pleading guilty because "I was part of a drug thing ... In possession of some steroids and ketamine. That's what I'm guilty of."

At that hearing, Bondurant told the court that Reed was the "middle man" in at least seven alleged ketamine transactions conducted at rental property owned by Vaught.

Reed was the first one arrested in the case and led federal investigators to Vaught who, according to earlier reports, allegedly also provided investigators with more information that implicated other co-defendants, including Martin.

So far, only Reed and Martin have reached plea agreements. Vaught, who initially pleaded not guilty, is scheduled for a change of plea hearing on Dec. 28 in Roanoke, Coy said.

The other defendants all have entered not guilty pleas. That includes Cassell, who was indicted on two counts of obstruction of justice, one count of money laundering, one count of making a false statement to a federal agency and one count of misprision of a felony, or failure to report a felony.

All defendants remain free on $25,000 bond.

Former Deputy Pleads Guilty (RT)

Roanoke (VA) Times, December 9, 2006

A former Henry County sheriff's deputy pleaded guilty Friday in U.S. District Court in Roanoke to two charges -- one for selling drugs and another for conspiring to commit racketeering.

Bradley Scott Martin, 33, accepted a plea agreement in which four charges of obstruction of justice and one charge of making false statements to a federal agent were dropped.

Martin, wearing jeans, tennis shoes and a button-up shirt, told Judge James Turk that he was pleading guilty because he was involved in selling Ketamine and steroids and was involved in other criminal activity.

Martin and 11 other current and former deputies and former Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell are named in a 48-count federal indictment.

It accuses the deputies of using and dealing drugs; stealing narcotics and guns from evidence and redistributing them in the community; and lying to federal investigators.

Cassell is accused of protecting deputies he allegedly knew were involved in illegal activity.

The indictment says Martin routinely received steroids and prescription pills through the U.S. Postal Service. Martin used the steroids and sold them to people, including other deputies, the indictment said.

The indictment also said Martin distributed cocaine and marijuana.

The obstruction of justice charges, which were dropped, stem from allegations that Martin helped foil an investigation to arrest a citizen whom Martin allegedly bought and sold drugs with. The indictment also alleges that Martin agreed with other people named in the indictment to lie to investigators.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant said that as part of the plea agreement, Martin may have to testify against the other deputies and Cassell.

If Martin cooperates, his sentence may be reduced, Bondurant said.

Martin faces a maximum of 40 years in prison and a $1.25 million fine.

He will be sentenced after his co-defendants' cases are over, Bondurant said.

Former Henry County Deputy Pleads Guilty (WDBJ)

WDBJ-TV,, December 8, 2006

Another defendant involved in the Henry County Sheriff's Department scandal has pled guilty.

Former Deputy Bradley Scott Martin pled guilty today to racketeering and a drug conspiracy charge. As part of a plea agreement, the U.S. Attorney agreed to drop five other charges.

Martin faces up to 40 years in prison. No sentencing date has been set.

A federal grand jury in October indicted Sheriff Frank Cassell and a dozen of his current and former deputies on racketeering charges.

Charges Tainted By Police Scandal Dropped In Va. County (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

COLLINSVILLE, Va. - The federal indictment of Henry County's former sheriff and a dozen past and present members of his department has led prosecutors to drop charges against 28 people because of the taint of the alleged corruption.

The charges dropped include 16 felony drug counts and 25 misdemeanor and traffic infractions.

DOJ_NMG_0104444

"These charges could not be effectively prosecuted without the testimony of one or more individuals currently under federal indictment," Commonwealth's Attorney Bob Bushnell said Thursday. "Given the circumstances, I have determined that the appropriate action is to drop these charges."

He said he does not expect any more charges to be dropped.

H. Franklin Cassell, the former sheriff, pleaded not guilty Nov. 27 to charges that he was part of scheme to sell drugs seized from criminals.

An indictment returned in October accused Cassell, 68, of looking the other way as officers sold drugs seized in criminal investigations and also stole guns and other evidence. He is charged with impeding federal agents' investigation and money laundering.

Charges against the other defendants include racketeering conspiracy, narcotics distribution, weapons counts, obstruction of justice and perjury.

One deputy, Bradley Scott Martin, 33, pleaded guilty Friday to charges of racketeering conspiracy and drug conspiracy, U.S. Attorney John Brownlee said in a statement. Martin faces a maximum punishment of 40 years in prison and a $1.25 million fine.

One of seven civilians charged in the case, William Randall Reed, pleaded guilty last month to racketeering conspiracy. A hearing is scheduled Dec. 28 to receive a guilty plea from a former sergeant, James Alden Vaught, a Brownlee spokeswoman said.

Cassell, the top law enforcement officer the economically distressed county along the North Carolina border since 1992, has retired since the indictment was returned.

Three In Drug Gang Sentenced (AC)

Annapolis Capital, December 9, 2006

Three men who admitted being part of a Severn drug gang known as the "Pioneer City Boys" were sentenced to federal prison yesterday.

Federal prosecutors said Tony Maurice Horne Jr. and Troemaine Herbert Storey, both of Glen Burnie, and Jerome Otto Waters Jr. of Annapolis were part of a gang that used violence and intimidation to keep competitors out and silence people who might go to the police.

The words "stop snitching" were spray-painted on the street in several Severn neighborhoods, a prosecutor said.

During separate hearings in Baltimore, U.S. District Court Judge Andre M. Davis sentenced Waters, 29, to eight years, Storey, 29, to seven years and Horne, 25, to 77 months, almost 5½ years.

An associate, Calvin I. Savoy of Severn, was convicted in October of drug charges and of shooting a county police officer during a melee in Odenton in 2004. The officer, William Hicks, wasn't seriously hurt.

Because he had past drug convictions, Savoy faces a mandatory life sentence with no chance at parole.

The shooting of the officer touched off an investigation by county police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration that culminated with the September 2005 indictment of seven men.

All except Savoy have pleaded guilty; several are awaiting sentencing.

Two run from police; one still at large

A 32-year-old woman who was charged with stabbing a man last week tried to run from police custody Thursday afternoon.

Officers determined that two people - Conzuella Jones, 32, and Todd Raynard Neal, 42, - were responsible for the Dec. 2 stabbing of Kirby Millburne Fletcher. Ms. Jones was arrested on Pleasant Street shortly before 1 p.m. Thursday, police said. While waiting for her initial court appearance, she ran from the District Court Commissioner's Office on Taylor Avenue and was apprehended a short time later.

She was charged with the stabbing and escape, police said. Officers are still looking for Mr. Neal, whose last known address was the 1700 block of Belle Drive. He is considered armed and dangerous.

Officers found Mr. Fletcher with several stab wounds on his neck, back and hand at 92 Clay St. He was flown to the Shock Trauma Center at the University Hospital in serious, possibly life-threatening injuries, police said. He was later upgraded to serious, but stable condition.

Area Doctor Charged With Drug Distribution (TOLB)

By Mark Reiter, BLADE STAFF WRITER

Toledo Blade (OH), December 11, 2006

He allegedly wrote illegal prescriptions

DOJ_NMG_0104445

A Michigan physician was arraigned yesterday in federal court on charges that he used a Toledo medical office to illegally prescribe more than $10 million in painkillers to patients.

A 26-count indictment, filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Toledo and unsealed yesterday, charges Dr. Leo M. Ognen, 54, with drug conspiracy and drug distribution. Dr. Ognen, who is a former staff member of St. Anne Mercy Hospital in Toledo, was arrested yesterday at his home in Warren, Mich., and arraigned later before U.S. Magistrate Vernelis Armstrong.

He was ordered held in the Lucas County jail after Magistrate Armstrong granted a request from assistant U.S. Attorney Seth Uram to continue a detention hearing until Wednesday.

At the end of the 15-minute hearing, Dr. Ognen tearfully embraced his wife of nearly 30 years. She was in the courtroom with the couple's 20-year-old daughter.

If convicted, the physician faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

The charges stem from a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into the alleged illegal dispensing of over two million doses of OxyContin and oxycodone and 1.1 million Percocet tablets at his medical practice in Toledo from January, 2002, to October, 2004.

He is accused of filling prescriptions for the painkillers for new and existing patients at his office without performing examinations on them, and the indictment says that $40 to $50 would exchange hands in return for the illegal prescriptions.

The indictment said that patients' Medicaid card information was taken and the government was billed for the illegal prescription of painkillers; and patients were recruited to persuade family, friends, and neighbors to become new patients.

The indictment didn't reveal the location of the alleged offenses.

Dr. Ognen recently maintained an office at 5715 Dorr St., and court records show he practiced in a medical building at 980 South Byrne Rd. in 2002.

A native of Macedonia, Dr. Ognen received degrees from the University of Belgrade in 1979 and Wayne State University, and practiced at Grace Hospital in Detroit.

He is licensed as a doctor in Ohio and Michigan.

Sarah Bednarski, a spokesman for Mercy Health Partners, said Dr. Ognen resigned from the medical staff at St. Anne in October, 2005.

He previously was on the staff of the former Riverside Mercy Hospital until it closed in 2002.

Steroid Seizure Among Largest (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, December 9, 2006

Authorities found about 40,000 units of substance in locker

It seemed like a routine seizure when federal customs agents intercepted a package of steroids at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York. From JFK, the investigation led authorities to Anne Arundel County to what they now call one of the largest stashes of man-made muscle enhancers found in the region.

Federal authorities and Anne Arundel County police searched the locker of the Bally's personal trainer last summer and wrote in court papers that they found about 40,000 vials and tablets of suspected anabolic steroids stuffed inside a locked chest.

"It's unprecedented, as far as we're concerned," said Floyd Pond, deputy director of the Washington-Baltimore High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task force program. Ed Marcinko, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Baltimore, said he agreed with Pond's assessment.

James Dinkins, the special agent in charge of the U.S. Immigrations and Customs Enforcement's Baltimore office, said he could not answer detailed questions about the investigation his office led because the case is pending in U.S. District Court.

But sources familiar with the ICE investigation said that Schlanger might have been responsible for trafficking in as many as 250,000 so-called units of steroids over the past five years.

Schlanger, 47, of Catonsville, could face up to five years in prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted of federal drug conspiracy charges after authorities said they arrested one of his employees picking up a drug-filled package at a UPS store in July. A trial date has not been scheduled, attorneys in the case said.

Andrew Alperstein, Schlanger's defense lawyer, said Friday that he and his client had no comment on the charges.

A message left for the manager at Bally Total Fitness in Glen Burnie about Schlanger's employment was not returned yesterday. Alperstein said that his client has been released from federal custody to await his trial.

Court papers filed in federal and state courts, and sources familiar with the case, accuse Schlanger of working as a wholesale drug dealer who cast a wide net for customers, importing the muscle-building drugs through the mail from China and then reselling the steroids in the Baltimore region and nationally through the Internet.

Authorities said in court papers that Schlanger's activities came to light when customs agents intercepted a package filled 3,038 units - usually either a vial or tablet - of steroids at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York City on July 5. The parcel was addressed to "Country Crafts," a federal agent wrote.

While agents investigated, two more packages arrived, one from China and one from Great Britain, court papers show. Authorities reported they contained 960 vials of Igtropin, an insulin-like growth steroid and testosterone enanthate.

Federal authorities brought in Anne Arundel County police to set up a "controlled delivery" of the drugs July 13 to the UPS store in Severna Park. When a man, Pierre R. Gumucio, retrieved the packages, he and his girlfriend, Rachael Ann Martin were arrested, officials said.

Inside their car were bags of clear glass vials of suspected steroids, orange pills and a book marked "ANABOLIC," according to court papers.

At Anne Arundel County's Eastern District, agents wrote that Gumucio confessed.

"Mr. Gumucio stated that he had been an 'on again off again'" recreational drug user for years," ICE Special Agent Jon Marsicano Jr. wrote in an affidavit.

He told investigators that he worked for Schlanger, receiving two to three packages a week for him from China over the past couple of years and wiring overseas payments for the drugs on Schlanger's behalf.

"According to Mr. Gumucio, Mr. Schlanger stated that U.S. Customs flagged him for prior importation of steroids and it was very difficult for him to receive packages without Customs inspecting them," Marsicano wrote in court papers. Schlanger also served as a moderator on professionalmuscle.com, using his connections to find customers around Baltimore and across the country, according to Gumucio's account in court papers.

The break in the case came when Gumucio told agents about Schlanger's storage locker, court papers say.

Anne Arundel police obtained a search warrant for the locker off Fort Meade Road. Inside, they wrote in court papers, they found about 18,200 doses of suspected steroids. Agents familiar with the case said this week that the final number inside the locker was actually 40,000 - a figure reflected in the pending federal indictment against Schlanger.

On the same day, July 14, agents attempted to search Schlanger's home on Arunah Avenue in Catonsville. But as they did, they found Schlanger at home and detained him as they sought a separate arrest warrant.

Inside his home, court papers say, authorities found more steroids, packaging material and vials. In August, a federal magistrate judge signed a search warrant for investigators to obtain electronic records of Schlanger's Yahoo e-mail account. Public court records do not reflect what agents found as part of their search.

After facing charges of drug possession in state court, authorities decided to move Schlanger's case and indicted him for conspiracy to distribute anabolic steroids in federal court on Sept. 20. Gumucio and Martin's drug possession cases remain in state court.

Drugs Factor In Car Crashes, Study Finds (AP)

The focus on the dangers of drinking and driving may have overshadowed a similarly serious problem: the effect of drugs, including prescription medication, on drivers.

According to a federal study released Thursday, West Virginia medical examiners have found that drugs turn up almost as frequently as alcohol in the victims of fatal car crashes. The drugs found most often are prescription medications like painkillers and depressants.

The federal Centers for Disease Control is able to draw that conclusion because West Virginia — unlike most states — routinely tests the victims of fatal crashes for drugs and prescription medications as well as alcohol.

- advertisement -

“We have very thorough and efficient medical examiners,” said John Law, spokesman for the state Department of Health and Human Resources. “Doing this has provided us with information on what besides alcohol may be contributing to these accidents. A lot of states don’t have that.”

The study, released as part of the CDC’s Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, said it’s impossible to determine how often drugs are involved with fatal crashes nationally, because of a lack of data.

But in West Virginia, the regular testing has enabled the CDC to determine that drugs are found in 25.8 percent of people killed in wrecks. That’s similar to the percentage of victims found with a blood alcohol level above the legal limit — about 27.7 percent.

“These results suggest that drug use contributes substantially to driver impairment in West Virginia,” the report says.

The report studied results from 2004 and 2005, when 784 people died in car crashes in the state. Drug and alcohol tests were performed on roughly 84 percent of those killed. Nearly half the people killed had either alcohol or drugs in their system; 11 percent had both.

"I'm not surprised at all," said Jim Helmkamp, director of West Virginia University's Injury Control Research Center and professor in the Department of Community Medicine.

Helmkamp said results like these indicate the need to educate the public about the dangers of drugs — including prescription medications — and driving, similar to efforts warning against drunken driving.

The drugs found most often by the medical examiners were prescription medications, usually opioid painkillers like hydrocodone and oxycodone or depressants. The illicit drug most commonly found was marijuana, present in 8.5 percent of all victims.

Those results differ from previous studies that hadn't shown prescription medications appearing so frequently in crash deaths, said Dr. Len Paulozzi, a medical epidemiologist at the CDC Injury Center. Local factors — such as the prevalence of prescription painkillers in West Virginia — could be part of the cause for that.

"It's a stretch to say we can extrapolate these results for the rest of the country," Paulozzi said.

There also isn't enough data to determine how many people with prescription medications in their system had legally obtained them, Paulozzi said.

Athletes See Doping Case Appeals As Futile Exercise (LAT)

By Michael A. Hiltzik, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

The arbitration system is flawed, with a tilt toward accusers. Accidental and trivial cases result in harsh penalties.

A panel of international sports arbitrators hearing a doping case against Olympic sprinter Torri Edwards went out of their way to sing her praises.

They described Edwards, then a 27-year-old USC graduate, as "a diligent and hardworking athlete" who had "conducted herself with honesty, integrity and character."

They acknowledged that her purported breach of doping regulations was entirely unintentional, caused by the obscure additive nikethamide in a couple of otherwise innocent glucose tablets she took at an exhibition race in Martinique.

"She has not sought to gain any improper advantage or to 'cheat' in any way," they wrote in August 2004.

But the arbitrators, while expressing "unease" about the rules and acknowledging their "harshness," still found Edwards guilty of doping. Her sanction: a two-year suspension from international competition.

The punishment was indistinguishable from what could have been imposed on an athlete caught deliberately injecting steroids. It wiped out Edwards' eligibility for the 2004 Summer Olympics in Athens.

Edwards' case and others like it illuminate the flaws in the appeals process for elite athletes accused of doping violations. A Times examination of the appeal system found that:

· Athletes are presumed guilty and denied routine access to lab data potentially relevant to their defense.

· Trivial and accidental violations draw penalties similar to those for intentional use of illicit performance-enhancing substances.

· Anti-doping authorities or sports federations have leaked details of cases against athletes or made public assertions of their guilt before tests were confirmed or appeals resolved.

· Arbitrators, theoretically neutral judges, are bound by rules drafted and enforced by the World Anti-Doping Agency and its affiliates, including the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. They have almost no discretion to adjust penalties to fit individual circumstances.

The WADA rules govern the admissibility of evidence, the burden of proof and the selection of the arbitrators themselves. In each category they tend to favor the accusers. Athletes wishing to compete in national, international and Olympic events subject to WADA jurisdiction have no option but to agree to this system.

Anti-doping authorities argue that these rules — indeed, the very requirement that appeals be heard by arbitrators, rather than in court — are crucial to ensuring a fast and efficient process.

The question is whether they go so far that they deprive athletes of due process and fair hearings.

On the surface, anti-doping arbitrations resemble other commercial arbitrations. Generally, the athlete and the prosecuting agency each select one arbitrator, and those nominees jointly select a third. But the limits under which the panels operate differ from those in other commercial arbitrations.

"The rules are designed to make it as easy as possible to convict an athlete," Howard Jacobs, a prominent Agoura Hills-based athletes' attorney, told an American Bar Assn. conference this fall.

The arbitration provisions, he said, require that "their tests are presumed to be scientifically valid. It's assumed that their labs did everything perfectly. And they have no obligation to provide you with documentation to rebut these presumptions."

This also differs from the standards in a U.S. court of law, where defendants or litigants are routinely granted access to a wide range of documents and the right to cross-examine expert witnesses and challenge technical evidence in great detail.

A costly undertaking

Accused athletes find that challenging a system stacked against them can be extraordinarily costly, prompting some to abandon any effort at defense.

"It wiped out my life savings and my college savings," Zach Lund, 27, a world-class skeleton sled racer from Salt Lake City, said of his effort to clear himself of doping charges.

In 2005, a drug test found traces of finasteride, an ingredient in anti-baldness medication, in his urine. The substance had been banned only that year over concerns that it might mask the presence of steroids in urine samples. That concern, however, was based on a single study by a WADA lab that had not been peer-reviewed by a medical journal. And Lund had been taking the hair restoration prescription for five years.

"I lost all my sponsorships and my funding" from the U.S. Olympic Committee, Lund said in an interview. "I even had to get money from my family and friends. The system is broken. Right now, it's catching people who make mistakes."

An arbitration panel acknowledged that the finasteride came from Lund's medication. In upholding a one-year suspension that deprived him of a chance to compete in the 2006 Winter Olympics in Turin, Italy, which opened on the very day of the ruling, arbitrators called him "an honest athlete" and acknowledged that the substance had no performance-enhancing effect.

They conceded that they had reached their decision "with a heavy heart": Although Lund had faithfully disclosed his medication on anti-doping forms at every event, no official had ever alerted him to the change in finasteride's status.

"The panel finds this failure both surprising and disturbing, and is left with the uneasy feeling that Mr. Lund was badly served by the anti-doping organizations," they wrote. Still, under the rules, the best they could do was impose the minimum one-year sanction.

A perfect record

USADA has never lost an arbitration case in its history, a record that spans six years and more than 40 proceedings. Authorities call that record a testament to their skill at bringing only bulletproof cases.

"If you're a clean athlete, you have nothing to worry about," says Travis T. Tygart, the agency's general counsel. "We don't proceed if it's not a doping case."

USADA Chief Executive Terrence P. Madden dismisses criticism of the arbitration process as sour grapes from athletes' lawyers.

"These are the same old tired arguments that we've heard for six years, and it's the same defense counsel who bring them up," Madden said.

Madden and Tygart contend that the agency's advantages in the arbitration system only compensate for its lack of governmental powers, such as subpoena authority. Athletes "want a set of rights that far exceeds the powers we have," Tygart says. "They say you have to give them constitutional due process. If that's so, then give us search-and-seizure powers to balance out that right."

But criticism of the process is more widespread than they acknowledge. Even some arbitrators are uncomfortable with the system.

"It's not serving the purpose it was meant to — to give the athlete a real opportunity to be heard," says one long-term doping arbitrator who did not want to be named so as to avoid internal controversy.

Pushing back

Arbitrators staged a rare revolt against anti-doping rules last summer in the case of Mariano Puerta, an Argentine tennis player who had accidentally ingested a tiny amount of a banned stimulant just before playing in the French Open. Puerta faced an eight-year suspension, which the panel considered tantamount to a lifetime ban for the 26-year-old athlete — "a result that is neither just nor appropriate," the panel wrote.

They agreed that Puerta's positive test resulted from his unwittingly sharing the same water glass that his wife had used for her medication.

Arguing that an appropriate penalty did not seem to be contained within WADA's rules, they fashioned their own solution by imposing a two-year ban. "The panel is not persuaded … that it is necessary for there to be undeserving victims in the war against doping," they explained.

But Puerta's case is unique. Only three times has an arbitrator in a U.S. case even filed a dissent. All three were by the same arbitrator: San Francisco lawyer Christopher L. Campbell, a former Olympic wrestler often selected as an arbitrator by athletes.

One of Campbell's dissents came in the case of Kyoko Ina, a U.S. figure skater accused of refusing a drug test late one night. Evidence showed that a USADA official had led her to believe the test could be rescheduled for the next day. Because of the misunderstanding, she was threatened with a four-year suspension, despite never having failed a test or been suspected of doping.

"When any organization, including [USADA] turns this fight against doping on innocent athletes, that behavior is unacceptable," Campbell wrote.

Ina negotiated a two-year suspension and subsequently joined a professional ice show.

The current arbitration system took form after the creation of WADA in 1999, when sports organizations concluded that a unified anti-doping regime was preferable to the patchwork of national and sports-specific policies then in effect.

The tilt toward the prosecution in arbitration cases begins with the selection of arbitrators themselves. The rules require all arbitrators to be accredited by the Swiss-based international Court of Arbitration for Sport. In the U.S., the initial appeal by an athlete is heard by members of the court's North American branch. Any subsequent appeal is heard by panelists selected from the court's international membership.

Many arbitrators have current or prior professional relationships with USADA, WADA or other sports organizations that frequently serve as the prosecution in anti-doping cases.

Of the 45 members of the North American branch, at least 24 have such affiliations. They include Richard Young, an outside counsel to USADA, and WADA Chairman Richard W. Pound. Although neither has arbitrated a doping case, athletes' attorneys say their mere membership in the sports arbitration pool fosters an impression that the system is slanted against them.

In 2001, USADA staged an expense-paid visit for all accredited arbitrators and their spouses to the UCLA Olympic Analytical Laboratory, the leading WADA lab in the world. The session, attended by 22 of the 38 arbitrators then in the North American pool, featured presentations by USADA officials and Don H. Catlin, the lab director, capped by a night out at a Santa Monica restaurant.

"The arbs are jurors," says Edward G. Williams, an athletes lawyer who contends the session was tantamount to "a bribe."

"I've said anyone who went through that session should be disqualified," Williams said. "I always lose that argument."

The most powerful element tilting the process toward the prosecution is the presumption that the agencies' scientific tests are valid and that the work of WADA's accredited laboratories, which perform all the blood and urine tests, always meet international standards. The presumption is written into the WADA Code.

The presumption shifts the burden to the athlete to prove that the lab's work fell short of scientific standards and that its failures affected the outcome. The effect is to render the athlete guilty unless proved innocent. That's a reversal of the situation in a U.S. court of law, where prosecutors carry the burden of proof from start to finish.

"The athlete is being held accountable, but the lab can have a series of small errors and is not held to a strict liability," says David L. Black, president of Aegis Sciences Corp., a Nashville-based independent doping lab. "No deficiency in the lab performance ever seems to rise to the level of impeaching their finding."

Adding to the perception of bias are frequent leaks disclosing the names of athletes under investigation and public statements by anti-doping and sports officials asserting the athletes' guilt, even before appeals have run their course.

Earlier this year, for example, Pound suggested that former Tour de France champion Lance Armstrong had been guilty of doping in 1999. He based his comments on disputed and supposedly confidential research data compiled by WADA's Paris lab.

"It's a case that has to be answered," the WADA chairman said about what he called "documentary" data linked to Armstrong. His statements, along with other comments from sports authorities, drew rebukes from inside and outside the agency.

"Pound shoots at everything that moves," complained Hein Verbruggen, president of the International Cycling Union.

Losing trust

Scott Burns, an American member of WADA's executive committee, also objected. According to minutes of the September 2005 committee meeting, he complained that it was "the antithesis of what was done at WADA … to speak out or speculate precipitously, especially in public." As a result, Burns said, WADA risked having "lost the trust of athletes."

Another problem facing athletes is the limited availability of independent experts such as Black. A WADA rule prohibits members of its 34 accredited laboratories from testifying in defense of an athlete in a doping case.

The rule exists to shield the WADA labs from political pressure that might be exerted on behalf of a high-profile athlete from their own country, said Olivier Rabin, the agency's medical director.

Still, it reserves the expertise of most of the top doping scientists in the world for use exclusively by the prosecuting agency.

"It's difficult to establish the credibility of our experts when they go up against people who do this every day for a living," said Michael Straubel, a law professor at Valparaiso University in Indiana who has defended numerous athletes.

Athletes' attorneys also face obstacles obtaining technical documents from the agencies. Under USADA rules, the agency is required to produce only records concerning the specific test performed on the athlete's own sample.

Not included are documents that might shed light on a WADA lab's general proficiency or its treatment of other similar cases, arguably pertinent to defense questions about lab consistency or reliability.

Tygart calls the document package routinely shipped to accused athletes "fair and overly generous." The U.S. agency generally rejects requests for further data unless the athlete "can articulate a need that's not a fishing expedition," he says.

USADA's position will probably be tested by Tour de France champion Floyd Landis, who has been charged with testosterone doping in the 2006 race.

Jacobs, Landis' attorney, submitted a 10-page request in October for documents related to the Paris WADA lab's general experience with the testosterone screening. Landis hopes to challenge whether the French scientists "have sufficient expertise at running this test" and whether they can justify their criteria for declaring the cyclist's sample positive.

Tygart rebuffed Jacobs. "Every request you make appears to seek documents or information not called for by the rules," he wrote. The defense lawyer is expected to ask arbitrators to force the release of more documents.

Even when an athlete is able to present a detailed case, the WADA Code ties arbitrators' hands in several ways. For example, arbitrators are prevented from considering an athlete's intent when judging a doping charge.

Under the prevailing principle of "strict liability," the mere presence of a prohibited substance in a blood or urine sample is sufficient to establish the violation, even if it is proved that the breach was accidental.

"We are fact-finders, and we apply the law within the narrow strictures that we are given," says Maidie Oliveau, an experienced anti-doping arbitrator based in Los Angeles.

Arbitrators may overturn a proposed suspension only if an athlete can prove he or she bears "no fault or negligence." They may reduce a suspension, albeit by no more than half, if they find "no significant fault or negligence." The standards for such relief are ambiguous and "virtually impossible to meet" in practice, says Jessica K. Foschi, who studies legal issues in doping at Duke University Law School.

A suspension waived

In the seven years since WADA's founding, only one athlete out of hundreds who have been sanctioned is known to have met the "no fault" standard: Australian tennis player Todd Perry. He proved last year that a tournament doctor had refilled his legal asthma inhaler with a banned drug without notifying him.

Arbitrators waived Perry's two-year suspension. Though they also absolved him of fault, they let stand his formal reprimand. Under the agency's strict liability doctrine, Perry remained a violator for having an illicit substance in his system.

The strict liability standard applies even when a doping charge hinges on subjective interpretations of laboratory readouts. These include WADA's test for erythropoietin, or EPO, a hormone that promotes red blood cell formation.

Chances of a misreading are high, according to the technical literature and experts interviewed by The Times. Several recent EPO charges have been dropped because retests failed to confirm initial lab findings or encountered other testing flaws.

"Testing is far behind where it needs to be, but the rules don't reflect that," Foschi says.

Foschi, who was accused and cleared of doping charges as a 14-year-old swimmer in 1995, criticized no-fault rules that require an athlete to prove how a substance entered his or her body to obtain a reduced penalty.

"The person who is most in trouble is someone who is genuinely innocent and has no idea how something got in his or her system," she said.

In her own case, she says, her sample was taken at an event in Pasadena, but she was not informed of the results until a week later, when she was competing across the country and the Pasadena venue had been dismantled. "By then it was impossible to go back and investigate."

Frustration with a harsh and rigid system may ultimately increase pressure for outside judicial review.

"There are cases where everyone doubts that justice has been done," says Bradley J. Andreozzi, a Chicago lawyer who has prosecuted and defended doping cases. He said the program is in danger of becoming "just a trap for the unwary."

But reforming the system could be costly. "The price of relaxing strict liability would be a period of less-stringent controls," said John Hoberman, an expert in doping policy at the University of Texas.

The cost of prosecuting authentic doping violations would go up, he predicted. "The payoff might be much better tests and not trampling on the rights of athletes who have all been thrown into one category labeled 'guilty,' " Hoberman said.

Many professionals within the system believe that the appeals process must become more flexible.

"We should have more discretion within certain parameters, such as in cases where there's no performance enhancement and no intent," said the longtime arbitrator, who asked to remain anonymous to avoid internal controversy.

USADA officials say they have proposed revisions to the WADA Code allowing arbitrators more latitude to reduce penalties in inadvertent cases — or to impose enhanced penalties in egregious cases.

But WADA's leaders are leaning in the opposite direction. Pound, for one, says the rules are already flexible enough to accommodate all situations that arise in individual cases.

"The system, as a system, is a pretty good one," he said. "It can be tweaked here or there, but we're not sitting down with a blank sheet of paper and redesigning the entire world anti-doping system."

Athletes' Unbeatable Foe (LAT)

By Michael A. Hiltzik, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

Anti-doping authorities serve as prosecutor, judge and jury. The innocent often pay a high price.

The worldwide sports anti-doping program, created to fight performanceenhancing drug use in international athletics, imposes severe punishments for accidental or technical infractions, relies at times on disputed scientific evidence and resists outside scrutiny, a Times investigation has found.

Elite athletes have been barred from the Olympics, forced to relinquish medals, titles or prize money and confronted with potentially career-ending suspensions after testing positive for a banned substance at such low concentrations it could have no detectable effect on performance, records show.

They have been sanctioned for steroid abuse after taking legal vitamins or nutritional supplements contaminated with trace amounts of the prohibited compounds. In some cases, the tainted supplements had been provided by trusted coaches or trainers.

The findings emerge from a Times examination of more than 250 anti-doping cases involving runners, cyclists, skiers, tennis players and competitors in dozens of other sports from around the world.

Alain Baxter, 28, became the first Briton to win an Olympic medal in Alpine skiing, placing third in the slalom at the 2002 Winter Games in Salt Lake City. Two days later he tested positive for methamphetamine, a banned stimulant. He was forced to forfeit his bronze medal.

His offense? He had used a Vicks Vapor Inhaler bought in Utah to treat his chronic nasal congestion. Unlike the Vicks inhalers sold at home, the American version contained traces of a chemical structurally related to meth — though lacking its stimulative qualities.

Despite testimony from a Vicks scientist that the compounds differed, an arbitration panel hearing Baxter's case ruled that because anti-doping authorities regarded the chemicals as related, he was guilty.

"It never crossed my mind that it would be different from the British one," Baxter told the BBC upon returning home. "I didn't think I was doing anything wrong."

A 17-year-old Italian swimmer treating a foot infection with an antibiotic cream her mother bought over the counter failed a doping test at a swim meet in 2004. Neither Giorgia Squizzato nor her mother realized that the cream's ingredients included a prohibited steroid — or that applying it between her toes could result in a positive urine test.

Arbitrators in her case acknowledged that "the cream did not enhance the athlete's capacity" and hadn't "favored her performance."

Nevertheless, according to the anti-doping program's zero-tolerance, or "strict liability," policy, which treats an athlete as guilty regardless of how a substance got into his or her body, Squizzato was judged negligent. Her penalty: a one-year suspension.

Stringent anti-doping measures have become a fact of life for the thousands of athletes participating in national and international events since the creation of the World Anti-Doping Agency, or WADA, at an international sports conference in 1999. WADA's founding was prompted by a rash of doping scandals threatening the credibility of global sports.

What has evolved to protect competitive purity since then is a closed, quasi-judicial system without American-style checks and balances. Anti-doping authorities act as prosecutors, judge and jury, enforcing rules that they have written, punishing violations based on sometimes questionable scientific tests that they develop and certify themselves, while barring virtually all outside appeals or challenges.

WADA's authority stems from the World Anti-Doping Code, which has been adopted by 186 governments, including the United States, and hundreds of Olympic and international athletic organizations. Under its provisions, athletes competing in sanctioned events are subject to mandatory urine and blood testing at any competition.

Athletes also must submit to unannounced random tests and provide authorities with detailed calendars showing where they can be found at any time, even on vacation.

A test sample is typically divided into two vials, labeled "A" and "B." The "A" sample is the first to be tested. If it comes up positive for a banned substance, the athlete may demand a confirmation test of the "B" sample. If that is also positive, the code allows the agency to declare the athlete in violation of doping rules and impose a penalty ranging from a public warning to a lifetime ban. Generally, the athlete also is disqualified from the event at which the violation allegedly occurred.

An accused athlete's only recourse in the face of a doping charge is arbitration, under rules of evidence dictated by WADA and designed to give the authorities the benefit of all doubt.

In many countries, including the United States, athletes have no right to appeal an adverse arbitration ruling to the courts. In the vast majority of cases, including every case heard in the U.S., the arbitrators have upheld the violation.

Tests for banned substances may be performed only at one of the 34 labs around the world accredited by WADA. Athletes are not permitted to have their samples tested at any lab outside the agency's system. The rules also prohibit WADA labs from doing any tests in defense of an accused athlete.

WADA Chairman Richard W. Pound, 64, a Montreal lawyer, argues that the program must be so stringent and uncompromising to be effective against doping, which he calls "the biggest threat to sports."

"The less discretion there is in the finding of a doping offense, the better it is," he told The Times in an interview.

Pound, a former competitive swimmer who finished just out of medal contention at the 1960 Summer Olympics in Rome, dismissed the notion that a significant number of doping cases are accidental or inadvertent; WADA policy states that every athlete is responsible for everything he or she ingests or applies to the body. In the case of adulterated supplements, he said, "If you didn't know what was in there, it's your own damn fault." In the rare cases that an athlete can be proved truly faultless, he added, the system is flexible enough to temper its penalties.

"If you're captured by a squad of Nazi frogmen and injected with a steroid, you're going to be found positive," he told The Times. "But it wouldn't be a two-year suspension."

The effect of a doping allegation on an athlete's life is immediate and crushing.

"For people who have never had to deal with something like this, it's hard to grasp what it takes away from you," says Rachael Burke, 23, a swimmer at the University of Virginia, whose urine sample turned up in May 2004 with a trace of boldione, an obscure steroid, possibly from a contaminated nutritional drink. Burke had never had a positive result in any other test in more than a decade of competitive swimming.

"You have no idea what happened," she recalled in an interview. "You have no control over the fact that they are going to announce to the entire public that Rachael Burke, this girl that everyone has seen grow up in the spotlight, has tested positive for steroids. The next day, you have to walk on the pool deck and people are saying, 'I wonder if that's why you were so good when you were 8 years old.' You're accused and convicted without a chance to defend yourself."

Concerned that fighting the charge would cost her family tens of thousands of dollars in legal and professional fees and that the arbitration rules were stacked against her, she eventually agreed to a two-year suspension. The sanction knocked her out of international competition, but preserved her right to swim in NCAA events.

Cases like Burke's undermine the program's credibility, says John Ruger, a former Olympic biathlon competitor who serves as athletes' ombudsman of the United States Olympic Committee in Colorado Springs.

He asserted that the anti-doping system sweeps up "two, three, five people every year who are not intentionally cheating."

Ruger added: "If the anti-doping program is to succeed worldwide, athletes have to believe it's a fair process."

Travis T. Tygart, general counsel of the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency (USADA), WADA's largest national affiliate, disagrees with Ruger's figures. He said the agency goes to great lengths to ensure that only the guilty are punished. He said about 20% of all its potential cases are tossed out, leaving only those USADA regards as irrefutable.

"We're not in this to falsely accuse," Tygart said.

He and other anti-doping officials maintain that underground efforts to cheat with new "designer drugs" are a continuing problem, an allegation reinforced by revelations in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO, case.

The lab allegedly provided dozens of professional and amateur athletes with undetectable performance-enhancing treatments. Through 2004, USADA said, 13 athletes had been sanctioned under WADA rules based on testimony and evidence in the BALCO case, including some who never tested positive for any steroid.

Yet the international anti-doping program's own statistics cast some doubt on the concerns expressed by Pound and other officials about a sports world awash in drugs. Of USADA's thousands of tests per year, fewer than 0.5% have produced sanctions. Many of those were for prescription medications or substances with little or no performance-enhancing effect.

In 2005, for example, USADA conducted 8,175 tests and imposed sanctions on 20 athletes. Its testing program consumed $5.6 million that year, or 47% of a $12-million budget funded primarily by Congress.

Today the program is facing unprecedented controversy, the result of several high-profile cases.

One involves American sprinter Marion Jones, accused of failing an initial doping test last summer. She immediately rushed home from an international track meet in Switzerland. When her second "B" sample came up negative, the case against her appeared to collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0104453

The case remains open, however. Pound has infuriated Jones' supporters by suggesting the negative second test may have been flawed. He told BBC radio he was worried "that someone is misinterpreting things or doing things wrong."

In another simmering controversy, California cyclist Floyd Landis, the 2006 Tour de France champion, is appealing USADA's charge that he doped with testosterone during the July endurance race. He denies taking any performance-enhancing drug and is demanding a public arbitration hearing.

Landis also has posted online (at http://www.floydlandis.com) the laboratory evidence against him, giving the public a rare inside glimpse of a doping dispute and the science behind it.

The records show, for example, careless bookkeeping errors. Samples attributed to Landis were recorded under several incorrect serial numbers. Also, results from multiple tests on the same samples, all by the same Paris lab, produced markedly inconsistent results.

The Landis camp contends the documents prove he is innocent. "There is no basis for a positive test," says Arnie Baker, a San Diego physician and cycling coach. He is consulting for the Landis defense. "How it got this far in the first place, I have no idea."

'A closed system'

Nestled among industrial shops on a short block in West Los Angeles, just across from a Bed Bath & Beyond, is the world's preeminent sports anti-doping laboratory.

The nondescript three-story UCLA Olympic Laboratory is the domain of Don H. Catlin, a professor of molecular and medical pharmacology at UCLA Medical School who has made the fight against sports doping his life's work.

Holding contracts not only with WADA but with the National Collegiate Athletic Assn. and the National Football League, the UCLA lab performs nearly four times as many blood and urine tests as the global runner-up, in Cologne, Germany. Its work is commonly considered the gold standard of sports doping science.

For all his expertise, however, Catlin is forbidden by WADA rules from testifying in defense of an athlete in a doping case. He and the lab's more than 40 employees are prevented by WADA rules from engaging in "testing or expert testimony that would call into question … the scientific validity of work performed in the anti-doping program."

Despite WADA's claims of "public transparency and accountability," it operates largely as a hermetically sealed scientific community with minimal public oversight.

WADA pays labs, usually one of those in its network, to develop tests for banned substances. It then is the sole arbiter of the test's scientific validity.

WADA determines threshold levels at which traces of a substance are deemed a violation.

And under WADA rules, the same lab that performs a positive test on an "A" sample also must conduct the confirming test on the "B" sample.

"You have a closed system where very few people in the world know what the science is, and the system has a vested interest to make sure its findings are confirmed," says David L. Black, president and chief executive of Nashville-based Aegis Sciences Corp., a large independent doping lab unaffiliated with WADA.

"The lab should just be a fact-gatherer, but the WADA system is designed in a way that the labs are not just objective fact gatherers, but part of the body of prosecution," Black said.

The EPO riddle

No test in WADA's arsenal has drawn as much fire as its assay for synthetic erythropoietin, or EPO — a hormone that increases stamina.

EPO doping has been banned since the 1990s, when the synthetic version began to be used by athletes to improve their stamina. A urine test to identify artificial EPO was introduced in 2000 and has been refined several times since.

It is not a simple test. It can require 36 hours, scores of laboratory steps, sophisticated machinery and a high level of technical skills.

Unlike tests that produce empirical measurements or unmistakable indicators, such as litmus paper, the EPO test involves a significant level of interpretation. Because natural and synthetic EPO produce similar readings in the lab, even experienced technicians viewing the same results can differ in their conclusions.

Results also can be clouded by other natural substances in the sample or by poor lab technique.

"It's a more difficult test than others in that it doesn't give you a fingerprint," Catlin acknowledged in an interview, saying "the EPO test needs more work." However, he also called it "safe and defensible — we would not practice it if it were not."

Yet Catlin's lab produced perhaps the most conspicuous contradictory finding in an EPO test, leading to the apparent collapse of the doping case against sprinter Jones. The UCLA lab's test on her "B" urine sample failed to confirm its own positive finding on her "A" sample.

Catlin says the case represents the first such mismatch in an EPO test by his lab. He declined to discuss it further, because the matter is under investigation by WADA.

But Allen K. Murray, an Irvine biochemist who witnessed the confirmation test on Jones' behalf, says her "A" sample should never have been declared positive in the first place.

"I have very serious questions about the 'A' result," he said, arguing that the quantity of the sample in the "A" test was too low to give a clear reading and that the lab interpreted the relatively faint image too aggressively.

At worst, he said, the initial test should have been declared inconclusive.

Jones's case was not the first flub involving an EPO test.

In 2003, Kenyan distance runner Bernard Lagat was charged with EPO doping after a race in Switzerland. The charge was dropped when his "B" sample proved negative.

Evidence uncovered by Lagat's defense team revealed his sample had been grossly mishandled — transported for hours in a car at temperatures sometimes exceeding 100 degrees, then inadequately cooled at WADA's Cologne lab. His experts testified that those conditions promoted chemical reactions in his urine sample that could have produced a false positive result.

They cited numerous other shortcomings in the EPO test that they say rendered it prone to false positives.

Lagat, who had been suspended by Kenyan sports authorities and barred from the world track championships after the initial finding, was reinstated in time for the 2004 Olympics, where he won the silver medal in the 1,500-meters event.

But with his lawyers contending that Lagat's "reputation will be tarnished by the doping suspicion for the rest of his life," he sued WADA and international track authorities in a German court. He demanded about $650,000, the value of potential prize money and sponsorship contracts he said he lost during his suspension.

The German court ruled that it did not have jurisdiction in the case.

Meanwhile, after Belgian triathlete Rutger Beke was charged with EPO doping during a 2004 race, scientists from a Belgian university tested the hypothesis that under certain conditions, intense exercise by some athletes could produce a positive EPO test in the absence of doping.

The test was instrumental in persuading a Belgian court to nullify Beke's doping charge, one of the rare cases in which WADA's science was tested in court — not its own arbitration regime.

It remains the rarest of WADA cases: overturned.

Nandrolone cases surge

Beginning in the late 1990s, anti-doping authorities saw a surge in positive tests for substances related to the powerful steroid nandrolone, a phenomenon that would pose a special challenge for WADA's program.

The reason was that WADA's own scientists knew that many cases were unintentional. Athletes, like the general public, were unaware that nutritional supplement makers were selling products contaminated with traces of nandrolone and other banned substances.

A statistical surge in nandrolone cases "allowed the testing program to puff out its chest and say, 'Look at how much we're doing,' " said Charles Yesalis, professor emeritus of health policy and administration at Penn State University and a leading expert on drug abuse in sports.

Studies performed by UCLA's Catlin and by researchers at the Cologne lab, then under the International Olympic Committee, showed in 2000 and 2002 that a wide range of nutritional supplements commonly taken by elite athletes were contaminated with nandrolone and other steroids.

Catlin's research, furthermore, made clear that it was not difficult for tests to distinguish a contamination victim from a cheater. His paper noted that an athlete taking nandrolone in a determined effort to cheat would show levels higher than 100,000 nanograms per milliliter, or parts per billion, of urine.

WADA's threshold for a doping violation, however, had been set in single digits: 2 parts per billion for men and 5 for women. It remains at that level today.

And anti-doping officials have continued to bring cases against athletes for positive tests almost certainly derived from contamination or for steroid levels that could not possibly have any performance-enhancing effect.

Irvine swimmer Kicker Vencill, for example, proved through lab tests in 2003 that the supplements he had taken were contaminated, causing his violation. He later sued the supplement maker in state court and won a $578,635 judgment.

Vencill appealed his suspension from international competition, but arbitrators concluded that the unwitting contamination of his multivitamins by the manufacturer did not relieve him of liability for consuming any banned substances.

"The evidence shows that the presence of a prohibited substance in the athlete's urine was caused by his ingestion of a prohibited substance — whether in a vitamin, a supplement or otherwise — for which the athlete bears complete responsibility."

The arbitrators upheld his two-year suspension, agreeing with USADA that he should receive the maximum penalty, "just as in any case of … 'intentional doping.' "

DOJ_NMG_0104455

"In their opening and closing statements, USADA said they were going to prove me a cheater," said Vencill, recalling his arbitration hearings. "It's a war in there, and you're fighting for your character and your integrity."

Anti-doping officials are unapologetic about the nandrolone cases and officially skeptical of explanations of innocence.

"You've got to hear these things over and over again to understand what a mantra it is," Pound scoffed in an interview. "You've got to say, 'Come on. Get over it. You're filled with nandrolone.' "

But there also are hints of internal disagreement. One of the program's arbitrators agreed with an accused athlete that she had ingested trace amounts of nandrolone unintentionally in adulterated vitamins.

American cyclist Amber Neben had tested positive for a concentration of 6.9 parts per billion of the steroid after a Montreal race, 1.9 over the limit for women — but vastly short of any potential performance-enhancing effect.

Arbitrator Christopher L. Campbell favored imposing no penalty, arguing that the fight against doping should not harm "innocent victims of a poorly regulated vitamin supplement industry."

Campbell was outvoted. By a 2-1 margin, the arbitration panel suspended Neben for six months.

Zero Tolerance: Some Questionable Results From Anti-doping Case Files (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

Brooke Blackwelder

34, Cyclist from Boise, Idaho

A gold medalist at the 1994 Goodwill Games, she tested positive in 2001 for steroids traced to "likely" contamination of nutrition aids. Arbitrators called her "a credit to her community and a role model to young women," but ruled that her lack of intent to dope was immaterial.

Result: an eight-month suspension.

Rickey Harris

24, Runner from Centreville, Va.

He was a top hurdler on the track and field team at the University of Florida in 2005 when he tested positive for Dexedrine, a medication for attention deficit disorder. Arbitrators agreed he was under the "mistaken belief" that he had provided paperwork for a waiver, but the school failed to file it.

Result: a one-year suspension.

Johannes Eder

27, Skier from Viehofen, Austria

Just before his cross-country relay at the 2006 Olympics, he suffered severe diarrhea. His physician, a former team doctor, advised by phone that he inject himself with a saltwater solution. Arbitrators agreed he was indeed seriously ill and his treatment could not have enhanced his performance.

Result: a one-year suspension, because the injection should have been done by a doctor.

Christine Ohuruogu

22, Runner from London

DOJ_NMG_0104457

The 400-meter racer and top hopeful for London's 2012 Olympics missed three random drug tests. An independent disciplinary panel attributed it "only to forgetfulness." Members called her one-year suspension "very harsh" for an athlete "who had no intention" of cheating.

Result: a threatened lifetime Olympics ban is pending.

Giorgia Squizzato

17, Swimmer from Mestre, Italy

While competing in Germany, she used an antibiotic skin cream on a foot infection. Her urine tested positive for "a low concentration" of a steroid in the cream. Arbitrators said it "did not enhance the athlete's capacity," she did not intend to cheat, but she was negligent.

Result: a one-year suspension.

Alain Baxter

28, Skier from Scotland

He took third in the slalom at the 2002 Winter Olympics but failed a drug test because he used a Vicks Vapor Inhaler made in the U.S., which unlike U.K. brands has a mild relative of a banned stimulant.

Result: a three-month suspension and forfeit of his Olympic bronze medal.

Meth Labs Abundant This Hunting Season (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, December 11, 2006

Hunters stalking deer and pheasant also are finding methamphetamine labs or their remnants in remote areas this fall.

Three Michigan hunters have discovered separate dumps of equipment and chemicals used to make the illegal drug, says State Police Lt. Chet Wilson. Hunters in Arkansas, Indiana and Tennessee have made similar finds.

The encounters can be risky, especially if someone is using the lab when a hunter discovers it. Approaching meth users while wearing "camouflage clothing and carrying a firearm can be a recipe for disaster," warns a hunting handbook published by South Dakota's Department of Game, Fish and Parks. It advises hunters to keep their distance and avoid contact with the solvents and acids used to "cook" the drug.

Methamphetamine is a highly addictive stimulant that can be injected, snorted, smoked or swallowed. It is made in home labs using cold pills and other easily purchased ingredients. The process creates a distinctive odor that's often compared to cat urine.

Federal and state laws restricting sales of cold tablets containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, key components of meth, have reduced the number of labs, law enforcement officials say.

"Due to a new law that bans sales of pseudoephedrine off the shelf, we have seen an extreme reduction in meth labs," says Rod Slings of the Iowa Department of Natural Resources' law enforcement bureau.

Those who still make meth are moving to isolated areas to escape detection.

"Wildlife areas are a place cookers can go and not risk having the neighbors next door turn them in," Slings says. Hunters there find labs or meth dumps several times each season, he says.

Hunters occasionally spot "tweakers" making meth in rural areas, but it's more common to find leftover equipment. Officials tell hunters to look for ordinary plastic coolers with hoses, gas cylinders and stained coffee filters. South Dakota's hunting handbook recommends hunters look for lye, iodine, brake cleaner and stained cookware.

"Hunters come across a cooler or some other type of containers, and they're curious, and they want to open them," says Wes Baxter, a sheriff's deputy in Craighead County, Ark. A hunter there recently found a cylinder with copper tubing, batteries and rubber gloves.

"We strongly encourage people not to touch these items," Baxter says. Hazardous-waste removal teams often are called in to dispose of the toxic equipment.

Natural resources and law enforcement officials use public-relations campaigns to warn about the dangers of meth gear. The Minnesota Deer Hunters Association sponsors public-service announcements on radio stations each fall to warn hunters to be on the lookout for meth labs. "How can people abuse our natural resources like this?" asks Mark Johnson, the group's executive director.

Lt. Carl Lamb of the Seymour, Ind., police department has conducted seminars for hundreds of area hunters and farmers. After the training sessions, he says, "They recognize what to look for and know not to mess with it."

Larry Dale, a hunter and hunting safety instructor in Petersburg, Ill., says hunters can be "useful eyes and ears" for law enforcement when they know how to identify meth-related equipment. The drug and its makers, he says, are "a general menace to society."

Afghan Poppies To Get Herbicide Spray (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

AP, December 11, 2006

The top U.S. anti-drug official said Saturday that Afghan poppies would be sprayed with herbicide to combat an opium trade that produced a record heroin haul this year, a measure likely to anger farmers and scare Afghans unfamiliar with weed killers.

John Walters, the director of the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy, said Afghanistan could turn into a narco-state unless "giant steps" are made toward eliminating poppy cultivation.

"We cannot fail in this mission," he said. "Proceeds from opium production feed the insurgency and burden Afghanistan's nascent political institutions with the scourge of corruption."

Afghans are deeply opposed to spraying poppies. After nearly three decades of war, Western science and assurances can do little to assuage their fears of chemicals being dropped from airplanes. Because of those fears - and because crop dusters could be shot down by insurgents - spraying would need to be done on the ground.

The Afghan government has not publicly said it will spray, and President Hamid Karzai has said in the past that herbicides pose too big a risk, contaminating water and killing the produce that grows alongside poppies.

But Walters said Karzai and other officials have agreed to ground spraying.

"I think the president has said yes, and I think some of the ministers have repeated yes," Walters said without specifying when spraying would start. "The particulars of the application have not been decided yet, but yes, the goal is to carry out ground spraying."

Gen. Khodaidad, Afghanistan's deputy minister for counter-narcotics, said the government hadn't made any decisions yet. But a top Afghan official close to Karzai said the issue was being looked at closely.

"We are thinking about it; we are looking into it. We're just trying to see how the procedure will go," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Opium production in Afghanistan this year rose 49 percent to 6,700 tons - enough to make about 670 tons of heroin. That's more than 90 percent of the world's supply and more than the world's addicts consume in a year.

A U.S. official who asked not to be named told The Associated Press last month that if Afghans don't spray in 2007 "there's going to be a lot of pressure on the government for spraying ... a lot of pressure from the U.S."

At the news conference Saturday, Walters tried to emphasize to the largely Afghan media members in attendance that spraying was perfectly safe. He said the herbicide glyphosate - sold commercially in the United States under the name Roundup - would be used, and that it was a safe and common weed killer.

He said the U.S. uses glyphosate to spray marijuana plants in Hawaii and that it's also used against coca plants in Colombia.

"We are not experimenting on the people of Afghanistan," he said. "We are not using a chemical that has a history of questionable effects on the environment."

Walters said he didn't expect the fight against poppies "to be a one-year success story." A recent U.N. report said it would take a generation - 20 years - to defeat the drug trade in Afghanistan.

To Save Lives In New Jersey (NYT)

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

Intravenous drug addicts who become infected by sharing contaminated needles and then pass on the infections to spouses, lovers and their unborn children account for about half of the AIDS cases in New Jersey. The state's drug-related infection rate is said to be twice the national average.

These tragic statistics cry out for life-saving programs that slow the spread of infection by giving addicts access to sterile syringes. At the moment, however, New Jersey is the only state that is still resisting this proven AIDS-prevention strategy.

The Legislature can bring the state into line with long-established medical policy — and save lives in the bargain — if it passes a set of bills that would establish municipal syringe exchange programs.

Needle access programs have the overwhelming support of the medical, social service and AIDS prevention communities. Nonetheless, some lawmakers are afraid of supporting them publicly for fear that they will be accused of encouraging drug use.

But that is simply not the case. Data from across this country and abroad show that needle exchange actually slows the spread of disease without increasing intravenous drug use. Thanks to the effectiveness of these clean needle programs, their value is no longer in doubt.

New Jersey lawmakers should bear this in mind as they approach the vote. A vote for the needle access program is a vote for saving the lives of men, women and unborn children. A vote against the program is a vote for more infections, higher medical costs and more unnecessary deaths.

IRS Employees Return Nearly 6 Months After Flooding Closed Headquarters (column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Susan Hedeler is going home -- to eleven-eleven, as she calls it.

The Internal Revenue Service headquarters building, at 1111 Constitution Ave. NW, has reopened, almost six months after heavy rains flooded the basement and sub-basement, destroying electrical and air-conditioning equipment.

Hedeler is set to be in her sixth-floor office this morning and to get back to old routines, including a breakfast stop at a favorite eatery. She will no longer be one of the "displaced," working from home or from IRS offices in New Carrollton.

Her commute to 1111 will take about 30 minutes -- a vast improvement over the 90 minutes she spent on buses and trains traveling from her Northern Virginia home to New Carrollton. Her workday will be smoother, , with colleagues nearby and a complete set of reference files not far from her desk.

The June flooding came as Hedeler's office, media and publications, was ramping up production of tax forms, instruction sheets and other material for the 2007 tax filing season. Managers were at an outside-the-Beltway retreat, but the management meeting quickly turned into a planning session when the staff learned that the flood had closed the headquarters for what officials initially projected would be 30 days.

"It was rather fortuitous that we were all there," Hedeler said. Managers went to work contacting employees and figuring out who worked on critical programs and needed to be given offices first.

By mid-July, all of the publications staff had been assigned temporary cubicles and offices in New Carrollton. But the staff kept up with their work, even as they waited for offices, because many could work elsewhere on their laptops.

"It was a bit of a challenge," Hedeler recalled. Employees used to working together on one floor of the downtown headquarters were spread across three buildings at New Carrollton. Although the IRS moved computers and files from downtown to the temporary offices, there were times when employees had to hunt down documents or try to retrieve them electronically.

"Some of the things I thought weren't necessary to take with me, I missed while I was there," Hedeler said. Still, she added, "you can't take everything with you."

Despite the sense of camping out in New Carrollton, Hedeler said she had "positive experiences," such as meeting new people and forging new working relationships.

The IRS accommodated many employees by putting them on flexible work schedules and allowing them to work at home and at telecommuting centers. Hedeler said that she worked from home "a couple of days a week" and that "being able to be hooked up to the computer at home certainly made my life a lot easier."

But she missed working at the IRS headquarters. She returned once to get some work material and ran into her boss. "We both sort of simultaneously said, 'This is so sad.' It was. It was like someone or something had died. It was an eerie feeling."

The June 25 torrential downpour shut down the IRS, Justice Department, National Archives and other buildings in the low-lying Federal Triangle. But the flooding sunk the IRS.

An estimated 5.5 million gallons of water flooded the basement and sub-basement at 1111, almost enough to fill the tank where killer whales live and perform at SeaWorld in Orlando.

The sub-basement, which was under 20 feet of water, held the building's electrical transformers, electrical switch gears and chillers. In the basement, the flooding damaged food service areas, computer equipment and offices.

The General Services Administration has spent more than $25 million on repairs, which will be finished in April.

More than 2,000 employees work in the building and will return in phases. A group of about 400 returned Friday, and more than 600 come back today. An additional 800 employees will be back by Dec. 19, and the remainder will return after Jan. 1, the IRS said.

Hedeler, the senior staff assistant to the IRS director of media and publications, said her office adhered to its production schedule for forms and documents, despite the disruption caused by the flooding.

She laughed and said, "You're going to get your 1040, don't worry."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

At Session's End, Congress Cuts Taxes (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

In a final, late-night surge of legislating, the 109th Congress passed $45 billion in tax cuts and a trade package affecting at least 150 developing nations, as well as a range of smaller bills on issues from healthcare to energy. But they left most of the current fiscal year's spending decisions to the next Congress.

It was the last gasp of a lame-duck Congress caught between two majorities - and ready to go home. With Democrats poised to take control of both the House and Senate next month, Republicans used their final hours in charge of Congress to make good on promises to many of Washington's most powerful interests as well as to American families they hope to woo back in 2008.

The 11th-hour output includes popular tax extenders, such as the research and development tax credit for businesses and the tax break for college tuition. It also includes more controversial provisions, such as opening some 8.3 million acres along the Gulf Coast to oil and gas drilling, and a trade deal with Haiti that could hurt US textile interests.

Meanwhile, Democrats say the outgoing "do nothing" Republican Congress met rarely and accomplished little. On Friday, House majority leader-elect Steny Hoyer (D) of Maryland announced there would be more five-day work weeks in the next Congress "to address the critical issues facing our nation and fulfill our responsibility to oversee the executive branch." (Under GOP control, the Washington work week was about 2.5 days.)

In the final days, Republicans faced their greatest opposition from within their own ranks. "This is an embarrassing situation to be chairman of [the] Budget Committee in a Republican Congress and to have a bill brought to the floor that does such damage to the budget," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R) of New Hampshire in a floor speech directed mainly to his GOP colleagues Friday night.

As late as Friday, eight senators from textile states were threatening to block the omnibus trade and tax bill unless a proposal to lift tariffs on clothing manufactured in Haiti was removed. They said it would open US markets even further to unfair competition from China, but they fell short of the votes needed to prevail.

"It's stunning that the House leadership and Senate as its last act before it adjourns is going to ramrod a job-destroying trade bill past the Congress," said Auggie Tantillo, executive director of the American Manufacturing Trade Action Coalition, before Friday's vote.

In response, backers said the trade package, including permanent normal trade relations with Vietnam, will lower costs for US manufacturers and consumers.

"This legislation will help to create stronger trading partners for the future, while also recognizing our responsibility as having one of the world's strongest economies to help developing countries grow," said House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R) of California in a statement after the 212-to-184 House vote.

The 109th Congress also voted to postpone completing nine of 11 FY 2007 spending bills until Feb. 15, forcing Democrats to take up divisive spending issues as they are ramping up in the next Congress.

"It's real act of defiance by the lame-duck Congress and a conscious attempt to set up a political problem for the next Congress," says Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at the Boston University.

"It's more than just leaving a budgetary mess. It's creating a huge problem in how Democrats will solve the tension within their party between fiscal conservatives and those who want to start new spending initiatives and how Democrats will deal with corruption and whole pork-barrel issues," he adds.

GOP Lawmakers Add Provision To Passing Tax Package (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Republican lawmakers, with little public debate, quietly added a billion-dollar health-care benefit to legislation that was rushed through Congress just before it adjourned Saturday morning.

Acting at the urging of several major business lobbies eager to reduce their medical-insurance costs and the outgoing chairman of the House's tax-writing committee, lawmakers adopted the provision even though only a single committee had previously approved it.

The provision, which materialized without fanfare late last week inside a massive tax-cut measure, expands the amount of money that can be contributed tax-free to health savings accounts (HSAs). The accounts can be used to pay medical bills and for other health-related coverage.

The legislation allows anyone to shelter thousands of dollars annually in HSAs, regardless of how much that person pays for a health-insurance deductible. Current law limits HSA contributions to the amount of a person's deductible. The expansion would cost the government $1 billion in lost tax revenue over the next decade.

Democrats, who will take control of Congress next month, have generally opposed the expansion. But supporters said that House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) championed it and pressed it through to final approval in the wee hours Saturday morning.

A coalition of high-profile corporate organizations, which pushed for the legislation, spent last week deploying lobbyists across Capitol Hill and urging their members back home to write letters and place phone calls to lawmakers. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Federation of Independent Business, the American Bankers Association, the Business Roundtable and several insurance companies belonged to the coalition, according to Paul Dennett, vice president for health policy of the American Benefits Council, a leading participant in the group.

Even the advocates doubted until the last minute that their provision would succeed.

"We nicknamed [ourselves] the 'Keep Hope Alive Coalition,' " Dennett said. "It seemed that the provision might fall off the wagon."

That it remained in the bill was thanks largely to Thomas, who "quite clearly played the strongest role," Dennett said, adding, "In Democratic offices, this was something they didn't want to do."

Organized labor, a major backer of Democrats, has disparaged HSAs as a way for companies to unload more of the cost of medical coverage on their workers.

The American Benefits Council, meanwhile, has argued that HSAs allow both employees and employers to save money. Dennett said the newly approved provision merely improves the program, which was first enacted in 2003 and now is used by more than 3 million Americans.

"These are modest but sensible kinds of things that need to be done," he added.

The Ways and Means Committee approved the provision in late September, right before Congress adjourned for the midterm elections. The legislation was passed neither in the Senate nor on the House floor until it was okayed as part of the larger bill last weekend.

"This has been a clear Republican priority and there was an opportunity . . . to move this package of good legislation," said Ianthe Jackson, spokeswoman for the Ways and Means Committee. "This is something that Mr. Thomas believes in, and making minor adjustments will help these accounts continue to grow."

HSAs were created to encourage people to choose high-deductible insurance plans, take control of their health-care spending and, ultimately, bring down medical costs. High-deductible plans are increasingly popular among employers because they are less expensive than traditional plans. HSAs allow families enrolled in such plans to sock away money tax-free to pay their out-of-pocket expenses. Under current law, annual contributions to the accounts are limited to the amount of a person's annual insurance deductible and cannot exceed $2,700 for an individual or $5,450 for a family.

Under the new law, if it is signed by President Bush as expected, any health savings account holder could choose to shelter the maximum amount, which is scheduled to increase next year to $2,850 for individuals and $5,650 for families.

The HSA provision was one of several pro-business items that managed to get through Congress at the eleventh hour. The tax measure revived more than 20 tax breaks, at a cost of $38 billion over five years, and nearly a dozen credits promoting alternative energy sources. It also opened 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling and prevented a 5 percent cut in Medicare payments to doctors from taking effect Jan. 1.

Health savings accounts were not publicly identified as part of those negotiations until Thursday, after House and Senate negotiators, including Thomas and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), emerged from an early-morning session with an agreement about what the final package would include. Hours later, the Ways and Means Committee released an explanation of that legislation, with the expansion of health savings accounts slipped in among 22 tax breaks, 11 energy measures and nearly 30 "other provisions."

In a news release, Thomas called the package "a bipartisan compromise that is 'must-do' work in Congress this year." He urged "my House and Senate colleagues to approve it quickly."

They did so after midnight Saturday, with both chambers giving overwhelming approval to the legislation. The HSA provision was barely mentioned in the closing congressional debate.

Congress Bolsters Health-Care Initiatives (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0104462

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As Congress ended its session, lawmakers authorized billions of dollars in spending to shore up government health initiatives -- from funding for Medicare and medical research to antibioterrorism efforts -- passing legislation that included provisions aimed at injecting more transparency and accountability into the programs.

Congress agreed to pay physicians a bonus in exchange for more data on the quality of care provided to Medicare's elderly and disabled beneficiaries. In addition, the National Institutes of Health stands to get a boost in funding for research, but also must set up an electronic tracking system that would help Congress monitor how its grants are used.

States and local governments will continue to receive federal grants to help them prepare for health emergencies, such as a bioterrorism attack, but they will have to show the federal government that they are making progress, or risk losing the money.

The changes underscore that as the government's health-related responsibilities grow Congress and many policy makers want more for its money. And in the face of big disagreements over how to solve some major health issues on the horizon, lawmakers are pushing incremental changes that could pave the way for broader solutions down the line.

This is clearest in Medicare, the federal health program that covers more than 40 million elderly and disabled people. Congress agreed to erase a scheduled reduction in payments to physicians, but it made a 1.5% bonus payment available only to physicians who report to Medicare how they perform on certain specified barometers of health-care quality. Initially, the payments will be based on whether the physician reports the data, but the system lays the groundwork for higher payments to better-performing physicians.

Among the information Medicare officials will collect: whether doctors provide aspirin and beta blockers to patients having heart attacks, and whether elderly patients are screened for their risk of falls. These practices are considered indicators of good patient care.

Hospitals, too, will have greater responsibility for reporting quality-of-care data. While most hospitals already have been doing quality reporting on inpatient care, the new legislation requires them to do so for outpatient services to receive the full payment scheduled under law for those services. Congress added an additional wrinkle to the program in the latest legislation, requiring the Department of Health and Human Services to consider ways that the hospital data could be made available to the public.

The quality-reporting provisions may well prompt criticism from health-care providers. Already, the American Medical Association, while praising the payments Congress awarded its physician members, said it has "concerns" about the quality-reporting system.

The Medicare changes were part of a tax bill Congress passed before heading home.

Separately, the House and Senate also worked out their differences on a complex package of health legislation that lumped reauthorization of the Ryan White CARE Act, which funds state-level treatment of people with HIV and AIDS, with a reorganization of the NIH and anti-bioterrorism initiatives.

The NIH provisions, a top priority of House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R., Texas), would provide the $30 billion-a-year agency a boost of about $4.5 billion in the next two years. Congress still must appropriate the funds.

Mr. Barton has criticized the NIH for being a "hodgepodge of different interests," and insisted on greater collaboration and transparency at the agency. In addition to a new requirement to track grants electronically, the legislation calls for the NIH director to send biennial progress reports to Congress on research activities. The legislation also sets up a "common fund," valued at $1.5 billion next year, which the NIH director controls and can spend on research involving more than one of the agency's institutes.

On bioterrorism, Congress passed new requirements for the secretary of health and human services to set benchmarks for states and localities receiving federal grant money to prepare for health emergencies. States also must begin matching the funds in 2009, and they must perform regular drills and exercises to identify weaknesses in their emergency-response systems and report what they find to the federal government.

The health package also calls for a $1 billion in grants to biotechnology firms developing drugs and vaccines for bioterrorism-related illnesses and infectious diseases. The money, a response to criticism of the government's beleaguered $5.6 billion Bioshield program, is intended to help companies through the so-called Valley of Death, a period in the start-up process when they need to conduct costly research and scale-up manufacturing capabilities but don't yet have products that translate into government contracts or private investment. Congress also gave the federal government more flexibility to award periodic payments when the companies meet predetermined milestones.

Congressional action "sends a signal" that the government is committed to funding the bioterrorism sector, said John Clerici, a lawyer at McKenna Long & Aldridge who represents biodefense clients. The bill would benefit many of the small biotech firms focusing on this type of research and was supported by some venture-capital firms because they have invested in the sector or would like to.

Crucial to getting the health package through Congress was an agreement to redistribute funds in the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides grants to help states cover low-income children. Mr. Barton initially objected to a plan that would have given unspent SCHIP funds from one group of states—including Texas—and given them to other states that are facing shortfalls in their programs, such as Massachusetts and Rhode Island. But the final deal capped the money shifted away from Texas at $20 million, and Mr. Barton agreed to move the other health legislation through the House. He also won Senate passage of his NIH changes.

Congress also changed the funding formula in the Ryan White program, which provides grants to states and cities for treatment of people with AIDS. Now, cases of HIV—not just full-blown AIDS—also will be counted when the federal government is deciding how to dole out the money, a move that shifts resources to states, including many in the South, with relatively newer epidemics of the disease. Lawmakers from states with more long-running epidemics, including New York, New Jersey and California, had objected to the change. The final agreement lessened the blow to those places.

US Lawmakers Exit With A Last Nod To Oil Drilling (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

As one of its final acts, the 109th Congress Friday approved opening to oil and gas development 8.3 million previously protected acres off the Gulf Coast - a last bid to influence energy and environmental policy before the Democrats assume control.

Industry officials are pleased; environmentalists much less so.

"Let's hope this is Congress's one last fling with Big Oil and that we can make a fresh start to achieving true energy security with ... the new Congress," said Carl Pope, Sierra Club executive director, in a statement.

But John Engler, National Association of Manufacturers president, says exploring the outer continental shelf is "critical to the US economy." Just how critical depends on the cost of development and on whether other sources of gas and oil are sought and found as well.

For example, the Bush administration is considering lifting a ban on drilling in Bristol Bay, Alaska, imposed by Congress after the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill in Prince William Sound. But congressional resistance to such energy-extraction efforts - including in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge - is likely to mount after Democrats take control of the House and Senate.

Democrats, for their part, say they'll close what they see as loopholes in a program requiring companies to pay royalties on oil pumped on US property. Critics - including the Government Accountability Office and the US Interior Department's inspector general - say officials have not enforced the collection of royalty payments amounting to tens of billions of dollars.

Interior's IG recently found that the number of departmental audits and auditors had declined markedly since 2000. As a result, the investigation found, just 20 percent of firms involved in oil and gas development and 9 percent of properties had been examined in the past three years. Interior often relies on oil companies to report the amount of resources extracted on federal land, which forms the basis for royalty payments.

Testifying before Congress in September, Interior's Inspector General Earl Devaney said the agency operates in a culture that "sustains managerial irresponsibility and a lack of accountability." In defense of their record, Interior officials note that audits in fiscal year 2006 covered 73 percent of revenues, up from 46 percent in 2003.

Still, the IG report led R.M. "Johnnie" Burton, director of Interior's Minerals Management Service, to pledge to strengthen procedures, improve administrative controls, and enhance tracking systems.

Under the Gulf Coast drilling bill passed Friday, 37.5 percent of royalties will go to Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, and Alabama; 12.5 percent to land and water conservation programs; and 50 percent to the US treasury. To win over Florida lawmakers, the bill disallowed drilling within 125 miles of the Florida coast.

Congress Approves Bill To Criminalize 'Pretexting' (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Spurred by the Hewlett-Packard Co. scandal, Congress approved legislation that would make it a federal crime to obtain an individual's telephone records without his or her approval.

The measure spells out new federal criminal penalties for those who buy and sell such fraudulently obtained records. The White House said President Bush will sign the measure.

The bill targets "pretexting" tactics, where investigators use schemes to impersonate their target and gain access to private phone records. Investigators hired by H-P used the strategy this year when investigating who leaked information to reporters.

About 12 states have made telephone pretexting a crime, but there is currently no clear federal prohibition. Former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn and several others were charged in the pretexting scandal for violations of California's state privacy laws. Ms. Dunn has pleaded not guilty.

Journalists and media organizations that purchase confidential records knowing they were obtained without the consumer's consent could be subject to fines of as much as $500,000 and imprisonment for as much as 10 years. Additional penalties would be imposed in cases where the information is used to commit further federal crimes or causes substantial financial harm, for example, to a consumer whose identity has been stolen.

The law contains an exception for law-enforcement agencies.

Until recently, telephone pretexting has existed in a murky legal realm, and federal regulators and state attorneys general often have been forced to bring cases under general consumer protection or antifraud statutes.

Many consumer advocates called the bill an important first step to quash pretexting, but they warned that the bill does nothing to prevent people from using impersonation methods to gain access to private details on electricity, gas, and water-and-sewage bills.

"The legislation leaves open the wider issue of pretexting to get all forms of consumer records," said Rob Douglas, an information-security consultant and editor of PrivacyToday.com. "I would hope that this would continue to be an issue for the next Congress."

Some consumer advocates wanted the legislation to go further, forcing phone companies to increase their security procedures. Phone companies were against more-stringent mandates, saying they were victims along with their customers, of fraudulent pretexting.

"This legislation focuses on the criminal," said Joe Farren, spokesman for CTIA-The Wireless Association, a cellular-carriers trade group. "What we shouldn't be doing is trying to blame the victim."

Pretexting isn't a new issue. In 1999, Congress passed legislation making it illegal to obtain financial records using the scheme.

Democrats Can Smell The Pork (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

The sterile, confused lame-duck session of the Republican-controlled 109th Congress ended with a quiet victory by reformers that staved off an estimated 10,000 earmarks. But it could not be called a farewell to pork. As the House approached adjournment Thursday, Democrats signaled they may countenance a return to free and easy spending ways when they assume the majority Jan. 4.

The hero of the lame-duck session was freshman Republican Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina. He was instrumental in blocking a Senate-House conference on a military construction appropriations bill, which would then be used as the last train out of town to carry pork. But just as the reformers were cheering Thursday, a coalition of Republicans and Democrats defeated a procedure designed to inhibit Pentagon earmarks.

That leaves an unanswered question for the new Democratic majority. Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the dynamic new member of the House Democratic leadership, has exhorted colleagues not to forget that their campaign against the Republican "climate of corruption" brought them into power. But does Emanuel's concept of reform go beyond new lobbyist control regulations and extend to the bipartisan addiction to pork-barrel spending?

The first closed-door meeting of Republican senators after their drubbing in the election erupted in discord after the leadership laid out plans for an omnibus spending bill, putting all unfinished appropriations bills in one package. That would provide a cornucopia of earmarks for members of Congress to bring home to their constituents.

But DeMint rose to make clear that he and his fellow freshman Republican, Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, would use the many parliamentary devices at their disposal to block an omnibus bill. Their alternative was what is called a continuing resolution, extending spending at its present level into February. That meant the lame-duck session would be porkless.

Sen. Ted Stevens, the old appropriator renowned for delivering pork home to Alaska, erupted with an exhibition of his famous hair-trigger temper. Sen. Thad Cochran, a courtly Southern gentleman and Stevens's successor as Appropriations Committee chairman, made the case in calmer language. Sen. John McCain, happy to have two Senate rookies pick up the anti-pork mantle he has carried for many years, was making snide comments in a stage whisper. But DeMint was not about to be moved by either threats or persuasion. The military construction bill was the last vehicle suitable for earmarks. The formidable Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, the Appropriations subcommittee chairman handling that measure, was determined to conclude action on it in a Senate-House conference. With uncharacteristic anger last week, a frustrated Cochran said he was not about to take dictation from two freshman senators. But they blocked the conference from taking place.

As this became clear Thursday, a second triumph for the reformers loomed with apparent imminent passage of Coburn's "report card," under which the Pentagon would grade earmarks on a scale of A to F. Before the election recess, the Senate voted 96 to 1 to add that proposal to the Defense appropriations bill. But the fix was in. The House removed the Coburn amendment by a 394 to 32 vote, while promising to consider it as a free-standing bill in the lame-duck session.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter went on the House floor Thursday to approve the report card. But the appropriators struck back. Rep. Bill Young, chairman of the Defense appropriations subcommittee, argued: "I don't want the Pentagon having to spend all that time grading the work that we in the Congress do." Rep. Ike Skelton, Hunter's Democratic successor, said the next Congress "will offer a better approach." Young and Skelton both predicted the report card would inhibit earmarking. The proposal was voted down on Friday, 330 to 70, with only two Democrats voting for it.

The issue of spending reform is in Democratic hands. Emanuel, the newly elected House Democratic Caucus chairman, e-mailed colleagues Nov. 17 with a call for reform. The takeover of the House that he led as Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman, Emanuel said, sent a message that "it's time for a change, and change starts by cleaning up Washington."

But in reiterating the Democratic campaign's promises to "reform lobbying and ethics rules," Emanuel did not mention the corrupting influence of earmarks.

We Passed Vital Laws (USAT)

USA Today, December 11, 2006

The Congressional session that just concluded actually leaves a solid record of achievement for America. The House and Senate both worked to protect our country, crack down on crime, promote a strong economy, improve education and approve sensible judges in a fair manner.

In particular, Congress passed and the president signed bills to establish special tribunals for accused terrorists, begin securing our border, rein in North Korea's nuclear ambitions, crack down on methamphetamine, track pedophiles, extend tax relief, open markets to U.S. exports, cut spending, secure pensions, encourage retirement savings, update bankruptcy laws, create a Google-like search engine for federal spending, and establish new scholarships for students in fields important to the economy's future. The Senate confirmed two new Supreme Court justices and reduced federal judicial vacancies to their lowest level in 20 years. The president will also soon sign legislation to increase domestic energy production and forge nuclear power cooperation agreement with India.

Nonetheless, some widely supported measures fell victim to obstructionist tactics. Democrats, for example, blocked popular proposals to make it easier for small businesses to buy health coverage for their employees, reform our broken medical liability system, do more adult stem cell research, and increase the minimum wage.

It's clear, likewise, that "values" issues such as marriage protection and flag burning have broad appeal with the public as a whole. Voters in 27 states have approved marriage protection amendments, and all 50 state legislatures have called for a constitutional amendment to ban flag burning. When such a popular groundswell exists, then Congress should act.

Some problems Congress faces stem from systemic flaws in America's processes. No matter who has been in charge, all appropriations bills have passed on time on only three occasions in the past 30 years. Improving things will require a strong mutual commitment on the part of the White House and the leadership in both houses of Congress to reform the spending process, fix entitlements, tackle earmarks and eliminate the deficit.

Much work remains ahead, but I'm proud of all the vital laws that did get through.

Bill Frist, R-Tenn., is the outgoing Senate majority leader.

109th Congress' Big Success: Lowering The Achievement Bar (USAT)

In the end, nothing became the 109th Congress so much as its going, which it finally did Saturday on the heels of an ethics report that seemed to symbolize two years of feckless behavior. Even some key Republicans left town lamenting a record of failure.

The House ethics committee blistered Speaker Dennis Hastert and other Republicans for ignoring a decade of warnings that Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned in disgrace this fall, was trying to sexually exploit male pages. But, with typical toothlessness, the panel found no violation of the rules and meted out no punishment.

That's pretty much the story of the past two years: Anything went if it helped preserve GOP power, but very little was achieved to address the nation's problems. The successes of 12 years of Republican rule, most notably welfare reform, were concentrated in the first four — before fundraising, cozy relationships with lobbyists and exercising the perks of office overrode the promises of integrity, fiscal responsibility and limited government that brought Republicans to power.

As Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., put it: "We came to change Washington, and Washington changed us."

The 2005-06 House and Senate met for fewer days than any Congress did in the past half century — fewer even than the "do-nothing Congress" President Harry Truman railed at in 1948, which passed the Marshall Plan that helped rebuild postwar Europe.

The 109th boasts nothing that comes close. A pretty good pension reform. Hurricane Katrina relief. Some help for free trade. An energy bill that hasn't made much difference. A bankruptcy bill that helps business and hurts consumers. A bill weakening protections against torture. And tax cuts, unmatched by spending cuts, that sent the nation deeper into deficits that the Republicans created.

The Senate Republican Policy Committee released a 26-page "major accomplishments" list that included — not making this up — a resolution allowing senators and their aides to ask each other for donations for Katrina victims.

It's not as if there wasn't important work to do. Social Security and Medicare are two years closer to fiscal disaster. Cities are enacting immigration laws because Congress never agreed on reform. Despite numerous scandals, there was no serious effort at ethics fixes. For partisan reasons, Congress virtually abandoned oversight even of the Iraq war.

What Congress often did instead was to indulge in divisive, time-wasting debates that fired up the GOP base. Flag burning. Gay marriage. The controversy over removing Terri Schiavo's feeding tube.

Congress even punted its most basic job: approving all 11 annual spending bills that keep the government's lights on.

Some Republicans' cluelessness was clear in their words. Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., complained that he and his colleagues were just too "tired" to do any serious work in their lame duck session. The three-day weeks must have been exhausting.

None of this says the Democrats will do better. They're already showing signs of reneging on campaign promises to improve ethics, rein in pork-barreling and implement 9/11 commission proposals. In fact, the Republicans were evicted because they became the very image of the corrupt and arrogant Democrats they overthrew in 1994.

Now it's up to resurgent Democrats to fulfill the promises they made to voters and build a better record. They'll have at least one thing going for them: It's a low bar.

Good Fish News (WP)

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

BEFORE LEAVING town, Congress passed an important piece of legislation for the health of America's oceans. Two commissions in recent years have concluded that only bold policies can prevent the collapse of coastal ecosystems. The bill, which reauthorized and improved upon the nation's fisheries management laws, wasn't bold enough and contained a few unfortunate compromises, but it represents progress.

Fisheries management is hugely important. When it's done poorly, the result is the disappearance of fish stocks, serious economic hardship for coastal communities and untold environmental damage. When it is done effectively -- as in Alaska -- the result is a win-win for environmental and economic interests. The keys are the responsible use of science in setting catch levels, a firm ban on overfishing and insistence that depleted stocks be permitted to rebuild.

Congress's first accomplishment was in generally rejecting efforts to weaken the rules -- which, given where the debate started, was no small thing. The bill clarified that regional fisheries councils, some of which have permitted overfishing of depleted stocks, must stop doing that. It obliged the councils to follow the advice of their scientific committees in setting annual catch limits. While a provision providing firm accountability for exceeding such limits got watered down, the insistence on science reflects a substantial and important change.

Assuming the councils respect Congress's will, the bill will move American fishing toward sustainable levels. It also has strong provisions regarding destructive methods of fishing on the high seas that will strengthen the hand of the administration, which has been trying in international negotiations to stop such practices in international waters.

The bill is a good start. It shows that the dire warnings of oceanic death have opened some eyes among policymakers.

Pelosi Piques Public's Interest (LAT)

By Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Nancy Pelosi appeared on national television on the morning after voters returned the House to Democratic hands, Leon Rebibo's phone started ringing in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0104467

A pearl wholesaler, Rebibo fielded calls from more than four dozen women of all political stripes who wanted a muted, multicolor strand of South Sea Tahitian pearls, just like the one Pelosi was wearing.

"I'm very disappointed the Democrats won, but I absolutely love her necklace. If my husband hears me, he's going to kill me," Rebibo recalled one Republican woman whispering into the phone.

As Pelosi prepares to be sworn in Jan. 4 as the first female speaker of the House, she has become an object of fascination and curiosity in political circles and beyond. Barbara Walters interviewed her as one of the year's 10 most fascinating people. People magazine has written about her twice in recent weeks. An article in a Palm Springs newspaper ran with the headline: "How To Get the Nancy Pelosi Look." (Answer: an Armani suit.)

Only weeks ago, Republicans were doing their best in the heat of the campaign to paint Pelosi, 66, as a conservative's nightmare — a San Francisco liberal out of touch with the American mainstream. But more recently, a poll measuring political charisma showed that she had "dramatically improved her standing" with the public, sponsors of the survey said, with voters knowing her better and feeling warmer toward her.

Now Pelosi is planning a series of events to commemorate her swearing-in as the senior official in the House, second in the line of succession. The events in the first week of January will try to plant Pelosi's version of her life story in the national consciousness, showing her as an Italian American and devout Catholic from Baltimore, who married her college sweetheart, raised five children, ran for Congress in middle-age and shattered a Washington gender barrier days before her sixth grandchild was born.

The impending inauguration kicks off the contest over who will define Nancy Pelosi: Republicans who see her as a reckless liberal, or Pelosi herself, who wants to be seen as an American Everywoman, leading her party on a steady course to the center.

"She is trying to dispatch the stereotype put forth by Republicans," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania. "The advantage she has is the country didn't know her before. Her challenge will be to take votes cast against Republicans and the war in Iraq and transform them into votes for the Democratic Party in 2008."

Though the details are in flux, plans are to begin the celebration Jan. 2 with a luncheon in Pelosi's hometown of Baltimore, reminding people she is not just a wealthy San Francisco matron but also the daughter of Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., a beloved Maryland congressman and Baltimore mayor.

The next day will include Mass at Trinity College in Washington, a nod to her alma mater and her faith. A tea will follow for female Democratic activists, lawmakers and donors. It will celebrate the 110th Congress, which convenes with the highest number of women in U.S. history.

The day will be capped by a dinner at the Italian Embassy — Pelosi is also the first Italian American speaker — where Tony Bennett is slated to sing — what else? — "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

The Jan. 4 gavel-passing will officially install her as speaker, the highest office ever attained by a female elected official in the U.S. She will set out her agenda in a speech to the House, then avail herself for the traditional photo session that gives the 434 other House members and their families a chance to have their picture taken with Pelosi pretending to swear them in.

The day ends with a 3,000-seat black-tie dinner and concert, with scheduled performances by Carole King and Jimmy Buffett, among others. Invited glitterati include Warren Beatty and Annette Bening, said Brian Quintana, a Malibu producer involved in the planning.

On Friday, a "People's House" event is planned at the Capitol, where Pelosi will meet and thank a broader group of well-wishers. The business of Congress will proceed in between, with Pelosi convening the House to launch the much-promoted "First 100 Hours" agenda that includes ethics reforms and a minimum-wage increase.

"Nancy Pelosi wanted a humble swearing-in and to go about the people's business," Quintana said. "Then, calls started coming in from all over the country. She decided we needed to thank the people who helped her get here."

The cost of the events will be covered by campaign donations, except the Friday morning People's House, which is paid for by congressional funds.

Four months ago, Pelosi barely registered on the name recognition scale, which served her well at the time; GOP attempts to demonize her fell flat because few knew who she was.

Now many more do.

"This is a dangerous time in terms of public reception. She has the newsworthiness but not the power," said former Democratic strategist Paul Begala. The introduction thus far has been bumpy. She stumbled when House Democrats rejected her choice of Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania as majority leader. In pushing Murtha, Pelosi stirred up a divisive flap that muted the big moment when House Democrats formally made her their leader.

Having spent years watching her party outmaneuvered in the message wars, Pelosi is soliciting advice from former Clinton White House Press Secretary Mike McCurry, one of the Democrats' most respected communication strategists.

Plans are also afloat to move the main communications operation from the speaker's office to incoming Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel of Illinois. He would handle party message and rapid response.

Meanwhile, all eyes are on Pelosi.

On Friday, Leon Rebibo's Pearl Source in Los Angeles unveiled "The Nancy Pelosi" — a replica of her Tahitian pearls. They will sell for $5,999 — a bargain compared with what Rebibo figures the real thing is worth.

In New Congress, Seniority Takes Back Seat To Spirit (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

They call themselves the "30-Something Working Group," a loose collection of House Democrats in their 30s and 40s who have begun making waves.

During the campaign season, the group took to the floor of the House nightly to give speeches during a period known as special orders, when lawmakers are permitted to speak for up to an hour about any topic after the day's business is complete.

The core of the group -- Reps. Kendrick Meek and Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Florida and Timothy J. Ryan of Ohio -- began talking at 10 or 11 p.m. Never mind that the House chamber was essentially empty at that hour. C-SPAN was recording the sessions, and insomniacs around the country got to know the three young Democrats. The trio sometimes used props and took irreverent jabs at the Republicans in honing their party's message.

"I was in the Minneapolis airport and the clerk in a shop said to me 'Are you on TV?' " Wasserman Schultz said. "I couldn't believe it. People across the country were watching."

The young Democrats played an important role in helping their party take control of Congress, and now they are beginning to reap the benefits. Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who will become speaker of the House when her party assumes control of Congress next month, is making room for these and other young House Democrats, giving them opportunities they would not normally enjoy under the rigid seniority system that typically defines life in the Capitol.

Last week, Pelosi announced Wasserman Schultz will be a deputy chief whip and Meek and Ryan will serve on the party's steering committee, which sets policy and makes committee assignments, along with two incoming freshmen. In addition, Wasserman Schultz and Davis are being considered for a seat on the prestigious Ways and Means Committee, which sets tax policy, and Meek is vying for a seat on the Appropriations Committee.

"Some members have waited four or five terms to be a member of Appropriations or Ways and Means," said Meek, who hauled an oversized rubber stamp to the House floor to argue that the Republican Congress was in lockstep with the White House. "The fact that an incoming third-termer is even being considered is evidence that Speaker Pelosi is committed to giving opportunities to younger members to participate in real policymaking."

At a Tuesday meeting of the Democratic caucus, where House members heard from several experts about Iraq, Pelosi insisted that freshmen members ask the first round of questions, a departure from past practice.

And when the new Congress convenes next month, Democratic leaders will break an ethics reform package into several individual bills so that freshmen can introduce each bill and get their first opportunity to make a speech on the House floor.

The idea, aides and party strategists say, is to put a younger, fresh face on the Democrats to embody the change Pelosi promised throughout the midterm campaign. They say she wants to reward several young lawmakers who worked hard during the election. And she wants to help establish those who won Republican seats and need to gain credibility before the 2008 election. She is also looking for ways to cultivate young voters for the party, aides say.

"People who were recently elected and have been through tough elections have a sense of the mood of the country and their communities, and [Pelosi] wants to encourage those voices," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), 48, also considered part of the new generation. "There was a period of time where the attitude was newer members should be seen and not heard. That's not the case."

Van Hollen worked closely during the campaign season with Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) and is a leading candidate to replace Emanuel as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Emanuel, 47, was elected chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, making him the fourth-ranking Democrat in the House.

One common thread that set the young representatives apart from longtime party stalwarts was a hunger and a determination to take control of Congress, several younger members said.

"The 'old bulls' have been in the minority for 12 years, and all of them recognize what landed us in the minority and that a new working order is necessary and is in the works," said Rep. Stephanie Herseth, a sophomore lawmaker from South Dakota.

DOJ_NMG_0104469

Almost two-thirds of the Democratic veterans in the House have known only life under GOP rule. "They stopped believing it was possible," Wasserman Schultz said. "If you keep losing election cycle after election cycle, it wears you down. We were able to restore some of their belief. They needed our energy and our intensity."

Spending Woes Await Dems In New Congress (USAT)

When the Democrats take control of Congress next month, they will also have to take charge of resolving spending issues that the old Congress couldn't.

As the clock ticked toward adjournment over the weekend, Congress approved a flurry of last-minute bills, but could not reach a deal on nearly a dozen annual spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1.

Instead, lawmakers approved a stopgap measure that keeps the federal government running through Feb. 15 — about a week after President Bush unveils his budget plans for fiscal year 2008.

"The new Congress is going to have to do in five weeks what the old Congress couldn't do in five months," said Stan Collender, a former congressional budget committee aide. He said the stage is set for a budget showdown with Bush, who is more likely to veto Democrat-passed spending bills.

Budget work on about $400 billion for agencies as varied as the Education Department, the Department of Agriculture and Health and Human Services will be left unfinished also.

"I think this Congress will be remembered for its failures more than its accomplishments," said Rep. Jack Kingston, R-Ga., a member of the Appropriations Committee, which oversees most federal spending.

Rep. Dave Obey, D-Wis., who will become Appropriations Committee chairman when the new Congress is sworn in Jan. 4, called the stopgap-spending bill "a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times."

Broad disagreement over levels of federal spending for fiscal 2007, and how to avoid raising the annual deficit above its current level of roughly $250 billion, prevented Democrats and Republicans from agreeing to most of the spending bills it must pass each year to fund the government.

One dispute was over how much to increase spending available to Veterans Affairs hospitals, which are faced with growing demands for care and backlogs of patients from the Iraq war and earlier periods of service.

In other end-of-session business, the House ethics committee on Friday said it found no evidence that any current lawmakers or aides violated any rules in the case of former congressman Mark Foley. The panel recommended no sanctions but accused some House members of being "willfully ignorant" of the consequences of his behavior.

The Florida Republican resigned in September after he was confronted with sexually explicit and other inappropriate electronic messages he allegedly sent to former teenage pages.

To The Victors Go The Invoices (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the closing hours of the Republican-controlled Congress, impatient House Democrats took a swing at oil and gas interests -- a sign of things to come in January.

The punch fell wide: Their amendment, seeking to recoup royalties from energy companies drilling on federal lands, failed 207-205. There was pride in coming so close. But the defeat also betrayed a level of confusion in the new majority and fear that it won't have the resources needed to carry out its agenda after midterm election victories.

What had begun as a simple two-paragraph amendment to a tax bill had grown to fill 11 pages before it was offered with hand-scrawled notations and a new multibillion dollar provision exempting middle-income families from the alternative minimum tax through 2007.

"We'll be back with 30 more votes in a month," said Rep. Edward Markey (D., Mass.) the chief sponsor. But the budget math won't change, and Democrats still face this question: how to pay for their initiatives and address significant fiscal problems left behind by outgoing Republicans?

For Mr. Markey, recovering billions in oil royalties is both good government and a means to pay for lower interest rates charged to students on their college loans. Continued AMT relief in 2007 is something his party also wants. But the failed amendment became a thinly disguised attempt by Democratic tax writers to charge the AMT costs to Republicans before tougher deficit-reduction rules are put in place in January.

The failed amendment was to have been added to a $45.1 billion omnibus tax package, itself an exemplar of how much Congress approaches decisions on an installment basis because lawmakers can't face the long-term costs. Filled with scores of provisions, the bill finally was sent to President Bush with bipartisan support around 2 a.m. Saturday. Attached to the measure was a historic Vietnam trade bill as well as an extension of trade provisions important to Haiti and Andean nations.

Before passage, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) -- proclaiming himself "embarrassed" -- vainly protested that the bill was $17.5 billion over budget limits set by Republicans themselves.

He was voted down 67-21, with less than a third of his party supporting him. Even Mr. Gregg's numbers understate the longer-term impact, because most of the tax breaks are only extended through 2007, meaning the new Democratic majority next year will come under immediate pressure to make room in its 2008 budget to extend them again.

These include popular deductions for college tuition, teacher classroom expenses, and state and local sales taxes, a big issue for the home state of new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.). The corporate-research tax credit, which had expired at the end of 2005, is both restored and expanded through 2007, meaning the annual costs will be even greater when Democrats address the issue for 2008.

And after years of trying, the insurance industry won a provision allowing new, middle-income homeowners to deduct the cost of mortgage-insurance premiums -- an idea many Democrats will find hard to resist and which had early support from tax writer Sen. Blanche Lincoln, (D., Ark.).

The deduction, which the industry estimates could save $200 to $400 a year per household, is targeted to families with adjusted gross income below $110,000. Insurers hope it will make first-time home buying easier, because families are less likely then to have the equity to make a large enough deposit to avoid having to have mortgage insurance, typically 20%. But the provision is narrowly prescribed to 2007. Only new mortgage contracts issued after Dec. 31 would qualify and premiums paid before the end of 2007. The deduction's short-term cost is about $91 million; that is, unless it also gets extended down the road.

In the same vein, new short-term credits are introduced, such as for the purchase of mine safety equipment by coal companies. Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands will benefit from Washington sharing -- on a temporary basis -- more of its collections of rum excise taxes.

Two spending elements attached to the tax bill are also telling. Coal-state senators won a $4.9 billion provision to lift federal spending for retired miner's health benefits and abandoned mine reclamation. As part of the same compromise a new set of tax breaks was added to promote the use of health-savings accounts, but again on an incremental one-year basis to play down the costs.

The second spending issue dealt with government supported health-care programs, which represent a huge strain on future budgets. In the case of Medicaid, a joint federal-state health program for the poor, the bill makes it harder for the Bush administration to crack down on schemes used by states to increase Washington's share of the program. Hospital and nursing-home lobbies argued for the amendment, but the result is to give the White House less flexibility in addressing cost problems.

In the case of Medicare, negotiators agreed to forestall a scheduled 5% cut in reimbursements for physicians under the program, covering the elderly and disabled. But the bill only meets part of the estimated $13 billion in costs now, meaning the next Congress will start further in the hole. Democrats accepted the outcome, not so much because they liked it but because they have a longer-term interest in building a partnership with physicians, whom they consider pivotal to any long-term effort to address health-care costs. As part of the agreement, an extra 1.5% bonus payment would go to doctors who participate in a health-care data reporting program to begin next July. And Democrats would like to create a more stable reimbursement situation for physicians in return for more help in identifying long-term savings in health care.

One problem that won't wait for the long term is the still unfinished business of spending for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. Before surrendering power, Republicans sent Mr. Bush a stop-gap bill late Friday to keep agencies operating through Feb. 15, but Democrats will now be saddled with having to sort through what amounts on an annual basis $463 billion in discretionary spending.

The Department of Veterans Affairs is given greater discretion to shift as much as $684 million from other accounts to deal with the shortfall that develops in medical care. But other agencies are less fortunate, and if an agreement isn't reached quickly between Democrats and the White House, the domestic-appropriations debate could become entangled with Mr. Bush's anticipated request next year for more money for the war in Iraq.

Leaving The Dems Some Hot Potatoes (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

Nearly everyone on Capitol Hill calls it a mess. Democratic leaders at their end-of-the-year press conference railed about Congress's failure to finish answering the dollars and cents questions of funding the government. "They are going to leave a mess as they go out," said Democratic House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi. Some of their brethren across the aisle, including the Republican senator in charge of appropriations, were dismayed, too. Across town, the president's bean counters at the Office of Management and Budget also wished Congress had finished its appropriations work earlier.

But it wasn't to be. The lame duck Republican-led Congress punted nearly a half-trillion dollars in unfinished spending over to next year-to the Democrats, that is. Just when the Democrats hope to be talking about the minimum wage and college tuition and fulfilling their campaign pledges for a "new direction," they'll be saddled with looking backward and making a host of spending decisions fraught with peril. Their plans to hit the ground running with a flurry of politically popular initiatives may just have run into a gaping pothole.

That's because the lawmakers who left Washington last week-after working for just 103 days this year, fewer than the "Do Nothing Congress" of 1948-completed only two (defense and homeland security) of the 11 spending bills that finance 13 government agencies. Late Friday, Congress instead appeared headed toward passage of a stopgap continuing resolution to keep the government funded through February. But that leaves Democrats with $463 billion in fiscal year 2007 spending issues to resolve on their watch before they take up the budget again-probably in the spring-for fiscal year 2008. "We're going to have to do two years' work in one year," says Rep. David Obey, the Wisconsin Democrat who will take over the House Appropriations Committee.

In the best of times, Congress usually tries to finish the budget process by October of each year for fiscal years that run from then through the following September. Often, a few bills drag on, but "finishing just two of the appropriations bills by January is nearly unprecedented," says Brian Riedl, a budget analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

Politics? Throughout the year, Republicans were split between fiscal hawks intent on combating special-interest spending on lawmakers' favorite programs-earmarks-and moderates who argued for more funding. Those Republican factions never fully agreed, so they decided to leave the headache for Democrats.

Veteran Congress watchers also suspect that a good deal of politics was involved in the calculus. According to this theory, some Republicans figure that Democrats will have a hard time governing with the spending bills on their shoulders, meaning they face the risk of losing momentum early. "When they found Democrats were in the majority in the House and Senate," says James Horney of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "they said, 'Hey, not our problem anymore.'"

Short-term resolutions are no way to run a government. Fundamental choices aren't made-and those that have been tediously negotiated aren't acted on. Lots of agencies and programs drift into a kind of bureaucratic limbo as they lose the ability to plan. In the end, costs can also rise. The Justice Department, for example, will reportedly have 70 percent less money than the president's request because of stalled negotiations. The Census Bureau, which is trying to start a new computerized system for the 2010 census, risks a $1 billion cost overrun, if funding uncertainties mean a pilot program can't be started or the purchase must be delayed. "The more mundane-sounding but necessary accounts are the ones that get hit," Stephen McMillin, the deputy director of OMB, tells U.S. News.

Is The Farm Bill's Fat Finally In The Fire? (USNEWS)

By Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, December 10, 2006

The agriculture industry is hoping for a 2007 bumper crop-of money. When Congress reconvenes in January, one of its top priorities will be hashing out a new six-year farm bill, an always anticipated Washington ritual that has regularly delivered massive subsidies to the industry and howls of protest from budget hawks and others. Supporters say the money has kept the farm economy afloat through market crashes and dire weather. But the farm bill has a reputation for being heavy on wasteful pork-barrel funding. One published report cited $1.3 billion for folks who don't farm at all. Critics say it's time to end the payouts. And environmental and trade considerations have made the bill a platform for debate on some of the nation's most crucial issues.

From fiscal years 2002 to 2006, the government spent $93.3 billion subsidizing "commodity crops" like corn, wheat, rice, and soybeans, flooding the international market with cheap goods. It may keep the American farm economy going, but the policy threatens free-trade agreements; World Trade Organization talks are stalled because of agriculture subsidies by the United States and equally protectionist European nations. Another chief complaint: Seventy-two percent of the money goes to just 10 percent of the recipients. "The big guys get bigger ... the small operators are left behind," says Ken Cook of the Environmental Working Group.

While Big Ag is pushing for another barnburner, the largess of the 2002 farm bill, penned at a time of government surplus, is gone. This time, nothing will come easy.

Dust Bowl. The farm bill's roots are in the Great Depression. But when the economy recovered, subsidies didn't stop, partly because of powerful legislators from farm states. In 1996, Indiana Sen. Dick Lugar attempted major reform with the Freedom to Farm Act, which cut subsidies to staple crops and allowed farmers more choices in planting. It passed, in part, because of a bullish commodities market. But when prices fell, the agriculture industry clamored for help. By 2002, it was back to business as usual.

But the business of agriculture, and the farm bill, are changing. Fruit and vegetable growers are demanding their slice of the pie as they face stiffening competition from imports. They have the backing of the powerful California delegation in Congress and have already submitted their own bill. But ethanol will dominate talks. Not only are corn prices booming because of ethanol demand, but the gasoline substitute could give producers a way around international trade regulations through an exception that's made for environmental purposes, such as renewable fuels. Free-traders want to kill all subsidies, and environmental groups who have the ear of some Democrats oppose more corn-based ethanol, preferring switch-grass- and wood-chip-based biofuel. They also fear that more corn production will remove land from the bill's Conservation Reserve Program, which currently keeps about 36 million acres of farmland out of production.

From all this, an odd-couple alliance is forming among Bread for the World, the libertarian Cato Institute, the liberal Environmental Defense, and the conservative Club for Growth. Expect talks to accelerate by early spring. Most insiders predict calls for reform will keep Big Ag from going home with the usual honey pot, but it won't be left hungry, either. For some, that's enough. "It's almost like a revolution is taking place," says Kathleen Rogers of Earthday Network. If that's so, change may be coming quick to rural America.

A Billion Here, A Billion There... (USNEWS)

By Edward T. Pound

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

For years the Department of Interior's Minerals Management Service operated pretty much in the backwaters of the nation's capital, drawing little scrutiny from the press or Capitol Hill. Such obscurity, however, is a thing of the past. Last summer, congressional investigators discovered that the agency had bungled its job so badly that energy companies legally avoided paying an estimated $2 billion in royalties on oil and natural gas extracted from federal waters. The final tab to taxpayers could reach $10 billion. Lawmakers, to put it mildly, are incensed.

Now, when the new Congress convenes in January under Democratic control, there will be scrutiny aplenty of the beleaguered Interior Department unit. In the Senate, Democrat Ron Wyden of Oregon will chair a subcommittee and vows a "very vigorous" investigation of the oil and gas leasing program run by the minerals agency. Taxpayers, Wyden said in an interview, are victims of a giant "rip-off" by oil and gas companies. In the House, says a senior aide to Rep. Nick Rahall, the West Virginia Democrat expected to chair the House Resources Committee, "there will be an intensive and exhaustive review of royalty underpayments."

"Steal a loaf." The minerals agency may be little known, but it has been an important source of revenue for the U.S. Treasury and for American Indians. Last year, it collected $9.9 billion in royalties on oil and gas pumped from federal and Indian lands and from U.S.-owned coastal waters. Some 2,600 companies hold 27,800 producing leases.

The current scandal focuses on the agency's failure to ensure that oil and gas producers paid their full share of royalties on oil and gas pumped from the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico. This is what happened: MMS officials inexplicably failed to include provisions in some deep-water leases that would have required energy companies to pay royalties once the price per barrel reached a certain level. That mistake cost the Treasury some $2 billion in lost revenue. Today, the minerals agency is attempting to cut new deals with 12 of the 56 oil companies that hold these lucrative leases. A few companies seem keen on working something out. "We would like to see a mutually beneficial solution," says Donald Campbell, a spokesman for Chevron Corp.

As congressional investigators dig deeper, they have an important ally in the Interior Department's chief watchdog, Inspector General Earl Devaney. He has been snapping at the heels of MMS officials for years. Last week, he issued a tough, 50-page report warning that the minerals agency's audit and compliance program on royalty payments for federal and Indian properties is so flawed that there is a high risk that the agency "may not detect underpaid royalties." Agency officials defended the program but promised to fix any problems.

Devaney's conclusion came as no surprise to investigators at the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group that has long criticized the minerals agency for lax oversight of energy producers. "If you don't have a policeman in the neighborhood," Beth Daley, POGO's chief investigator says, "the thief is going to steal a loaf of bread from the bakery." The watchdog group has helped the government recover hundreds of millions of dollars in royalty underpayments.

The scandal has hurt MMS's top official, Johnnie Burton, who testified in September before a House panel chaired by Rep. Darrell Issa, a California Republican. In an interview, the lawmaker says bluntly that Burton misled Congress. "She said she hadn't learned about the missing price thresholds [in some deep-water] leases until 2006," Issa says. But he has information, he says, indicating that Burton learned of the problem two years earlier. Issa wants Burton out. "I would like to see a reformer in that position," he said. "I do not believe she is a reformer." Burton, says an Interior Department spokesperson, declined to comment on Issa's statements.

Even some of the agency's own auditors are appalled at the mess. A former top auditor has filed a lawsuit in federal court, claiming that the minerals agency blocked his efforts to recover money owed to the government. Look for this to be one of the first big housecleaning moves when Congress comes back after the holidays.

Senate Confirms Jordan To 3rd Circuit Replacing Senior Judge Jane Roth (LAW)

By Elizabeth Bennett, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, December 11, 2006

The U.S. Senate confirmed Judge Kent A. Jordan to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday.

Jordan, formerly a judge for the U.S. District Court for the District of Delaware, was nominated in June to replace Judge Jane R. Roth, who took senior status on the appellate court effective May 31. Both Roth and Jordan are Republicans.

Directly before his appointment to the district court in 2002, Jordan was vice president and general counsel of the Corporation Services Co. in Wilmington, Del. He joined the company in 1998 after five years as a partner with Wilmington firm Morris James Hitchens & Williams.

From 1987 to 1992, Jordan was an Assistant U.S. Attorney, after having spent two years as an associate with Potter Anderson & Corroon, another Wilmington firm.

Admitted to the Delaware bar in 1984, Jordan clerked for Judge James L. Latchum of the Delaware District Court from 1984 to 1985, after receiving his J.D. from the Georgetown University Law Center. He received his B.A. from Brigham Young University in 1981. Jordan was born in West Point, N.Y., and resides in Delaware.

"Kent Jordan embodies all the qualities one should look for in a judge -- integrity, a thorough understanding of the law, a keen intellect, a willingness to listen to both sides of a case, and a strong work ethic," said U.S. Sen. Tom Carper, D-Del. "I believe he will do an outstanding job and will continue in the tradition of fine Delawarean jurists that have served on the federal bench."

Historically, two seats on the 3rd Circuit bench have gone to Delaware jurists. Jordan's nomination continues the tradition. Roth is from Delaware, and the state's other representative on the court is Judge Thomas L. Ambro, who joined from private bankruptcy practice at Wilmington firm Richards Layton & Finger. He was nominated by President Bill Clinton and confirmed in 2000.

SF Protesters Urge Pelosi To Pursue Impeachment Of Bush (SFC)

By John King

San Francisco Chronicle, December 11, 2006

(12-10) 13:48 PST SAN FRANCISCO -- As Democrats prepare to take control of Congress, a small but spirited rally in San Francisco called on the future speaker of the House of Representatives, the city's Rep. Nancy Pelosi, to move impeachment to the top of the legislative agenda.

"We need Nancy Pelosi to serve and represent her people. We need her to stand up and say I'm going to do what's right," said Norah Foster, one of the organizers of the rally at United Nations Plaza near San Francisco's City Hall and Civic Center.

"If she puts impeachment back on the table, I'm confident Bush and Cheney will resign within four months," Foster said during the rally.

The protest -- organized by Bay Area anti-war groups -- was held on the 60th International Human Rights Day. Similar rallies were scheduled in other large American cities.

The turnout was a far cry from the street-filling protests held in opposition to the invasion of Iraq in 2003. The listeners at U.N. Plaza barely outnumbered the two dozen or so organizers, who were wearing orange jumpsuits, windbreakers and T-shirts.

But neither the small turnout -- nor intermittent rain -- dampened the speakers' ardor.

Bushes Join 'Dr. Phil' At Christmas Show (AP)

By Ann Sanner

AP, December 11, 2006

President Bush enjoyed a lively set of Christmas music Sunday night, swaying and bobbing his head as music stars like Taylor Hicks and Gretchen Wilson belted out classic carols.

TV host "Dr. Phil" McGraw and his wife, Robin, emceed the annual "Christmas in Washington" concert at the National Building Museum. The event benefited the Children's National Medical Center.

DOJ_NMG_0104474

"Since this event began a quarter of a century ago, 'Christmas in Washington' has become one of the most cherished holiday traditions here in our nation's capital," Bush said.

As Americans gather with their families over the holidays, Bush said, U.S. troops abroad "must know that our nation is grateful for your service."

"American Idol" winner Hicks led off the show with "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town." Country singer Wilson performed "I Saw Mommy Kissing Santa Claus," while 12-year-old "America's Got Talent" champ Bianca Ryan sang "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas." Pop-opera quartet Il Divo performed "White Christmas." The lineup also included soul singers Chris Brown and Corinne Bailey Rae.

The president and first lady Laura Bush joined all the performers onstage for the finale, including "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing."

The event will air Wednesday night on Turner Network Television.

Earlier Sunday, the Bushes attended services at St. John's Episcopal Church, a block away from the White House. The president also went on a bike ride at a wildlife refuge in Maryland.

A Partisan Take On The Shadow President (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

In Executive Privilege, a sex and politics thriller written by Dick Cheney's wife, Lynne, President Zern Jenner laments: "The history of the presidency in the 20th century is the history of a gradually weakening institution." Her book reflected the sombre pillow talk of her husband. It was written in 1979, four years after Mr Cheney became the youngest White House chief of staff for President Gerald Ford. He was profoundly affected by the reassertion of Congress over the executive branch after Watergate and by the submission of his boss to testify on the Hill.

Thirty years later, those concerns no longer find expression in his wife's fictional characters. As vice-president, his goal has been to restore to the presidency the unimpeded constitutional power to conduct national security policy and pass on his office "in better shape than we found it".

In Vice, Lou Dubose – a reporter who has previously taken aim at Republican icons George Bush, Tom DeLay and Karl Rove – and Jake Bernstein, set out to depict how Mr Cheney's has become the most powerful vice-presidency in history, "insulated from any accountability – from the Congress and even from the president with whom he shared executive power".

The partisan tone can be deduced from the chapter headings: "Covert Cover-up", "Lady MacCheney" and the "Torture Presidency". In a liberal-pleasing epilogue they say he created a "still largely invisible constitutional crisis". The book concludes with the word "bullshit", noting he went to the Iraq war on the basis "of forged documents that he knew were bullshit".

The book is best on the methods used to consolidate power, not the man. His ascent has been aided by the assiduous cultivation of patrons, including Donald Rumsfeld, former secretary of defence, from whom he learnt the art of marginalising enemies, the calculated leak and giving oral advice rather than leaving a paper record.

Reinforcing the image of Mr Cheney as the shadow president, the authors reveal the ways he has bolstered his authority. His national security team read all the e-mail traffic to and from the president's National Security Council staffers, yet they are not allowed to read the communications of his staff.

Exploiting loopholes, his legal counsel redefined his office as a branch of Congress to avoid Freedom of Information requests, yet failed to submit to Senate ethics rules that require disclosure of details on staffing or travel. He has the same power to classify information as the president and, in his first year in office, he defended the secrecy of his energy task force to shield advice from oil executives.

His most potent legacy is national security law. In the 1980s, during the Iran-Contra hearings, he defended the administration's right to conduct covert operations. After September 11 2001, he conceded the need to "work, through, sort of the dark side", and pioneered terrorist surveillance and harsher interrogation methods, earning himself the title in a Washington Post editorial, "Vice-President for Torture".

On the most contentious claims, such as whether he steered $7bn in no-bid Iraq contracts to Halliburton, the oil services company he ran from 1995 to 2000, the authors offer implications, not facts. "If [Scooter] Libby [chief of staff] had been briefed on the contracts, it was all but impossible that Dick Cheney was out of the loop," is one loaded assertion.

Where the book is weakest is on offering real insight into the man behind the austere, avuncular image and half crooked smile. It fails to explain a man who earned a reputation as a Wyoming congressman, as a reassuring, attentive listener, a conservative but political pragmatist, but is now seen as a stubborn figure, so indifferent to his public image that he went duck shooting on election day.

This is a story told from the outside looking in. As well as leaving a limited paper trail, Mr Cheney trails few anecdotes. There are a few glimpses of a more complex character behind the caricature – of him turning to alcohol after flunking out of Yale to become a lineman and enjoying rowdy parties during his time on the Hill – but Nicholas Lehman's 2001 profile in The New Yorker gets closer to capturing his enigmatic personality. Ron Suskind's One Percent Doctrine better explains his transformation after the first Gulf war, when Mr Cheney asked: "How many additional American casualties is Saddam worth? And the answer is not very damned many," into an unwavering advocate of a transformationalist foreign policy, driven by a visceral sense of threat rather than by being a true believer in spreading democracy.

Indeed, democracy at home is no easier. The new Democratic majority is likely to drag Mr Cheney, who prefers to operate in back rooms or on conservative talk shows, into the spotlight. The incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee will hold investigations into his energy task force and spending on government contractors in Iraq. While he is likely to resist efforts to testify the danger is that, for all his efforts over the past six years to pass on his office in better shape, his actions have triggered a backlash, ushering in the same kind of congressional reassertion of power that so defined him three decades ago.

Inquiry Sought Over Evangelical Video (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

A military watchdog group is asking the Defense Department to investigate whether seven Army and Air Force officers violated regulations by appearing in uniform in a promotional video for an evangelical Christian organization.

In the video, much of which was filmed inside the Pentagon, four generals and three colonels praise the Christian Embassy, a group that evangelizes among military leaders, politicians and diplomats in Washington. Some of the officers describe their efforts to spread their faith within the military.

"I found a wonderful opportunity as a director on the joint staff, as I meet the people that come into my directorate," Air Force Maj. Gen. Jack J. Catton Jr. says in the video. "And I tell them right up front who Jack Catton is, and I start with the fact that I'm an old-fashioned American, and my first priority is my faith in God, then my family and then country. I share my faith because it describes who I am."

Pete Geren, a former acting secretary of the Air Force who oversaw the service's response in 2005 to accusations that evangelical Christians were pressuring cadets at the Air Force Academy, also appears in the video. The Christian Embassy "has been a rock that I can rely on, been an organization that helped me in my walk with Christ, and I'm just thankful for the service they give," he says.

The 10-minute video is on the group's Web site, Christianembassy.com. The organization was founded nearly 30 years ago by the late Bill Bright, who also founded Campus Crusade for Christ. The Christian Embassy Web site says the group holds prayer breakfasts each Wednesday in the Pentagon's executive dining room and organizes small groups to help military leaders "bridge the gap between faith and work."

Army Brig. Gen. Bob Casen refers in the video to the Christian Embassy's special efforts to reach admirals and generals through Flag Fellowship groups. Whenever he sees another fellowship member, he says, "I immediately feel like I am being held accountable, because we are the aroma of Jesus Christ."

The Military Religious Freedom Foundation, a watchdog group led by retired Air Force lawyer Michael L. "Mikey" Weinstein, is requesting an investigation in a letter to the Defense Department's inspector general.

Weinstein, a White House lawyer in the Reagan administration, cites Defense Department regulations barring personnel from appearing in uniform in "speeches, interviews, picket lines, marches, rallies or any public demonstration . . . which may imply Service sanction of the cause for which the demonstration or activity is conducted."

All the officers are identified in the video by their Defense Department positions, "yet the video failed to include any disclaimers indicating that the views expressed were not those of the Department of Defense," the letter says.

It asks whether the officers received permission to promote the Christian Embassy and whether any other religious or secular organizations have been allowed to use Pentagon facilities and uniformed personnel in promotional videos.

Catton said yesterday that he does not remember whether he sought approval to appear in the video, which he said was made in 2005. "If someone asked me today to do it, I for sure would ask permission," said the general, who sparked controversy this year by raising money from fellow officers for a congressional candidate.

Christian Embassy officials in Washington did not return phone messages left at their homes and offices over the weekend.

Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, said yesterday that "it is impossible for me or the department to comment on a letter we haven't received yet." Once the letter is in hand, he added, "I'm confident that the inspector general will take the appropriate action."

In 2003, Army Lt. Gen. William G. "Jerry" Boykin drew criticism for appearing in uniform before church groups and saying, in remarks captured on video, that President Bush was "appointed by God," that the United States is "a Christian nation" and that Muslims worship "an idol." The inspector general's office determined that Boykin had not violated any rules, and he remained in a top intelligence post.

This year, Navy chaplain Gordon J. Klingenschmitt was court-martialed for appearing in uniform at a political protest in front of the White House, though he maintained that all he did was lead a prayer.

Weinstein noted that his son and daughter-in-law, who are serving as first lieutenants in the Air Force, received written permission in July to appear in a documentary based on the book "Constantine's Sword," a history of Christian anti-Semitism.

"They may appear on camera for this documentary, but as they will be speaking for themselves, as private citizens, not for the Air Force, they cannot appear in uniform," says the order, a copy of which Weinstein provided to The Washington Post.

Shuttle Crew Prepares For Building Blitz At Station (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, December 11, 2006

Early data from Saturday's launch of space shuttle Discovery show the ship is in good health and suffered no damage on the way to orbit, deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon said Sunday.

"It was a very typical ascent," Shannon said. "The team sees nothing of concern at this time."

NASA stepped up its scrutiny of the shuttle's condition after launch-pad debris punched a hole in shuttle Columbia's heat shield in 2003. The hole went undetected, and the vehicle fell apart as it re-entered the atmosphere, killing the crew.

Discovery's liftoff was the first night launch in four years. The darkness meant that many launch cameras had less of a view than during the day or none at all.

However, engineers got good footage of parts of the spacecraft illuminated by the fiery plumes of its own rockets and thruster jets.

"I was surprised," by the amount of detail the cameras captured, Shannon said. He said cameras at the launch pad showed that the shuttle's fuel tank, the source of the debris that fatally struck Columbia, was in better condition than during any of the past three shuttle flights.

Despite the good camera views, Discovery's astronauts spent Sunday performing a survey of their ship. The data they gathered is the most important in determining whether their spacecraft can get them safely home.

Led by astronaut Nicholas Patrick, the crew spent nearly five hours Sunday surveying the wings and nose. Those areas feel the hottest temperatures — roughly 3,000 degrees — as the shuttle re-enters the Earth's atmosphere. The inspection job is both crucial and tedious, requiring the astronauts to spend long periods keeping tabs on the shuttle's arm in case it malfunctions.

In 2005, a shuttle crew had to fight with balky technology to aim the camera. Earlier this year, a shuttle crew found itself focusing on what turned out to be not damage to the heat shield but splattered bird droppings.

The first part of the inspection Sunday went so smoothly that the crew finished the heat-shield inspection nearly an hour ahead of schedule.

The shuttle's square white heat-shielding tiles will be inspected today. As Discovery nears the International Space Station for docking, shuttle commander Mark Polansky will send his spacecraft into a slow somersault at 3:45 p.m. ET. The crew of the space station will snap photos of the tiles and other parts of the shuttle as Discovery does its flip.

The combination of Sunday's survey and the photos by the station crew today will make up for the fewer photos during launch, Patrick said before the flight.

After docking with the station, Discovery's crew will immediately embark on a six-day building blitz that will transform the orbiting laboratory. After the 4:47 p.m. ET docking, two Discovery astronauts will command the shuttle's robotic arm to reach into its cargo bay and pluck out an early Christmas gift for the station, a new piece to be added to the station's aluminum framework.

The shuttle's robotic arm then will hand the new girder to the station's robotic arm. It will be a dicey operation: If the astronauts steering the shuttle arm are a few inches off, they could bash the arm into the shuttle's cargo-bay doors and damage the cooling system there.

Delivery of the girder is only the first step in what NASA officials call the most complex shuttle mission devoted to building the station, which has been occupied since 2000. Discovery's crew, with the help of Mission Control and the station's residents, plan to rewire the lab and start up its cooling system. Much of the equipment to be turned on has waited in orbit for years. No one knows whether it will work.

"We have a lot of work in front of us, but so far so good," lead shuttle flight director Tony Ceccacci said Sunday.

First Day In Space For Discovery Includes Full Check For Damages (AP)

AP, December 11, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. -- Astronauts aboard the space shuttle Discovery woke up to The Beatles on Sunday, their first morning in space, where the first order of business will be to make sure their ship wasn't damaged during launch.

The crew lit up the sky late Saturday with a fiery ascent that practically turned night into day in the first nighttime launch in four years. Then it was on to the international space station to rewire the orbital outpost.

The astronauts began their day to the mellow tunes of "Here Comes the Sun."

"Good morning, Discovery. We especially want to thank you for the burst of sunshine you brought into our lives last night. It was an awesome launch," Shannon Lucid from Mission Control radioed up to the crew.

SHUTTLE MONITOR

Check out the latest NASA updates on the Discovery mission, including a launch blog, Webcast and pictures at NASA's Web site.

"It was pretty great for all of us, too," Commander Mark Polansky responded.

Astronauts will spend the day inspecting the shuttle for potentially critical heat shield damage from debris that may have fallen off the external tank during lift off, the problem that doomed the shuttle Columbia in 2003.

Nicholas Patrick, one of the five astronauts experiencing zero gravity for the first time, will use the shuttle's 50-foot robotic arm and similarly long boom with sensors and a camera to inspect the ship. The survey is scheduled to start at 3:12 p.m.

The shuttle is scheduled to dock with the space station Monday to begin conducting three complicated spacewalks to rewire the space station from a temporary to a permanent power source.

NASA had to beat the odds to get off the launch pad Saturday. After only a 30% chance of good weather earlier in the day and a two-hour delay in fueling, Discovery streaked through a moonless sky at 8:47 p.m. EST. "It just all came together perfectly," launch director Mike Leinbach said.

The mood was also upbeat aboard Discovery. "I think we have five people who just haven't stopped smiling yet," Cmdr. Polansky said after the shuttle reached space.

During the 12-day mission, Discovery's crew will also deliver an $11 million addition to the space lab and bring home one of the space station's three crew members, German astronaut Thomas Reiter of the European Space Agency. American astronaut Sunita "Suni" Williams will replace him, staying for six months.

The two veterans aboard the shuttle are Cmdr. Polansky and Robert Curbeam, who will spacewalk three times. The others are pilot William Oefelein, and mission specialists Patrick, Williams, Joan Higginbotham and the European Space Agency's Christer Fuglesang, who was the first Swede in space.

Mr. Fuglesang carried some unusual food into orbit: several cans of moose sausage and moose pate.

The mission is one leg of a three-year race to finish construction on the space station before shuttles are retired in 2010. After Discovery's mission, 13 more shuttle flights are needed to complete the lab.

The launch was the first at night since Endeavour's flight in November 2002 and only the 29th in darkness of NASA's 117 total shuttle launches.

NASA had required daylight launches for three flights after the Columbia accident so that clear images could be taken of the external fuel tank. Foam broke off Columbia's tank at liftoff and struck the spacecraft's wing, leading to the disaster that killed seven astronauts. Mission Control in Houston told Discovery's crew that there were no initial reports of any serious problems with the latest launch and that the shuttle was "in great shape."

"What you've seen tonight is the successful accomplishment of the most challenging, demanding, technically state-of-the-art, difficult thing that this nation or any nation can do," NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said.

Saturday's launch was only the fourth since the Columbia disaster in 2003 and the third of the year. It also was the last scheduled liftoff from pad 39B, which will be modified for new rockets that will take astronauts back to the moon in 2020. "It's kind of the end of an era," Mr. Leinbach said.

Time For A Power Boost At International Space Station (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

Imagine overhauling the electrical system of a transatlantic airliner in midflight, and you get an inkling of the challenge NASA faces this week as it takes the next major step in completing the International Space Station.

Saturday night, the shuttle Discovery and its seven-member crew arced into the sky, spraying a trail of fire that lit the night. Tuesday, astronauts Robert Curbeam and Sweden's Christer Fuglesang begin the first of three spacewalks to ensure that the orbiting outpost can provide the power and cooling needed to house six crew members and run European and Japanese labs, slated to arrive at the station beginning next October.

Astronauts will help install a new $11 million truss to the station's "backbone." And they will connect a set of solar panels, delivered in September, to the station's power grid.

These are not simple plug-and-play operations. Controllers in Houston will have to partially retract an existing solar array to give the new panels room to move as they track the sun. Then ground controllers must reroute the flow of electricity through the station so that astronauts don't handle live wires during their spacewalks. Vital life-support systems will be shut down in parts of the station, temporarily erasing the protective redundancy built into the station. Equipment that must be kept running to ensure redundancy will have to be "jumpered" to the powered half of the grid.

If all goes as planned "it won't be as complicated" as it could be, says Kirk Shireman, the space station's program manager. "But you have to prepare yourself for quite a number of ugly contingencies."

Some of the hardware the astronauts must activate have been dormant for years. "It's like storing a car in a garage for four years, then turning the key to see if it starts," he continues. This mission is important for the station's future, which itself is important as NASA plans to explore the moon and, perhaps, Mars.

"One of the things we're going to learn from the station is in fact how to work through failures or problems" during long-lived manned missions, acknowledges NASA Administrator Michael Griffin. Until the space station came along, he continues, US missions consisted of brief episodes on orbit or at the moon. "Even Skylab was 84 days, less than three months. When we go to Mars, we need three years."

If the station represents a step on the ladder that will ultimately allow humans to climb out of low-Earth orbit for long-term exploration, it also remains a test of Washington's reliability as a partner in global manned-spaceflight projects.

Last week, NASA unveiled a rough outline of its plans for a lunar outpost, whose evolution beyond a single dot on the lunar map will depend on international participation.

NASA's likens the effort to the history of exploring Antarctica. Some 50 years passed between the first successful round trip to the South Pole and the establishment of permanent bases there. Visits grew longer, and the bases expanded, until today, where many nations have year-round facilities there. The outlines of a lunar outpost bear the same gradualist features.

Yet NASA's vision for space explorationis the first set of goals set out by President Bush and endorsed by Congress that by design spans administrations and generations. Several science-policy analysts have noted that it's difficult to see how NASA will be able to do it with the money it's likely to receive from Congress. By one analysis, from the original Mercury flight in 1961 through the Apollo-Soyuz mission of 1975, NASA spent roughly $145 billion in 2005 dollars. The two-decade-old shuttle program carries a $150 billion price tag to date. And the station's costs have ballooned from an initial estimate of $8 billion to roughly $100 billion. Yet given its current budgets, NASA is likely to have only $75 billion available through 2020, when the current plan anticipates fresh human boot prints on the moon.

Dr. Griffin notes that the US is not the only spacefaring nation where political support for human space exploration ebbs and flows.

"There is nothing I can say that is in any way a guarantee," he adds. "We are going to meet our commitments and finish the space station." He says that this should serve to give international partners "some confidence in us for the long term. We want to have them with us when we take the next step. Enterprises of this magnitude must have a leader, and in this era of world history, the United States is that leader. But it needs to be an alliance. We hope that others will take the risk and go forward with us."

Mail Rates To Be Harnessed As Part Of Postal-Overhaul Bill (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Rick Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

The Postal Service generally will be barred from raising postage rates beyond the rate of inflation for the next decade under an overhaul passed by Congress.

The new law -- the first major changes to the service in more than three decades -- aims to stabilize rates for households and bulk mailers and to help the service cope with the challenges of the Internet and compete against delivery companies such as FedEx Corp. and United Parcel Service Inc.

The White House said President Bush would sign the bill.

In return for accepting new limits on rate-setting, the Postal Service was given new flexibility in the process of setting rates and will gradually be relieved of billions of dollars of employee-retirement expenses.

The changes should make the Postal Service more attractive to catalog companies and other bulk mailers, by letting them plan costs more accurately. For consumers, the changes could bring more frequent rate increases, though they would rarely be as large as some recent ones, including an average 8.5% jump proposed in May that would be the biggest price increase in 12 years if it takes effect. Under that, the cost of a first-class postage stamp is supposed to rise to 42 cents in May from the current 39 cents.

Sponsors also hope that by capping rates, they will force the Postal Service to become more efficient. The legislation also calls for plans to shrink the service's huge employee and infrastructure base.

At the same time, a financial overhaul will allow the Postal Service to erase billions of dollars of unfunded retiree health-care obligations, thanks to an earlier reduction of its obligations for pension benefits for its workers.

The Postal Service has been using those savings to pay down debt for the past couple of years. The bill also achieves some savings on employee-injury claims by requiring workers to take sick time for three days before filing for workers compensation.

In addition, postal officials will have to make many of the same disclosures as public companies, including complying with financial-reporting provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley law. A newly formed Postal Regulatory Commission will have the power to issue subpoenas and burrow much deeper into the Postal Service's operations than its current regulator.

The Postal Service has its origins in the earliest days of the country, and used to be a government agency. It was partly privatized beginning in the early 1970s, to force it toward self-sufficiency. Despite strides, much of its business model has been made obsolete by fax machines, email and Internet commerce, as well as increased competition from private carriers. The new changes aim to make it run more efficiently.

While the changes generally make the Postal Service more competitive, it isn't clear they can offset challenges such as continued declines in the volume of first-class mail. Some analysts say the Internet could help as well as hurt the Postal Service, by generating more package shipments from Web-based commerce. Meanwhile, though, the Postal Service remains responsible for providing universal mail service, and about one million new addresses are added each year.

The overhaul bill appeared to be in big trouble in recent weeks. But bulk mailers rallied to push it through after House Democrats -- led by Rep. Henry Waxman of California -- signaled that they were willing to drop their opposition to the rate cap. That led mailers to put pressure on the White House to reach a deal. The Bush administration, in turn, relented on some of its demands for big concessions on contract benefits from Postal Service employees.

"When this bill looked dead a month or two ago, it sparked a lot of people to action," said Robert E. McLean, executive director of the Mailers Council, an Arlington, Va., trade group of mailers who generate about 70% of U.S. mail volume.

The last hurdle was a concern that congressional appropriators would have to absorb about $1.8 billion over 10 years -- the cost of running the newly empowered regulatory commission and inspector general's office.

FedEx and UPS generally supported the bill, even though UPS has accused the Postal Service of using its monopoly on first-class mail deliveries to prop up its package operations. The hostility has eased now that FedEx and UPS carry mail on their planes. "We have been in favor of postal reform for a long time and anything that allows the Postal Service to make decisions more nimbly and operate more like a business," said Kristin Krause, a FedEx spokeswoman.

Muzzling Those Pesky Scientists (NYT)

The Environmental Protection Agency disclosed last week that it had revised — stood on their head is more like it — procedures it has used for 25 years to set standards for air pollutants like soot and lead. The administration said the change will streamline decision making. Perhaps it will. It will also have the further effect of decreasing the role of science in policy making while increasing the influence of the agency's political appointees.

This is disheartening, but not surprising. Whether the issue is birth control or global warming or clean air, this administration has already acquired a special place in regulatory history for the audacity with which it has manipulated or muzzled science (and in some cases individual scientists) that might discomfit its industrial allies or interfere with its political agenda.

The E.P.A. is required every five years to review scientific research and set new exposure levels for six pollutants identified as hazardous to human health. Normally, recommendations are first solicited from two groups of scientists: professional staff members inside the agency and independent outside scientists. Those recommendations are then sent to the department's senior officers — nearly all political appointees — who shape departmental policy and then send it to the White House and Office of Management and Budget for clearance.

Under the new process, initial reviews will be done by staff scientists and political appointees, who together will produce a synopsis of "policy-relevant" science — which sounds ominously like science tailored to predetermined policy outcomes. The independent scientists, meanwhile, will be frozen out until the very end, when they will be allowed to comment on proposals that will have already generated considerable momentum.

The betting among environmental groups is that these new procedures will lead to weaker air quality standards more in keeping with industry objectives — indeed, the American Petroleum Institute is already claiming credit for some of the changes. The new procedures will also help spare the agency the sort of public embarrassment it suffered in October, when its final standards for soot turned out to be far weaker than those recommended earlier (and virtually unanimously) by its staff scientists and the outside consultants.

Under the new process, when the E.P.A. considers how it will set air pollution standards, the only debate it will have is with itself.

Outsourcer In Chief (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

According to U.S. News & World Report, President Bush has told aides that he won't respond in detail to the Iraq Study Group's report because he doesn't want to "outsource" the role of commander in chief.

That's pretty ironic. You see, outsourcing of the government's responsibilities — not to panels of supposed wise men, but to private companies with the right connections — has been one of the hallmarks of his administration. And privatization through outsourcing is one reason the administration has failed on so many fronts.

For example, an article in Saturday's New York Times describes how the Coast Guard has run a $17 billion modernization program: "Instead of managing the project itself, the Coast Guard hired Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, two of the nation's largest military contractors, to plan, supervise and deliver the new vessels and helicopters."

The result? Expensive ships that aren't seaworthy. The Coast Guard ignored "repeated warnings from its own engineers that the boats and ships were poorly designed and perhaps unsafe," while "the contractors failed to fulfill their obligation to make sure the government got the best price, frequently steering work to their subsidiaries or business partners instead of competitors."

In Afghanistan, the job of training a new police force was outsourced to DynCorp International, a private contractor, under very loose supervision: when conducting a recent review, auditors couldn't even find a copy of DynCorp's contract to see what it called for. And $1.1 billion later, Afghanistan still doesn't have an effective police training program.

In July 2004, Government Executive magazine published an article titled "Outsourcing Iraq," documenting how the U.S. occupation authorities had transferred responsibility for reconstruction to private contractors, with hardly any oversight. "The only plan," it said, "appears to have been to let the private sector manage nation-building, mostly on their own." We all know how that turned out.

On the home front, the Bush administration outsourced many responsibilities of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. For example, the job of evacuating people from disaster areas was given to a trucking logistics firm, Landstar Express America. When Hurricane Katrina struck, Landstar didn't even know where to get buses. According to Carey Limousine, which was eventually hired, Landstar "found us on the Web site."

It's now clear that there's a fundamental error in the antigovernment ideology embraced by today's conservative movement. Conservatives look at the virtues of market competition and leap to the conclusion that private ownership, in itself, is some kind of magic elixir. But there's no reason to assume that a private company hired to perform a public service will do better than people employed directly by the government.

In fact, the private company will almost surely do a worse job if its political connections insulate it from accountability — which has, of course, consistently been the case under Mr. Bush. The inspectors' report on Afghanistan's police conspicuously avoided assessing DynCorp's performance; even as government auditors found fault with Landstar, the company received a plaque from the Department of Transportation honoring its hurricane relief efforts.

Underlying this lack of accountability are the real motives for turning government functions over to private companies, which have little to do with efficiency. To say the obvious: when you see a story about failed outsourcing, you can be sure that the company in question is a major contributor to the Republican Party, is run by people with strong G.O.P. connections, or both.

So what happens now? The failure of privatization under the Bush administration offers a target-rich environment to newly empowered Congressional Democrats — and I say, let the subpoenas fly. Bear in mind that we're not talking just about wasted money: contracting failures in Iraq helped us lose one war, similar failures in Afghanistan may help us lose another, and FEMA's failures helped us lose a great American city.

And maybe, just maybe, the abject failure of this administration's efforts to outsource essential functions to the private sector will diminish the antigovernment prejudice created by decades of right-wing propaganda.

That's important, because the presumption that the private sector can do no wrong and the government can do nothing right prevents us from coming to grips with some of America's biggest problems — in particular, our wildly dysfunctional health care system. More on that in future columns.

A Town Running Hot And Cold (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Washington is awash in leaks these days, giving us a rare glimpse of what really goes on behind the carefully manicured landscape of official statements.

Goodness gracious, when even Donald Rumsfeld is saying privately that the Iraq war strategy "is not working well enough or fast enough" -- and someone furnishes his memo to the New York Times -- it is clear that the administration's once-legendary discipline has broken down.

What is also clear is that the private doubts of top officials are closer to the media's dark portrait of the war than to the "absolutely, we're winning" rhetoric of President Bush. That is especially noteworthy in light of all the criticism that administration officials have heaped on correspondents in Iraq for focusing too heavily on violence and ignoring signs of progress.

The reigning assumption of reporters -- that they're not always getting the full story from government officials -- seemed vindicated by twin leaks to the Times, involving the Rumsfeld memo and a classified assessment by national security adviser Stephen Hadley that was critical of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The disclosures also underscored how a single Deep Throat, by slipping someone a piece of paper, can transform coverage of even the most important events. From the Pentagon Papers to the outing of Valerie Plame, this has been a well-trafficked route.

A similar phenomenon was at work with the Baker-Hamilton commission, where multiple sources dribbled out most of the panel's main recommendations on Iraq well before the findings were made public last Wednesday. In fact, the group headed by former secretary of state James Baker was such a sieve that by the time the members formally unveiled their report, it seemed like old news. An entire debate took place before any member of the group had made an on-the-record utterance.

The Hadley memo -- devastatingly leaked as Bush was about to meet with Maliki in Jordan -- said that "the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action." A senior administration official told reporters that the memo was merely about "building better capabilities with the Maliki government."

Bush and Vice President Cheney have excoriated news organizations, especially the Times, for publishing national security secrets, but not this time. "I guess it's easier to rally the faithful with a cry of 'national security' than with a complaint that 'this is really embarrassing,' " Times Editor Bill Keller told the New York Observer.

But White House counselor Dan Bartlett says officials are indeed upset: "I haven't seen a more egregious leak in my time in government, timed to influence a very important meeting with a head of state."

David Greenberg, a professor of journalism and history at Rutgers University, says that "you see this kind of breakdown in an administration's unitary facade when there's a lot more internal dissension. As a rule, leaking occurs when people in an administration feel there's some kind of advantage to be gained in mobilizing public pressure, and journalistic pressure, against someone else on the inside."

The Rumsfeld memo, dated the day before the midterm elections, laid out a series of options on Iraq, including "withdraw U.S. forces from vulnerable positions" and move them to an "assistance" role, based in Kuwait and some parts of Iraq.

When asked by NBC's David Gregory why the president wasn't "saying publicly what top members of this administration who were running the war were saying privately," press secretary Tony Snow said Bush had made clear that "things are not getting well enough fast enough."

Snow also accused Gregory of being "partisan" last week after a question in which the correspondent merely summarized the recommendations of the Baker group and quoted co-chairman Lee Hamilton. Snow was arguing that the report was not a rejection of the president's Iraq policy, as it was depicted by nearly all news organizations.

At the very least, the Rumsfeld memo -- which some think was leaked by allies of the soon-to-be-former Pentagon chief to burnish his image -- clashes with his dogged public defense of the war policy and repeated accusations that reporters are getting things wrong.

"While you expect internal memos to be more wide-ranging and candid, I don't think there's as big a disconnect as is being suggested," Bartlett says. "I don't think it is the role of the secretary of defense to throw out a whole range of options for the public to chew on." Journalists have "selectively quoted the president," he says, setting up a false contrast by ignoring some of Bush's more sobering comments about Iraq.

One tidbit from the Rumsfeld memo shows the importance of the PR war: He says the administration should "go minimalist" by announcing any new policy on a "trial basis" so it can readjust if necessary -- "and therefore not 'lose.' "

While many leakers do their thing for policy reasons, they may also act out of pettiness, revenge or the ego trip of manipulating the media. Since the Times offered no clues about the sources' motivation, we can only speculate. But leaks, at least those that don't truly jeopardize national security, can be an important safety valve in a system where public pronouncements are carefully calibrated to reveal almost nothing. And journalists, of course, lap them up.

If this gusher of leaks shows that the Bush team is staunchly defending policies about which it harbors severe doubts, that has probably been true of every administration. But when the issue is a long, drawn-out, bloody war in which Americans are dying every week, the contrast between public and private comments seems more dramatic.Beyond Pajamas

Roger L. Simon has 90 bloggers affiliated with his Pajamas Media site, but now he's come up with a new wrinkle: "We're actually getting them to go report stuff."

Toward that end, the playwright and screenwriter was pleased when his servers crashed a week ago -- because a hot story was attracting a big crowd. Simon's new Washington editor, conservative journalist Richard Miniter, obtained a police report charging that six imams who had been removed from a US Airways flight in Minneapolis had been acting suspiciously.

"They were coming to us because we broke stories, not because someone said 'I don't like Don Rumsfeld,' " says Simon, who has written movies for the likes of Woody Allen, Ron Silver and Anjelica Huston. "The challenge for us is to fact-check. We're learning how to do this by the seat of our pants. I'm scared a lot of the time. . . . If you put something on a blog that's inaccurate, you will hear back in five minutes. No institution could afford that kind of fact-checking."

This thing called "reporting" could be the new cyberflavor of the month. The liberal Huffington Post also plans to get into original reporting and has hired Melinda Henneberger, formerly of Newsweek and the New York Times, as political editor. Josh Marshall, who runs the liberal Talking Points Memo, has hired two reporters for his TPM Muckraker spinoff.

The year-old Pajamas Media, which compensates its bloggers by placing ads on their Web sites, has leaned heavily to the right. Its stars include Fox News commentator Michelle Malkin and Instapundit's Glenn Reynolds, along with a few liberals such as the Nation's David Corn. But Simon, who describes himself as conservative on foreign affairs but socially liberal, says he plans more balance on the site.

His most "idiotic" move? Briefly changing the name from Pajamas to Open Source Media on grounds that the image of bloggers in their PJs was insufficiently serious.

Switching Sides

Less than four weeks ago, Joseph Cannon was chairman of the Utah Republican Party. On Friday, he was named editor of the Deseret Morning News.

How could this be? Well, it didn't hurt that Cannon's grandfather and great-grandfather had edited the Salt Lake City paper, which is owned by the Mormon Church. But doesn't the naming of Cannon, a former Reagan administration official and Republican Senate candidate, make the paper look like a subsidiary of the GOP? Cannon told the Salt Lake Tribune that he would initially avoid handling local political stories and is "pretty comfortable being nonpartisan."

Only Fairness Will Assuage The Anxious Middle (FT)

By Lawrence Summers

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

A recent meeting with the incoming freshmen of the 110th House of Representatives made clear to me some of the forces that will shape American economic policy in the next few years. Coming from very different parts of the country and very different political perspectives, the new members of Congress have in common that they have all heard from the anxious middle class. They feel under enormous pressure to respond not just to the economic insecurity that middle-class voters feel, but also to voters' resentment at what they see as disproportionately prospering corporate elites. If the new Congress sees itself as having a mandate for anything in the economic area, it is for policies that "stand up" for ordinary Americans against the threat they perceive from corporate and moneyed interests.

These populist impulses have roots much deeper than campaign rhetoric. In the past, real wages and corporate profitability have moved together – increasing during economic expansions and when the US became more competitive, declining in recessions and when it encountered significant competitive threats. The unique feature of the current expansion is the divergence between the fortunes of capital and the fortunes of labour. While workers normally receive about three-quarters of corporate income, with the remainder going to profits and interest, the Economic Policy Institute has calculated that, since 2001, labour has received only about one-quarter of the increase in corporate income, as real wages have failed to keep pace with productivity growth.

Indeed, for most groups of workers, wages have not kept pace with inflation over the past several years. College graduates have been particularly hard hit, with their wages struggling to keep pace with inflation over the past five years. At the same time, profits per share for companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 index have increased at an annual rate of more than 10 per cent, even after taking into account inflation over the past four years.

This is not a trend that can be blamed on companies' earning more abroad: the US national income accounts, which include only profits earned at home, reveal that corporate profits as a share of gross domestic product are at their highest level in two generations and still rising.

With this kind of cleavage between the economic fortunes of companies and their workers, it should not be surprising that ordinary American families do not feel they are in the same boat as US corporations and their chief executives. Charles Wilson, Eisenhower's defence secretary, famously observed: "What's good for the country is good for General Motors and vice versa." Today, an increasing fraction of Americans see corporate leaders as part of Davos's team rather than America's.

These economic and political trends are and should be of great concern to the business community as well as to policymakers. They have led to populist policy proposals that cut against the grain of the market system by, for example, limiting free trade agreements, restricting outsourcing or limiting the ability of successful companies to expand.

The track record of such populist proposals is dismal. They rarely achieve their objectives and come with huge collateral costs. Policymakers forget at their peril that it is globalisation that has enabled the US economy to enjoy the favourable combination of low unemployment and low inflation of recent years – and that without open markets, product prices would be rising much faster, further attenuating living standards for middle-class families.

Yet it would not be a sufficient response for business or government simply to explain why populist policies would be counterproductive and to suggest – to borrow a term from a different debate – a "stay the course" strategy, perhaps with increased attention to the displaced. If the anxious middle's concerns about fairness are this serious when the unemployment rate is 4.4 per cent, they will be far greater whenever the economy next turns down.

This puts a premium on finding measures that go with the grain of the market system while also responding to concerns about fairness. The place to start is by restoring the progressivity of the tax system – an area where much can be accomplished before considering changes to the rate structure.

It is neither fair nor efficient to audit disproportionately the tax returns of those in the bottom half of the income distribution at a time when most of the $500bn tax gap comes from those with high incomes. There is no policy justification for allowing the erosion of corporate income tax through pervasive use of corporate tax shelters and manipulation of transfer price rules. Not only does this cost the government revenue, it also puts undue competitive pressure on companies that want to meet obligations to their workers.

Much more can done in a range of areas, from disclosure of executive compensation, to ensuring that the government leverages the volume of its purchases, to making financing of education at every level more equitable, to making sure that businesses continue to take responsibility for their workers' healthcare costs.

When, as now, concerns become sufficiently serious, those with bad ideas always win out over those with no ideas.

John Kennedy famously challenged Americans: "Ask not what your country can do for you. Ask what you can do for your country." In the years ahead, this question will be put with increasing force to US corporations. A great deal depends on the vigour with which it is answered.

Calming An Anxious Middle Class (LAT)

By Lawrence H. Summers, Lawrence H. Summers Is A Contributing Editor To Opinion.

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

The incoming Congress will need to pursue policies that promote more economic fairness without hindering globalization.

A RECENT MEETING with the incoming freshmen of the 110th House of Representatives made clear to me some of the forces that will shape American economic policy in the next few years. Coming from very different parts of the country and very different political perspectives, each of the new members of Congress has one thing in common: They have all heard from an anxious middle class.

With this kind of cleavage between the economic fortunes of companies and their workers, it should not be surprising that ordinary American families do not feel like they are in the same boat as corporations and their chief executives, or even able to benefit from the same rising tides.

These economic and political trends should be of great concern to the business community as well as to policymakers in Washington. They will continue to lead to any number of populist proposals that cut against the grain of the market system, such as limiting free-trade agreements, restricting outsourcing or blocking the ability of successful companies to expand.

But the track record of populist economic policies has been dismal — they rarely achieve their objectives but incur huge collateral costs. Policymakers forget at their peril that globalization has enabled the U.S. economy to enjoy the very favorable combination of low unemployment and low inflation, and that without open markets, product prices would be rising much faster than they are, making living standards even worse for middle-class families.

If the anxious middle's concerns about fairness are this serious when the unemployment rate is 4.4%, they will be far greater whenever the economy next turns down.

This puts a premium on finding policies that complement the market system while responding to fairness concerns. The place to start is by restoring the progressivity of the tax system — where much can be accomplished without changing the rate structure.

US Economy Chugs Ahead Despite Auto And Housing Slumps (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

It's a spunky economy.

Evidence is accumulating that America is weathering the downturns in the housing and auto markets.

The economy does have a little wobble, and some economists believe the US is entering a period of subpar growth. But as a whole, it appears to be avoiding dire predictions of a sharp rise in unemployment and a loss of business confidence. In fact, when the Federal Reserve meets Tuesday, the central bankers - who aren't expected to change interest rates - are more likely to be talking about the economy's resilience than any future recession.

One sign of the life left in the economy came Friday when the Labor Department reported the creation of 132,000 new jobs in November. It also revised upward - by 42,000 jobs - its reports for September and October. The last major economic report of 2006 also showed a small uptick in the jobless rate, from 4.4 to 4.5 percent.

"The employment numbers show the economy is sturdy," says Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com. "The problems in housing and autos have not infected the economy."

The economy's resilience has been a theme of several years' standing - one that predates the 9/11 attacks. The US output of goods and services has survived the damage of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, a run-up in oil prices, and the bursting of the high-tech balloon in early 2001.

One reason for its capacity to take hits is its growing diversity. Indeed, last month's new jobs came in health and financial services, travel, government hiring, and professional services - all helping to offset a struggling manufacturing sector. Even in manufacturing, the picture is not as bleak as it could be, in part because vigorous economies abroad are buying American-made goods.

"It takes a lot to get the economy down," says Ethan Harris, chief economist at Lehman Brothers in New York. "It does have some natural resilience in the face of shocks."

The most recent shock, of course, is the downturn in the US housing market. Last month, the economy shed some 29,000 construction jobs, as builders either completed projects or abandoned them. It was the third consecutive decline in housing-related jobs.

Mr. Zandi expects the housing crunch to continue for another three to six months because housing starts are still falling. "But housing will be less of a drag into the spring and summer," he predicts.

The automotive sector is also acting as a brake on the economy. November saw the loss of 15,000 manufacturing jobs, most of them related to the auto industry. But the industry is no longer the powerful force on the economy it once was. The auto sector is about 10 percent of manufacturing, and manufacturing is about 12 percent of the nation's gross domestic product, estimates David Huether, chief economist for the National Association of Manufacturers. "My forecast is no growth in the auto business for the next couple of years," he says.

But as Friday's report showed, the economy is also busy creating new jobs.

"The demand for executives and managers is very strong," reports John Challenger of the Chicago outplacement firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas. "A significant number of companies are going out to find the top talent and not waiting for it to come to them."

In fact, the Fed, which has been worried about the inflationary effects of a tight labor market, is likely to remain worried, says former Fed economist Ann Owen, now a professor at Hamilton College in Clinton, N.Y. "This strong employment report validates what they have been saying," she says.

In November, wages rose by 0.2 percent, not as much as the 0.4 percent increase in October. On a year-over-year basis, wages are growing at a 4.1 percent rate, or relatively close to the increase in productivity.

"This employment report does not scream high inflation, but I think it's indicating consistent inflationary pressures," says Ms. Owen. "But there is not enough indication of inflation to have them increase interest rates."

Though the economy continued to create jobs, some economic reports last week painted a less rosy picture. In November, the Institute for Supply Management's manufacturing index fell below the level that indicates a growing economy. But its gauge of the nonmanufacturing sector rose to its highest level since May.

There was also mixed news about consumers. Consumer confidence waned in early December, according to a University of Michigan report. But other reports indicate that holiday sales are solid. The government will report this week on November retail sales and consumer prices.

"This holiday period is an important test for the economy," says Lehman Brothers' Mr. Harris. "When you step back and look at how the consumer is doing, you see a solid job market, lower gasoline prices, which help low-income people, and a strong stock market, which is good for the upper income. The only dark cloud is housing."

Slumping consumer confidence may be tied to noneconomic factors, such as the situation in Iraq, says Mr. Huether. Consumer confidence tumbled in advance of the Iraq war and then soared after major combat operations appeared to be over, he recalls. "People were concerned there would be a larger regional war," he says, "and once the uncertainty was squashed, confidence rebounded."

Investors' Hopes For Interest Rates Ignore Fed Stance (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Investors are widely expecting an investor-friendly announcement from the Federal Reserve interest-rate meeting tomorrow.

The Fed is expected to leave target interest rates unchanged, fueling hopes that it will start cutting rates some time next year, which would be good news for stocks and bonds.

But worries are spreading that, longer-term, investor hopes for interest rates may have gotten a little out of hand. If so, stocks and bonds both could be in for some rough waters in the coming months.

"The stock market has come a long way quickly," with the Dow Jones Industrial Average up more than 14% since July 14, notes Marc Stern, chief investment officer at Bessemer Investment Management in New York. "Investor expectations may have gone a bit farther than they should have."

To prepare for the rough patch he fears may lie ahead, Mr. Stern has cashed in about 7% of his clients' funds, and is holding the money in short-term Treasury bills, just in case the stock market pulls back.

A big part of the underlying problem is that financial markets and Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke seem to be at odds about the longer-term interest-rate outlook. Mr. Bernanke has been remarkably open about his plans for interest rates, and he isn't talking about the kinds of rate cuts that many investors are banking on.

Fed interest-rate policy is one of the main determinants of both stock and bond prices. A cut in Fed rates tends to push down other market rates, including bond yields. And lower market rates are good news for stocks, because they make it less costly for companies to do business and for consumers to buy products.

Right now, investors are betting on lower rates in the months to come, and that is one reason that stocks have done so well since the summer. The strong payroll data that came in on Friday made futures traders pull in their horns a little. They were betting the Fed might start cutting rates at its March meeting. Now they are thinking it might wait until its following meeting, in May.

By June, futures trading indicates, the market thinks the Fed will have cut rates at least once, maybe twice. Traders are betting that the cuts will continue as the year wears on.

Trouble is, that isn't what Mr. Bernanke has been suggesting. He said in a speech two weeks ago that the question facing the Fed isn't whether to cut rates, it is whether to raise them to fight inflation. "Core" inflation, not counting volatile food and energy prices, still is higher than the 2% a year that the Fed has said it is willing to tolerate.

If inflation keeps moderating over the next few months and pulls back toward the 2% level, all well and good. But if inflation proves sticky, and stops pulling back, the Fed could be forced to cool it off by raising rates further. That is the message Mr. Bernanke is trying to send, and it is a message that the markets are having trouble receiving.

"Inflation is the key here," says Ethan Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Brothers. "Inflation is the enemy of all markets. If you get serious inflation, if the Fed's fears materialize, then you will have the Fed hiking instead of cutting, pushing growth weaker. That is a lousy environment for both" the stock and bond markets.

Mr. Harris isn't forecasting a resurgence in inflation. He thinks it could remain more or less steady.

But, like the Fed, he doesn't think that is a sure thing, and he thinks investors could be making a mistake to assume that inflation is dying. Energy prices, for example, seemed a month ago to be pulling back from a peak. But lately, oil futures have pushed back above $60 a barrel. Commodity prices in general could prove more resilient than more-bullish investors expect, Mr. Harris worries.

If so, inflation could prove harder to vanquish than markets are assuming, requiring higher rates.

Beyond about three months, futures markets aren't very good predictors of future interest-rate policy, says Jim Bianco of Bianco Research in Chicago. They have 97% or 98% accuracy a day before a Fed decision, and 70% accuracy six weeks ahead. More than three months ahead, accuracy is no better than 50-50, he says. Like Mr. Stern and Mr. Harris, Mr. Bianco thinks the Fed may prove slower to cut rates than many investors expect.

None of this means that the Fed is fated to raise rates, or that it won't start cutting them at some point next year. But it could mean that market hopes for a cut in the first half of the year could be dashed. And that, at some point, could send stocks lower.

That concern is part of the reason that Mr. Stern, of Bessemer, decided to sell some of his clients' more volatile, pricier stocks and other investments and build up his cash reserve.

"Investors have bid up various assets to levels that appear to be unsustainable," Mr. Stern says. He says that the stocks of big multinational companies in general are still reasonably priced. But some smaller stocks, stocks in developing countries, some riskier bonds, some more speculative commodities and some real-estate investments "seem to be too highly priced," he says.

"We are increasingly priced for very good news and any disappointment could lead to some short-term pressures. Come spring of '07, investors could be getting antsy, saying, 'Where is the rate cut we had been counting on?' " he says.

One irony, Mr. Bianco says, is that when Mr. Bernanke was nominated to lead the Fed around a year ago, critics worried that he would be soft on inflation. They nicknamed him "Helicopter Ben," because of a reference he made to an economic theory that called, figuratively, for dumping money into the economy from helicopters to prevent a depression.

Now, Mr. Bianco notes, "the guy that is holding the Fed back from easing is Helicopter Ben. We got him all wrong, at least for his first 10 months" in office.

Future Bright For Ex-members Of Congress (AP)

By Darlene Superville

AP, December 11, 2006

They lost their House and Senate seats, in some cases after keeping them warm for three decades. Others up and left on their own. But do not feel too sorry for some of these soon-to-be former lawmakers.

The future is bright for ex-members of Congress. No welfare cheese for them and little if any time among the ranks of the unemployed.

Some already have settled on new careers. Or old ones, as the case may be.

"I'll probably go home and drive a truck for a couple of weeks to get centered again," Rep. Mike Sodrel, R-Ind., a 60-year-old freshman who was defeated, said in an interview.

During the campaign that got him elected in 2004, Sodrel, a millionaire who owns three trucking and bus companies, cruised around southeastern Indiana in his own 18-wheeler.

Last month, he lost to Baron Hill, the Democratic congressman he beat two years ago.

Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, the House Science Committee chairman, is joining the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington. The longest-serving New York Republican in Congress, Boehlert quit after 24 years.

Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, sent packing after 30 years, is sifting through offers from prestigious East Coast universities — Georgetown, Harvard and Princeton among them — as well as schools in his Midwestern home state.

Defeated GOP Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio is talking to universities about teaching and law firms about legal work as he prepares to re-enter private life for the first time in 30 years.

Some departing lawmakers insist they will go back home when they are sitting congressmen no more, after their successors are sworn in Jan. 4. This, despite the lucrative lure of joining the influence industry in the capital as a lobbyist or consultant.

"This has been a nasty and brutish place for some time," said Norman Ornstein, a congressional analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. "I think for many people, they're tired of it, even if they've been a part of it, and they'd like to get at least a breather away from it."

Lawmakers are more inclined to leave families home these days and sink fewer roots here than in the past. Beyond that, most of the departing members are Republican, and job prospects in the capital may be less-than-stellar, with Democrats taking control of both houses of the new Congress.

"The ability of Republicans to make money in the short run is less than it is for Democrats right now," said L. Sandy Maisel, director of the Goldfarb Center for Public Affairs at Colby College in Waterville, Maine. "I don't think the doors are as wide open."

Few ex-lawmakers go begging in the capital. Those who become lobbyists cannot approach their former colleagues for a year, under current rules, or two years if a Democratic proposal takes effect, but can lobby the administration right away.

Another option is to relax.

"Congress provides handsome retirements for itself," said former Rep. Bill Frenzel, R-Minn., who joined the Brookings Institution think tank after retiring in 1991. "So if you've been in Congress as some of these folks have been, 20, 25 years, it isn't necessary for them to find gainful employment."

That is what Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., has decided to do, after 32 years of service.

At age 82, with failing ears and back and other problems that make getting around difficult, Hyde said he would fully retire — not even write his memoirs.

Sen. Conrad Burns, denied a fourth term, said he will return to Montana to work on behalf of farmers, lawsuit reform and lower taxes — and on something closer to home.

"I'm to the age where I'd like to enjoy my granddaughter," said Burns, 71.

Sen. Bill Frist, the surgeon-turned-senator, is going back to Tennessee, having ruled out a run for the presidency, and said that for the near future, he will join missions overseas once more, as a doctor ministering to the poor.

"I'm going to live in the very same house that I was born in 54 years ago," he said in a Senate farewell speech.

Obama Takes First Steps In N.H. (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H., Dec. 10 -- The political phenomenon known as Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) descended Sunday on the state with the nation's first presidential primary, drawing enthusiastic crowds and trailed by a huge media horde as he continued to stoke interest in a possible bid for the White House in 2008.

It was standing-room-only at a book signing Sunday morning in the seacoast town of Portsmouth, where the 750 available tickets were snapped up within hours of being made available to the public early last week. Here in Manchester, 1,500 people paid $25 apiece to hear him speak at a celebration of the New Hampshire Democratic Party's historic victories in last month's midterm elections.

To the question everyone wanted answered -- Is he going to run? -- Obama was noncommittal. "I haven't made that determination. I'm still running things through the traps," he said. He added, "I want to take my time on it, not only to make sure the politics makes sense but that I feel I have something unique to offer that would help move the country forward."

But he closed his speech here early Sunday night with words that seemed to signal growing interest in a campaign. "America is ready to turn the page," he said. "America is ready for a new set of challenges. This is our time. A new generation is prepared to lead."

Aides said a final decision will come in January, while in the meantime the Obama team continues to prepare the machinery for a campaign if the senator concludes that the time is right. Pronouncing himself "suspicious of hype," Obama said he would not be driven into the race "simply because of the opportunity but because I think I will serve the country well by that."

For those who came to see Obama, comparisons with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who leads the early national polls testing possible candidates for the Democratic nomination, were inevitable.

Clinton has been making calls into New Hampshire for the past week in anticipation of a possible 2008 campaign, but is not expected to appear in the state until next year. A number of Democrats who came to hear Obama said that, as much as they admire Clinton, they think she cannot win and see the senator from Illinois as a potentially attractive alternative.

All through the day, veterans of New Hampshire politics marveled at the swelling interest in a possible candidacy by a first-term African American senator who has had a book atop the New York Times bestseller list for the past month but who still has produced little in terms of a record as a national politician.

"In all my history, nobody's ever had a crowd this big, this early," said Charles Campion, a veteran party strategist based in Boston, as he watched Democrats assemble Sunday afternoon in Manchester.

This being New Hampshire, where citizens wait to see a candidate several times before declaring their allegiance, curiosity as much as real support attracted many of the people who came to see Obama. They wanted to know more who Obama is, what he believes and whether after two years in the Senate he is ready to be president.

"I need to know a little bit more about him, his stance on some serious issues," said Marilyn Johnson of Kittery, Maine, who was in the front row in Portsmouth. She worried that he is too inexperienced to be president, saying, "I think it would be a mistake for him to run in 2008."

Others were already ready to commit to an Obama candidacy. "He had the true spirit we're looking for," said Kathryn Frieden, a physician from Manchester. "I do hope he runs. I haven't been so excited by someone since JFK, when he was campaigning when I was 10 years old."

Obama's day in New Hampshire was remarkable as much for the scene and speculation he generated than for anything specific he had to say. Wearing a black jacket, gray slacks and an open-collar white shirt, Obama delivered low-key remarks, speaking personally about his background and the origins of his belief in a more hopeful politics, as well as giving general views on issues such as energy, health care and Iraq.

He promised a new politics, to replace the "24-hour, slash-and-burn, negative-ad bickering, small-minded politics that doesn't move us forward."

Asked what he believes is different about his politics than those of other candidates, he said, "I think what's worked for me has been the capacity to stay true to a set of progressive values but to be eclectic in terms of the tools to achieve those progressive values. To not be orthodox. To be willing to get good ideas from all quarters."

As for the question of his readiness, Obama hinted he would have more to say about that if he enters the race, but he told reporters: "If I decide to run, at the end of the process, people will know me pretty well and they'll have a pretty good sense of whether I'm qualified to run."

The media contingent was estimated by organizers at 125 to 150 people. Obama's news conference attracted the kind of attention normally reserved for a winner of the New Hampshire primary, not a relative novice who has not even declared for president.

His presidential planning has not quite caught up with the hype and speculation that now follows him wherever he goes. Nor does he appear to be as far along as Clinton or a number of other Democrats, who have been tramping through this and other states for more than a year.

Obama has been meeting regularly with a small team of advisers and with his wife, Michelle, since last month's midterm elections. They have been assembling information about the cost of running in 2008, Obama's fundraising potential, overall strategy, the primary and caucus calendar, and the strength of the competition.

They also have been trying to identify potential staff at a time when Clinton and other Democratic candidates are moving to lock up the most experienced fundraisers, strategists, organizers, advance people and communications experts.

Obama's core team of advisers includes Chicago-based media consultant David Axelrod, Senate chief of staff Pete Rouse, communications director Robert Gibbs, strategist David Plouffe and pollster Paul Harstad. He has also recruited Steve Hildebrand, who ran the Iowa caucuses for former vice president Al Gore in 2000.

Family issues remain a potentially significant obstacle to Obama. He arrived in New Hampshire close to midnight Saturday because he was attending a ballet recital for one of his two young daughters, and the demands of a presidential campaign would keep him away from his family for much of the next two years.

Asked whether his wife is enthusiastic or resistant to a presidential campaign, he said he would keep private discussions private, but added, "She is the smartest, toughest, funniest best friend that I could ever hope for, and she's always had my back. Whatever decision we make, we'll make together."

New Hampshire Democrats had much to celebrate with Obama after their most successful election in a century. Last month, voters in the state tossed out two House incumbents, reelected Gov. John Lynch (D) with 74 percent of the vote, gave Democrats a majority on the powerful Executive Council and turned over control of the state legislature to Democrats for the first time since 1874.

But many in the crowds Sunday were there primarily to take the measure of Obama. Jeff Hughes, who came to Portsmouth with his wife, Barbara, best captured the moment as he summed up the opportunity and the risk for Obama as he weighs whether to run.

"Right now it's his opportunity, his time," Hughes said. "We'll see what he does with it."

Obama Draws Crowds As He Tours New Hampshire (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama surveyed the 160 journalists and 22 TV camera crews documenting his first visit Sunday to the state that holds the first presidential primary. "I am suspicious of hype," he said.

The half-Kansan, half-Kenyan author and politician, who electrified the 2004 Democratic convention with his keynote speech, says it is "a little surprising" to him and "completely baffling" to his wife that his 15 minutes of fame have extended well beyond 15 minutes.

But there's no doubt they have.

The large crowds and pop-star response Obama drew here underscored the new reality for Democrats seeking their party's nomination: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is no longer alone at the top.

"Clearly, the dynamic has changed. You have a top tier of two," says Iowa activist Bonnie Campbell, a former state attorney general and party chairwoman who is a Clinton fan but calls Obama "impressive."

Obama, 45, has roiled the field since he said seven weeks ago that he is weighing a run for president. He assumed the No. 2 spot among Democratic prospects in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll last month, with 19% to 31% for Clinton. His latest book, The Audacity of Hope, is the No. 2 seller on Amazon.com.

"I'm still running things through the traps," Obama said Sunday when asked if he'll take the leap.

There are many signs pointing to yes. One was the trip to New Hampshire. Obama has also been contacting labor leaders and congressmen in Iowa, which holds the first caucuses. His advisers have been informally seeking recommendations for key senior positions in a national campaign.

For months, Clinton was the runaway leader of the field in national polls. As Obama surged, her normally tight-lipped aides started confirming a series of people in line to be campaign manager, communications director and the like in a Clinton presidential campaign.

"This is the Barack Obama moment. You can't allow him to dominate the news cycle. So you're getting a much more open, talkative — for them — operation," said Doug Muzzio, a political scientist at Baruch College in New York City.

Howard Wolfson, a Clinton adviser, said Obama has had no impact on Clinton's plans or process. Asked whether Clinton would visit New Hampshire, Wolfson said, "There are no trips planned."

New Hampshire Democrats last month won majorities in the state House and Senate, ousted the state's two Republican congressmen, and helped re-elect a governor. Other Democratic presidential prospects, such as Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, helped achieve those victories here by donating time, money, advice and — in Bayh's case — 15 trained, funded campaign aides.

Bayh was in New Hampshire last weekend, too, on his seventh trip since July 2005. His events were the traditional kind — small and intimate — in a state where people expect to personally meet and question candidates. If Obama runs, he plans to do the same.

But first, the celebrity whirlwind tour. In Portsmouth, a small bookstore gave out 750 free tickets to a talk in one day. In Manchester, the state party sold 1,500 tickets to a victory party and could have sold scores more, party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan said.

Obama offered both groups a personal, soothing style and pleas for civility, common sense and boldness in politics. He "confessed" to stealing his book's name from his pastor, because he loved it "as a personal motto" and also because it described "an essential part of the American character." In the face of big problems, Obama said, "what's hard, what's risky, what's truly audacious, is to hope."

In a preview of a possible campaign message, he said challenges such as energy independence, terrorism, Iraq and health care coverage for all can be overcome but will "require us to renew, reinvigorate that sense of possibility that we sometimes lose."

Obama's race and résumé— he has served eight years in the Illinois Senate and two years in the U.S. Senate — came up repeatedly Sunday. In Portsmouth, he described a tour of southern Illinois during his 2004 Senate campaign: "It's the South. It's closer to Little Rock and Memphis than it is to Chicago." Even in Cairo, site of "some of the worst racial violence in the nation" in the late 1960s and early 1970s, he was greeted by a supportive mixed-race crowd of 300.

Later, Obama said minority candidates "confront a higher threshold" in overcoming stereotypes. Once voters get to know you, he said, "people will judge you on the merits."

Obama said some people would never vote for a black candidate, but they probably wouldn't vote for him anyway because of his politics. He also said he is not worried about his middle name, Hussein, because he's already managed to overcome "Barack Obama."

On the question of experience, Obama said he'd prove his mettle by answering tough questions. "If I decide to run, at the end of the process, people will know me pretty well," he said.

Bruce Buchanan, a presidential expert at the University of Texas, says experience does not necessarily correlate with success. James Buchanan had "a résumé to knock your socks off," but let the South secede and the nation slide toward civil war, the scholar said, while Abraham Lincoln was "one of the most inexperienced people ever to become president."

Jeff Bolster of Portsmouth, a historian at the University of New Hampshire, called Obama "a colossal rookie" but said people like the way he talks about "what is honorable and noble about our country." Newly elected state Sen. Deb Reynolds of Plymouth called Obama inspiring and visionary. Then she added, "At this point I'm evaluating everybody."

Obama Extends 15 Minutes Of Fame In N.H. (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, December 10, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Sen. Barack Obama sparked an early frenzy Sunday during his initial visit to the nation's first presidential primary state, but said he still hasn't decided whether to run and questioned whether all the hype was just part of his "15 minutes of fame."

The Illinois senator said he is still "running things through the traps" as he considers whether to join a field of Democrats that's expected to include front-runner Sen. Hillary Clinton and several other more experienced political hands.

"This is an office you can't run for just on the basis of ambition," Obama told reporters at a news conference between packed events. "You have to feel deep in your gut that you have a vision for the country that is sufficiently important that it needs to be out there."

At every turn in New Hampshire, Obama got encouragement to enter the race. Gov. John Lynch joked that the Rolling Stones were originally the headliners at a state party fundraiser where the $25 tickets quickly sold out. "But we canceled them when we realized Senator Obama would sell more tickets," Lynch said.

He drew 1,500 Democrats to a the fundraiser and several hundred more at a book signing in Portsmouth. Organizers of both events had to turn away many others who wanted to get in. The media contingent was so large it crowded into a Portsmouth coffee shop with the senator and knocked into tables and chairs as he tried to shake hands with the customers.

History teacher and Democrat Mark Bingham of Alton, N.H., met Obama and said that despite his inexperience, he could rank among presidents named Lincoln and Kennedy. "It's good to see politics going in another direction," Bingham told the senator.

Obama said he thinks the excitement reflects voters' desire for a new, positive direction in politics that is not about him as an individual.

"I am suspicious of hype," Obama told reporters. "The fact that my 15 minutes of fame has extended a little longer than 15 minutes is somewhat surprising to me and completely baffling to my wife."

Obama's appearance before the state party was to celebrate last month's election, where Lynch won by a record margin and the party took control of both houses of the legislature and New Hampshire's two U.S. House seats. As he took the stage, supporters handed Obama a petition signed by 12,000 people encouraging him to run, said Todd Webster, who started the RunObama.com Web site.

"I think to some degree I've become a shorthand or a symbol or a stand-in for now of a spirit that the last election in New Hampshire represents," Obama said. "It's a spirit that says we are looking for different. We want something new."

Obama's newness could be one of his biggest liabilities -- he's served just two years in the Senate after seven years in the Illinois Legislature. But Obama tried to turn his inexperience into an asset compared with other candidates who have been governing for much longer, although he didn't mention any rivals by name.

Clinton has not yet begun campaigning in New Hampshire, but she did host a dinner at her Washington home Sunday night for Terry Schumacher, a prominent New Hampshire Democrat who worked on Bill Clinton's 1992 and 1996 presidential campaigns. Sen. Clinton has made several calls this week to Democratic activists in New Hampshire and around the country, sounding out her presidential prospects.

Several other potential candidates have been making trips to New Hampshire for the last year and a half. Among the most frequent visitors is Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, who filled a small room at a Manchester conference center Friday night but wasn't near the draw as Obama on his first trip. Anticipating the inevitable comparison to their visits on the same weekend, Bayh's aides joked that 1,000 more people were in an overflow room.

Bayh said he wasn't intimidated by the Obama mania as he talked to voters one-on-one. "I'm doing the things that matter in New Hampshire," Bayh said.

Because of their pivotal role, New Hampshire voters are accustomed to individual attention from presidential candidates. Obama tried to accommodate them despite the large turnout, staying for over an hour after his speech ended to sign a book for every person who wanted one. He also chartered an $11,000 flight to Chicago late Sunday night so he could greet attendees after his speech without having to worry about catching a plane.

State party officials said 150 members of the media signed up to cover Obama's speech, representing news organizations as far off as Australia and Japan. He answered questions about how his young children, his inexperience, his race and even whether his troublesome middle name -- "Hussein" -- could affect his candidacy.

He said his family is a major concern because his daughters are 8 and 5 years old. He said questions about his inexperience are valid. He said Americans are not concerned with middle names, but that all women and minority candidates have to overcome stereotypes so people will judge them on their merits.

"Are some voters not going to vote for me because I'm African-American? Those are the same voters who probably wouldn't vote for me because of my politics," he said.

Obama's advisers said he would consider his choice over the holidays, after his annual Christmas trip to his native Hawaii to visit his grandmother.

Obama, Visiting New Hampshire, Offers Flavor Of A Campaign That Might Be (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H., Dec. 10 — Senator Barack Obama came to New Hampshire for the first time in his life on Sunday, selling a message of hope while proclaiming himself wary of the wave of hype that surrounded his visit.

His visit gave Democrats in two sold-out halls a chance to inspect the man who has emerged as their party's strongest alternative to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton as a presidential contender.

"It is flattering to get a lot of attention, although I must say it is baffling," Mr. Obama said here late Sunday afternoon.

"I think to some degree I've become a shorthand or symbol or stand-in for a spirit that the last election in New Hampshire represented," he said, referring to the losses of two incumbent congressmen here in November. "It's a spirit that says we are looking for something different — we want something new."

What New Hampshire saw was a first-term senator from Illinois who offered a strong condemnation of the way politics have been conducted in Washington and who positioned himself as someone who could strongly appeal to the more liberal Democrats who tend to dominate primaries. In two speeches and a news conference, Mr. Obama called for universal health care — the issue with which Mrs. Clinton, the New York Democrat, was once closely identified — a battle on global warming and a timed redeployment of troops from Iraq.

But most of all, Mr. Obama — tieless and grinning broadly as he encountered the kind of reception typically afforded a movie star — talked about what he decried as a toxically partisan atmosphere in Washington, clearly signaling a central theme of a presidential campaign by this newcomer to the national political stage.

"We've come to be consumed by a 24-hour, slash-and-burn, negative ad, bickering, small-minded politics that doesn't move us forward," he said in Portsmouth, emphasizing that both parties were at fault. "Sometimes one side is up and the other side is down. But there's no sense that they are coming together in a common-sense, practical, nonideological way to solve the problems that we face."

Mr. Obama, 45, said he had not decided if he would actually run for president, saying he was running it "through the traps." But his appearance here — two years before the 2008 presidential election, in the state with the nation's first primary — was nothing short of a spectacle.

His two public events — a book signing in Portsmouth and a victory rally for the New Hampshire Democratic Party here — sold out days ago. A total of 2,500 people turned out to see him, including 1,500 who paid $25 each to attend the rally.

"We originally scheduled the Rolling Stones, but we canceled them when we figured out that Senator Obama would sell more tickets," Gov. John Lynch said.

In Portsmouth, he walked into the room to an explosion of camera flashes and a prolonged standing ovation. After his speech, hundreds of people waited more than an hour for Mr. Obama to sign a copy of his latest book, "The Audacity of Hope." And 150 members of the news media received credentials to cover his visit, as Mr. Obama realized when he loped before a wall of reporters and cameras for a news conference.

"Hey everybody, my name is Barack Obama," he said. "And it must be a slow news day."

Turning serious, he said: "I will say this: I am suspicious of hype. The fact that I've become, that my 15 minutes of fame has extended a little longer than 15 minutes, is somewhat surprising to me."

Mr. Obama said he believed he had become a symbol of the voters' desire for new faces and a new tone in Washington. "Whether it's me or someone else, what is most important — and over the long-term most newsworthy — is that desire on the part of the voters."

Whatever the reason, Democrats long acquainted with New Hampshire politics were stunned to walk into a ballroom at the Center of New Hampshire here and see signs proclaiming the event sold out. "I've never seen anything like this before this early," said Mike Ballantine, a computer programmer from Nashua, as across the room Mr. Obama was surrounded by more than 100 people, many holding up his book and hoping for an autograph. "I mean it's amazing. Really amazing."

And the reality of Mr. Obama — as opposed to what people had read or seen in weeks of extraordinarily favorable coverage — struck a chord with some. "I was very impressed with the fact that he wants to bring people together," said Betsy Shultis, a former state representative. "I was very taken with him."

Elizabeth Fairchild, 37, of Rye, N.H., said: "I thought he was fantastic. He exceeded my expectations."

But other Democrats said they thought that someone with Mr. Obama's experience had little chance of winning a national election.

"I've looked through his book, and he barely touches issues," said Robert Padian, 59, an unemployed database administrator. "I think he's a serious candidate, but I don't think he has great potential. No track record, and there are too many guys ahead of him in line."

Mr. Obama told reporters that he expected questions about his experience and qualifications. If he did run, he said, "at the end of the process people will know me pretty well, and they'll have a pretty good sense of whether I am qualified or not."

Crowds Adore Obama (LAT)

By Terry McDermott, Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Illinois freshman Sen. Barack Obama, borne aloft by a popularity bubble that seems to float higher by the day, did nothing to deflate it Sunday on his first trip to New Hampshire.

Neither did he move any closer to a declaration of candidacy for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, for which the New Hampshire primary will be a key early test. In appearances here and in Portsmouth, he was content to play with the notion and tease the expectations of overflow, adoring crowds.

Obama said he was flattered and humbled, but also wary.

"I am suspicious of hype. The fact that my 15 minutes of fame has extended a little longer than 15 minutes is somewhat surprising to me and completely baffling to my wife," he said at a news conference between events. "And I think what's going on is people are very hungry for something new. I think they are interested in being called to be a part of something larger than the sort of small, petty, slash-and-burn politics that we have been seeing over the last several years. To some degree, I think I'm a stand-in for that desire on the part of the country."

The Portsmouth appearance was a promotional event for Obama's bestselling new book, "The Audacity of Hope."

Obama says the book reflects what he thinks of as a fundamental American optimism that problems can be overcome and society can be made better and more fair.

"I think what's been happening over the last several months is that people have realized that kind of spirit has been lost over the last decade," Obama said. "It's a spirit that says we are looking for something different. We want something new."

Hundreds of people stood in line for up to an hour for autographs. He stayed until the last book was signed. He stayed for an hour after the state party event as well, besieged by party activists. He seemed to revel in the crowds' enthusiasm.

Obama has said he is contemplating running for president and intends to decide by early next month. He said Sunday he was still consulting with his family about it.

Sunday's reception could not have dissuaded him. He was the sole potential presidential contender invited to participate in the state Democratic Party's commemoration of the 2006 midterm election, in which they gained more control of the state's political machinery than at any time since the 19th century. He was greeted upon arrival in the state by a column in a local newspaper comparing him to Robert F. Kennedy.

Gov. John Lynch said the state party originally planned to invite the Rolling Stones, "but we canceled them when we realized Sen. Obama would sell more tickets."

People from 13 states purchased the 1,500 $25 tickets, and hundreds more were turned away. The day was marked by a friendly, almost giddy, festive mood. There was a lot of hugging going on. And cheering. It was a strange turn for New Hampshire voters, who are often characterized — and, in fact, characterize themselves — as tough nuts to crack.

Obama's speech to the party activists, emphasizing the same themes as his book, was interrupted several times by spontaneous applause. Several members of the audience said afterward they were applauding as much because of what Obama represented as for what he said.

"He seems like just a regular guy. He talks, uses language like we would use," said Nell Conkright, who owns a bookstore in Peterborough. There is a freshness about Obama that she said was compelling.

Obama, just the third African American senator since Reconstruction, was asked if the country was ready for a black president.

"Race is still a powerful force in this country," he said. "Any African American candidate, or any Latino candidate, or Asian candidate or woman candidate confronts a higher threshold in establishing himself to the voters…. Are some voters not going to vote for me because I'm African American? Those are the same voters who probably wouldn't vote for me because of my politics."

Although only two candidates, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, have formally announced campaigns for the 2008 Democratic nomination, many are considering the race. They include the 2004 ticket, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts and John Edwards of North Carolina; former Vice President Al Gore; Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut; retired Gen. Wesley K. Clark; and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

To some extent, political professionals say, the outline of the contest has already emerged: Clinton versus everyone else, with the rest struggling to emerge as her main opponent. If Obama enters the race, the professionals generally agree that he would immediately become the principal challenger.

David Doak, a veteran Democratic consultant, said Obama "points out the shortcomings of what is otherwise a pretty good field of candidates. He's clearly a guy who excites people…. He soaks up a lot of the energy [other candidates] would need to harness to break out of the pack. You assume Hillary's going to have the money, she's got the name identification, she's got the organization, she's got a group of people who've been through this before.

The degree to which Obama outshines potential competitors was illustrated by an appearance made by Bayh two nights earlier. He drew perhaps one-tenth as many people.

Although Doak's comments were echoed by other consultants, many cautioned it was very early. Steve Elmendorf, who worked for Kerry's 2004 campaign, said, "People will have a chance to prove themselves and get noticed. [Obama] may stumble. Others may stumble, others may shine. There's a long way yet to go."

Flurry In New Hampshire (BSUN)

By Paul West

The Baltimore Sun, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104494

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Politics-mad New Hampshire, jaded beyond reason by never-ending presidential campaigns, hadn't seen anything quite like this before.

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama made his debut in the kickoff primary state to adoring responses yesterday from large crowds of voters seemingly convinced that they were witnessing the next big thing on the national scene.

"I see him as very messianic," said Kelsey Woodward, a 64-year- old artist, at Obama's first stop, in Portsmouth. "People are craving a fresh voice, a fresh face, a fresh outlook."

The 45-year-old Illinois senator, who is tapping into the public's desire for an end to the bitter partisanship in Washington, might not make it all the way to the White House. But he appears to have put his party under a spell that has veteran politicians reaching back to the Kennedy era for comparisons.

His emergence could pose a problem for less charismatic rivals who have spent years laying the groundwork for their own bids. Analysts say there is only so much attention, money and endorsements to go around, and with Obama and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton likely to head the field, there may not be much room for other contenders.

"We've got a lot of 800-pound gorillas this time seriously looking at it," said Raymond Buckley, vice chairman of the state Democratic Party, referring to the collection of senators and governors gearing up to run.

Only one or two may be able to compete successfully in the shadow of Clinton and Obama, some analysts say. Money is a major hurdle. A candidate will have to raise $25 million to $40 million over the next 12 months to be competitive, according to campaign aides.

Nevertheless, a candidate other than Clinton or Obama could certainly become the nominee. "New Hampshire's been known to give a little oxygen to somebody that other people aren't looking at," said Buckley.

That didn't seem to be the case this weekend, however, for one Democratic hopeful. Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, making at least his seventh trip to the Granite State in the past 18 months, attracted scant attention. About 75 activists turned out to greet him Saturday night at a banquet hall in Manchester, the state's largest city.

Bayh said he felt "fine" about the Obama invasion, insisting that "we're not competing with one another." Bayh said he was doing what presidential candidates always do here - "seeing people in coffee shops and living rooms" - and said was unworried about getting crowded out of the '08 picture.

Kathy Sullivan, the state party chairman, was on hand to thank Bayh for his help in the midterm campaign. Bayh dispatched a cadre of young organizers into New Hampshire to help local candidates in last month's midterm election, which resulted in a surprise sweep of congressional seats and a Democratic takeover of the state legislature.

But when she looked for a speaker to headline a celebration of that triumph, the culmination of a decade-long Democratic surge in the state, Sullivan turned to Obama, and the event quickly became more about the next election than the last one.

Demand for tickets forced organizers to move the rally to a larger venue, where it quickly sold out at $25 a head. "We've never had a standing crowd of 1,500 people," said party spokeswoman Kathleen Strand.

Democratic Gov. John Lynch, re-elected last month by a record margin, joked, "We originally scheduled the Rolling Stones for this party. But we canceled them when we realized Sen. Obama would sell more tickets."

Obama, greeted by an enthusiastic roar, said he was flattered by the excitement surrounding his prospective candidacy. He is expected to announce his plans next month, aides said.

"I actually think that the reason that I'm getting so much attention has less to do with me and more to do with you," he told the crowd. "I think to some degree I've become a shorthand or a symbol or a stand-in, for now, of a spirit ... that says that we are looking for something different. We want something new."

"America is ready to turn the page," said Obama, who was born when John F. Kennedy was president and was elected to the Senate last year. "This is our time, a new generation that is prepared to lead."

Campaign veterans, including supporters of rival candidates, praised Obama's performance. They said they had never seen such a large crowd so early in the campaign, particularly for someone just setting out on the White House trail - in this case, a freshman senator still seemingly wet behind his jug ears.

At a news conference, surrounded by many of the 150 journalists who had credentials for the event, Obama acknowledged that, as an African-American, he would face "a higher threshold" in a presidential election, as would a woman or an Hispanic candidate.

But by the end of the campaign, he said, "people will know me pretty well [and] whether I'm qualified to serve or not."

Asked whether his middle name, Hussein, would hurt his chances, Obama replied, "It would be one thing if my name was John Hussein Smith." But, he said, "the American people are not concerned about middle names."

Party activists said they are looking for a candidate who could lead Democrats back to the White House in 2008.

Holly Roche, a 42-year-old massage therapist from Rollinsford, said she "wanted to experience the purported mystique" of the junior senator from Illinois.

DOJ_NMG_0104495

"I appreciate his message of non-negative politics," she added.

Retired municipal worker Edward Solomon, 63, was part of the crowd that had snapped up the 750 tickets in Portsmouth for a book-signing and a chance to catch Obama's stump speech, built in part around the title of his latest work, The Audacity of Hope.

Afterward, as he stepped from the hall into an unusually mild December day, Solomon said that when he listened to the tall, thin senator's upbeat message, "I could hear a sign of hope, that hope was there for all of us."

Democratic "Rock Star" Obama Tests Presidential Waters (AFP)

AFP, December 10, 2006

Democratic star Senator Barack Obama is on his first trip to the important political testing ground of New Hampshire as he lays the foundation for a possible 2008 presidential run.

Obama, who was speaking Sunday at celebrations to mark his party's success in last month's elections, also reportedly planned to use the visit to introduce himself to the political establishment in New Hampshire, which holds America's first presidential primary in little more than a year.

Considered a relative newcomer on the national political stage, Obama has not said he is certain to run for the White House. But he is expected to make a decision in the next few weeks.

There is no shortage of supporters pressing the photogenic African-American lawmaker to toss his hat into the ring however. Among them are longtime booster, Senate colleague Dick Durbin, who has begun an online petition drive urging Obama to run.

Another new website boosting Obama's presidential candidacy is www.runobama.com.

Meanwhile, Senator Hillary Clinton, tipped by polls and pundits as the early favorite for the 2008 Democratic nomination, also has been holding talks with party officials on joining the race, according to news reports. Newsweek magazine reported that Democratic insiders say it is "99 percent certain" that the former first lady will run.

So far only one Democrat has formally announced he will challenge for the nomination, Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

Big Crowds For Obama Signal That 2008 Contest Is Wide Open (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy, December 11, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. - Sen. Barack Obama shook up the embryonic 2008 presidential campaign Sunday, igniting a tumultuous response in his first visit to the state that will kick off primary voting for the 2008 Democratic nomination in about a year.

More than 1,500 Democrats crowded into a Manchester armory to see and hear the freshman senator, a turnout local organizers called unprecedented this long before the voting.

The armory crowd roared its approval when Gov. John Lynch speculated that Obama might run, and they interrupted the senator's half-hour speech several times with ovations. His speech focused on forging a bipartisan civil approach to solving problems in education, healthcare and national security. That amounts to "an American agenda," he said, not a partisan one.

Earlier Sunday, more than 700 showed up to see him at a Portsmouth book signing, forcing the event to be moved from a bookstore to a conference center.

The Illinois senator hasn't even decided yet whether to run. And not all who showed up to hear him would necessarily vote for him. But the intense curiosity and enthusiasm about him among Democrats suggests that the party is looking for new leadership - and that the presumed frontrunner, Sen. Hillary Rodham of New York, is anything but a certain winner.

"We've never had an event like this," said New Hampshire Democratic Party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan.

The $25 tickets sold out in a blur of advance demand, and party officials posted signs warning people there wasn't room for anyone else.

More than 150 members of the news media, including foreign press, covered Obama's arrival. Candidates at this stage of a campaign normally consider themselves lucky to draw four or five reporters.

By comparison, another potential 2008 Democratic candidate who's been visiting New Hampshire frequently went largely unnoticed at a simultaneous visit. Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana ate breakfast all but anonymously with two other people Sunday in a restaurant next door to the Obama event. The evening before, he hosted a reception that drew about 50 Democrats.

For his part, Obama claimed humility.

"I'm suspicious of hype," Obama said upon arriving in Manchester. "That my 15 minutes of fame has extended somewhat is surprising to me and baffling to my wife."

DOJ_NMG_0104496

But he said his civil approach, which he calls "a hopeful politics," might be striking a chord with Americans weary of partisan sniping and gridlock in Washington.

"People are very hungry for something new," he said. "To some degree, I am a stand-in for that desire."

Indeed, many Democrats noted that they like the fact that he's a newcomer to national politics, with just two years in the Senate.

"We're looking for somebody new," said Carol Williams of Manchester. "People are tired of the same old stuff, the same old politics. All the rest of them are part of the old boy, old girl network.

"Barack is eloquent and charismatic. He has the same charisma as John Kennedy," she said. "I know; I worked for him here in 1960."

She wasn't the only one who likened Obama to President Kennedy.

"He's passionate and he's young. It's a Jack Kennedy thing," said Carol Backus of Manchester.

If Obama exudes a JFK-like charisma for some, he doesn't share Kennedy's 14 years of pre-presidential experience in Congress. Some Democrats said they didn't mind his lack of experience; others said it would be a significant hurdle.

"The pedigree is important, but the ability to connect to people is more important," said state Sen. Lou D'allesandro of Manchester. "He's a very attractive candidate."

"He may be a little light on experience," said Rolf Bremer, the party chairman in the town of Brookline. But he said he was willing to look at Obama largely because he doesn't think Clinton can win.

A new national poll last week showed Clinton ahead in the early jockeying for the Democratic nomination, but trailing either Republican Rudy Giuliani or John McCain in a hypothetical general election.

Clinton had the support of 33 percent of Democrats for their party's nomination, according to the Marist College-WNBC poll. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina had 14 percent, former Vice President Al Gore had 13 percent, Obama had 12 percent, and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts had 5 percent.

An X factor is Obama's race - he would be the first African-American presidential nominee of either major party.

"Race is still a powerful force," he acknowledged Sunday, adding that minorities and women "confront a higher threshold" with voters.

But he said he was optimistic, thanks to his own election and the fact that Democrat Harold Ford, an African-American who ran unsuccessfully for the Senate this year in Tennessee, actually got more votes from whites than pre-election polls had indicated and almost won.

Obama also said he didn't think his middle name, Hussein, would be a problem. If names were a problem, he said with a smile, voters would never get past his first name.

"When you're already starting with Barack ..." he said with a laugh.

10 Years Later, It Still "Takes A Village," Hillary Sez (NYDN/AP)

By The Associated Press

New York Daily News, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is polishing up her most famous phrase as she edges closer to a presidential run, writing in a new introduction to her book "It Takes a Village" that Sept. 11 and the Internet make her tome on child-rearing even more relevant today.

"The five years since 9/11 have reinforced one of my main points: How children are raised anywhere can impact our lives and our children's futures," Clinton writes in the introduction to the 10th anniversary edition of the book, which goes on sale Dec. 12. An early copy was obtained by the Associated Press.

The New York senator is the early frontrunner for the Democrats' 2008 presidential nomination, and the new version of the book features a smiling Clinton surrounded by children. Clinton did not appear on the cover of the 1996 book.

In recent weeks, she lined up support among other New York officials for a presidential bid, leaving many convinced she has already decided to run but is waiting to make an official announcement.

In the new introduction, the senator acknowledges the book's title provided plenty of comic opportunities for headline writers, adding that her favorite was "It Takes a Village to Raise a Pig."

Many conservatives scoffed that the book was little more than liberal claptrap, and Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Penn., even wrote a counter-book in 2005, "It Takes a Family."

The introduction by Clinton argues that the core points she made as First Lady are if anything more important now that the Internet and electronic devices like MP3 players have such large roles in children's lives.

"Today's electronic village has certainly complicated the always difficult challenge of parenting and raising the next generation," Clinton writes, noting that in 1996 few were on the Internet and cell phones "weighed as much as bricks."

"Media saturates our kids' lives as never before," she warns, repeating concerns she has raised as a senator that violent video games may be harming children's psychological development. As if the prove the point, the book now comes with its own Web site.

Clinton's new introduction avoids taking many direct shots at Republicans, but she does decry the $3 trillion rise in federal debt over the past five years, arguing it amounts to a $28,000 "birth tax" on the "tiny shoulders" of each American child.

Since leaving the White House and entering the Senate, Clinton has used her sideline in book-writing to advance her politics and grow her bank account. She sold millions of copies of her 2003 memoirs "Living History," which at the time boosted speculation she might run for president in 2004.

"It Takes a Village" has 700,000 copies in print and the audiobook, narrated by Clinton, won a Grammy in 1997 for best spoken word album. Continuing the arrangement with publisher Simon & Schuster, proceeds from the book will still go to charity.

To promote the new version, Clinton will appear at a bookstore in Manhattan's Lincoln Center on Monday, Dec. 18, and two days later at a bookstore in New York's Westchester County, where she lives with her husband, former president Bill Clinton. She will also make national television appearances that week on a morning show and a talk show promoting the book.

The book appearances will likely only amplify the interest in if and when she will formally declare a bid for president. Through 2006, she was considered the early favorite among Democrats, but now that the November election has past others are stepping forward to express interest and test the waters.

Sen. Barack Obama has begun reaching out to Democrats about a possible bid, and Iowa governor Tom Vilsack has launched an exploratory committee. Also in the mix are New Mexico governor Bill Richardson, 2004 nominee John Kerry, and former vice president Al Gore.

Road To The White House Starts In NY (NSDY)

By Emerson Clarridge, Craig Gordon, Glenn Thrush, Bryan Virasami

Newsday, December 11, 2006

New York City Mayor John Lindsay and Gov. Nelson Rockefeller unsuccessfully sought the nomination in the 1960s.

Several candidates who were born or were in politics in the Empire State did make it to the White House. They include Martin Van Buren, who took office in 1837; Millard Fillmore, who became president in 1850; Chester A. Arthur, who took office in 1881; Grover Cleveland, who was elected in 1884 and 1892; Teddy Roosevelt, who became president in 1901; and his fifth cousin Franklin D. Roosevelt, who was elected to four terms beginning in 1932.

As the 2008 presidential cycle gets under way, it is unusual, though, that the state has four prospective candidates. And it would be unprecedented if, in the end, all of them remain in the race until the nominating conventions. Many political observers think it's a long shot. -- Emerson Clarridge

Rudy Giuliani

Can a thrice-married New Yorker on the wrong side of his party on the Big Three -- gays, guns and God -- really get elected to the White House?

Rudolph Giuliani wants to find out.

By all accounts, "America's mayor" is looking at becoming America's president, and he's taking carefully calculated steps to set up a campaign.

Giuliani has been scooping up sorely needed national talent to bolster his City Hall brain-trust, including a Bush-Cheney campaign honcho.

He held one confab with Republican money-types and is planning another to crack open the checkbooks Dec. 19. And he visited a California think-tank for foreign-policy tutoring.

Even without lifting a finger this summer, Giuliani consistently polled even with or ahead of John McCain, the Arizona senator. But while Giuliani is just now moving to run, McCain has been working for months on a 50-state organization.

Giuliani also risks being outpaced by new conservative heartthrob Mitt Romney, the Massachusetts governor.

Giuliani is riding high on 9/11 name recognition, and some believe that alone can take him far into the race -- perhaps if only as McCain's running mate.

If Giuliani did get the GOP nod, it could set up a Rudy-vs.-Hillary matchup that would be like the Subway Series of presidential politics.

But count on Giuliani foes to point out other parts of his record that won't sit well with hard-right and evangelical Christian voters in places like South Carolina.

He will have to explain support for gay rights, abortion rights and gun control, as well as what some may see as a less-than-godly personal life, with a messy divorce marked by allegations of an extramarital affair. -- Craig Gordon

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton

If she's not running, she's walking as fast as she can.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton was supposed to engage in a slow rollout of her presidential campaign this month, but the New York Democrat seems to have speeded things up, possibly to deal with the looming threat posed by emerging star Barack Obama.

Technically, she's not committed to a run. But like her beloved Chicago Cubs in baseball's winter meetings, Clinton has gone on a hiring spree, tapping a national fundraising director, a sharp-elbowed spokesman to go with her coterie of other sharp-elbowed spokesmen, a national field director, and a campaign manager.

Clinton aides claim she hasn't been flustered by Obama's flirtation with a run, but some supporters have privately taken to slipping some salt into the sugar when it comes to the freshman Illinois senator.

"Do you know what his middle name is?" one booster asked recently. (Answer: "Hussein!")

A nationwide Fox poll shows Obama trailing Clinton 33 percent to 12 percent among registered Democrats. Al Gore and John Edwards poll 12 percent and 11 percent, respectively.

But those numbers are meaningless if Clinton can't win some early primaries. She began courting officials for 2008 about 10 days ago when she met with New York politicians. By the middle of last week, she'd gone national, letting slip that she was bringing to Washington key Democrats from New Hampshire and Iowa to discuss a possible bid.

The next step for Clinton would be to create a presidential exploratory committee. Curiously, the only organization Clinton has created recently is a Senate committee for 2012, according to federal filings. -- Glenn Thrush

Gov. George Pataki

That outgoing Gov. George Pataki is merely considering a presidential bid didn't stop him from making yet another trip last week to New Hampshire, site of the first presidential primary.

Pataki is expected to make his decision in the next few weeks, spokeswoman Alicia Preston said Friday. "He's been spending time weighing the options with his family," she said.

Pataki hosted a lunch Wednesday for Republican lawmakers in New Hampshire on his 12th trip this year to that state.

Bad weather forced him to cancel a trip to Iowa, which he has visited nine times this year.

Although Pataki lost three key Republican advisers in Iowa last month, he opened a campaign office in a suburb of Des Moines and named a new leader for his political action committee, a former political director for Vice President Dick Cheney.

A moderate Republican who supports abortion rights and gay marriage, Pataki has been criticized by conservatives for state spending increases. But he has said his "vision and a proven record of leadership" could help him win.

According to a WNBC/Marist Poll last week, Pataki had 1 percent support among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani led the poll with 24 percent, and Arizona Sen. John McCain was a close second with 23 percent.

Michael Dawidziak, a Bohemia political consultant who works mostly with Republicans, agreed Pataki would be a long shot. But he added, "He's run against the odds before. He was elected governor of a blue state that's got 2 million more Democrats than Republicans."

Some observers speculate that Pataki is keeping his name in circulation to be considered as a vice presidential running mate. -- Emi Endo

Mayor Michael Bloomberg

Mayor Michael Bloomberg insists he's not a candidate for the White House but is confident he would make a good president. He plans to focus on philantrophy after City Hall, he has said, and yet he has declined to rule out a run for president.

Often described as a firm and decisive executive, Bloomberg prefers to ride the wave of speculation about whether he will run.

While he has denied he would change his mind about running, Bloomberg's contradictory comments in a New York magazine cover story last week suggested his staff members aren't the only ones dreaming of Washington.

"The answer is yes," he said when asked if he would be a good president. He also criticized the partisan environment in Washington, suggesting that someone with middle-of-the-road views would be an asset.

Political observers say he could free up $500 million of his own funds to run as an independent.

"He's not running for president," spokesman Stu Loeser said Friday. But on Thursday night, at a staff party at Gracie Mansion, there was food, drink and presidential fantasy.

Dressed as Bruce Springsteen with a white T-shirt and blue jeans, Bloomberg reportedly was joined by costumed deputy mayors and aides singing a takeoff on "Born to Run."

"Baby we were born to run! We'll win, you'll see -- and beat the GOP and Democrats. Unite the country -- make more jobs. And banish all trans fat! Fix the schools -- make profits grow. Get the White House painted saffron by Christo."

Loeser said the song was "an inside joke intended only for the mayor's staff." -- Bryan Virasami

GOP Hopeful McCain Visits Clinton, Giuliani Territory (NSDY/AP)

By Richard Pyle

Newsday, December 11, 2006

NEW YORK -- Paying a visit to the home turf of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and ex-Mayor Rudy Giuliani, potential rivals in the 2008 presidential race, Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain told a Jewish audience that Israel and the world are threatened by a "possibly deranged and surely dangerous regime" in Iran.

As the world's "chief state sponsor of international terrorism," Iran defines itself by its hostility to the Jewish state and its chief ally, the United States, McCain said in a speech prepared for a Hanukkah dinner at Yeshiva University on Sunday.

He noted that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has called the Holocaust a "myth," urged that Israel be "wiped off the map" and defied international demands and incentives to end a drive to gain nuclear weapons capability.

"It is simply tragic that millennia of proud Persian history have culminated in a government that today cannot be counted among the world's most civilized nations," McCain said.

The former Vietnam prisoner of war, who tried and failed to gain the GOP presidential nomination in 1998, is considered the probable front-runner for his party's nomination in two years. His stiffest challenge could come first from Giuliani in a Republican primary, while Clinton has unofficially made clear her interest in leading the Democratic ticket.

Ahmadinejad has denied that Iran seeks to build weapons, saying its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes and the country will not give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium and produce nuclear fuel. The United States and many European nations believe Iran's enrichment process is aimed at producing weapons.

McCain said Tehran's pursuit of nuclear weapons posed "an unacceptable risk" in that it would increase the threat of Iran-sponsored terrorist activities, render the nonproliferation treaty obsolete and cause non-nuclear nations such as Egypt, Turkey and Saudi Arabia to "reassess" their own nuclear potential.

Iran, McCain said, "must understand that it cannot win a showdown with the world."

He said the U.N. Security Council must act immediately to impose multilateral political and economic sanctions on Iran while every other option, including military, is preserved.

"We have a long way to go diplomatically before we need to contemplate other measures, but it is a simple observation of reality that there is only one thing worse than a military solution, and that is a nuclear-armed Iran," McCain said.

In Vienna, U.S. government officials said on Sunday that Washington, D.C., and its closest Western allies, Britain and France, may soon ask the U.N. Security Council to vote on sanctions against Iran, even though China and Russia might veto the measure or abstain.

McCain, who has urged President Bush to increase rather than reduce the size of American forces in Iraq, said that despite the "many serious mistakes we have made" and the ongoing violence there, the United States cannot simply "wash our hands of a messy situation."

Because Iraqi security forces are not capable of operating on their own, he said, a "precipitous" pullout of U.S. forces would "risk all-out civil war and the emergence of a failed state in the heart of the Middle East."

2008 Hopefuls Woo Bush Clan Donors, Aides (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the Bushes preparing to stand down from a quarter century in top elected offices, a frenzied competition has erupted in the Republican Party over who will inherit a fundraising and vote-getting machine built by the family over the years into one of the most valuable assets in modern politics.

At stake is access to an elaborate national network of corporate givers, campaign strategists and grass-roots volunteers who have repeatedly propelled the Bushes to victory — a network that could now give a new contender the inside track to winning the GOP's 2008 presidential nomination.

The leading potential heirs to that political fortune so far are Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a onetime rival to the current President Bush and presumed front-runner for the nomination, and, a bit surprisingly, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who has emerged as a top-tier contender by wooing social conservatives considered crucial in the early primary contests.

Adding to the drama, a sibling divide appears to be emerging among aides closest to President Bush and his brother, outgoing Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. Some key members of Gov. Bush's tight-knit inner circle have signed up to help Romney, while several of President Bush's senior strategists have gone to McCain. They include the media advisor and political director for the president's 2004 campaign.

The fight for the Bush family mantle demonstrates that, even after the plunge in the president's popularity and the GOP's thumping in the midterm election, the family network remains the single most powerful force in Republican Party politics.

It is a machine born four decades ago, when Barbara and George H.W. Bush moved to Texas and began to build a political life — meticulously filling index cards with names of possible supporters and dutifully sending out Christmas greetings each year. Far from that simple, mid-20th century approach, today's GOP relies on a broad database of backers across the country whose relationships have been nurtured by generations of Bushes.

From the family's West Texas oil fortunes and Wall Street connections half a century ago, the network has grown to include the big-money fundraisers, dubbed "pioneers" and "rangers," who helped George W. Bush raise more than $500 million for his two presidential campaigns.

It also includes Bush family loyalists such as Karl Rove, who have, over the last six years, presided over the GOP's creation of the most exhaustive voter-targeting operation available, an infrastructure that relies on databases of voter names and the enthusiasm of ground-level workers and volunteers.

"The Bush name is the gold standard in Republican primaries," said Mark McKinnon, former media advisor to President Bush, who is now working with McCain. Hiring staffers viewed as close to the family, he said, "helps confer some credibility and experience or acceptability."

While the 2008 hopefuls are vying for the Bush family's fundraising and field organizing network, a more complex question is whether they want to be seen as inheriting the Bush political ideology. Widely criticized for starting the Iraq war and running large budget deficits, President Bush's brand of conservatism is in disfavor.

Jeb Bush, on the other hand, is adored by religious conservatives for his role in the Terri Schiavo right-to-die case and for his support for school choice in Florida. He is praised by economic conservatives for cutting millions in taxes and backing efforts to privatize some government services. While the president's approval ratings hover in the 30s or low 40s, Florida polls show that Gov. Bush's ratings are into the 60s, and several party strategists have put Jeb Bush's name forward as a potential nominee for vice president in 2008.

Officially, both Jeb and George W. Bush are neutral in the presidential race. As the leader of his political party, the president traditionally sits out the primary contests. Gov. Bush so far is following suit — though he has told former aides that he and Romney are similar in ideology and governing style.

Rove, President Bush's senior political advisor, also has not taken sides in the 2008 race, though he may be eager to get involved in order to show that the GOP defeats this year do not signal the end of his vision of long-term Republican dominance.

The overt indicators of jockeying for the Bush political assets have come in a series of announcements from the McCain and Romney camps, boasting of support from national- and state-level supporters with a variety of Bush family ties.

Other signs have been more subtle. A ceremony last week in the Florida State House, honoring Jeb Bush's service as governor, included a 15-minute presentation featuring images of the governor with Romney and another potential 2008 contender, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. One photo depicted Romney and Jeb Bush with broad grins, standing together in Romney's Boston office.

But the presentation was most notable for what it lacked: There was no photo of Jeb Bush with McCain. The absence of a McCain photo seemed to carry meaning. The presentation, with its implied signal of Jeb Bush's preferences among the GOP presidential field, was played last week for the governor's staffers and state lawmakers, many of whom are being courted by the 2008 contenders.

The presentation was produced by one of the governor's longtime advisors, Sally Bradshaw, who is now a Romney strategist. Bradshaw is so close to Jeb Bush that it is unlikely she would work for any of the 2008 candidates without his blessing. In an interview, Bradshaw said that Jeb Bush only "encouraged me" to meet with Romney, insisting that the Florida governor is not trying to indicate a favorite in the race.

Besides Bradshaw, Romney has enlisted Ann Herberger, the keeper of Jeb Bush's fundraising Rolodex. Also with Romney are Bush's lieutenant governor, Toni Jennings, and the man Bush once hand-picked to lead the state GOP, Miami lawyer Al Cardenas. Romney's decision to focus so heavily on Jeb Bush's team points to a key factor in explaining how the Massachusetts governor has emerged as a leading GOP contender, despite having run for office in the past as a moderate in a liberal state.

Romney has presented himself as the strongest conservative in the race and the most viable alternative to McCain, who is distrusted by many conservative voters for his breaks from the party line and past opposition to Bush. By aligning with Jeb Bush, Romney is associating himself with a popular brand of conservatism.

Romney aides insist that they have drawn support from both the Jeb and George sides of the Bush family, signing on two former White House economists as domestic policy advisors and a former speechwriter for President Bush as an outside advisor. McCain has sought to broaden his reach into the extended Bush family, as well, and his aides dismiss the idea of a sibling divide in advance of the 2008 race. He recently enlisted support from Florida businessman Phil Handy, a close Jeb Bush friend, and has secured help from Robert Mosbacher, a longtime friend of George H. W. Bush and chief fundraiser in his successful 1988 campaign for president. Mosbacher is the honorary Texas chairman of McCain's presidential exploratory committee.

One could read that as a sign that the first President Bush supports McCain, said John Weaver, a top McCain advisor. "But I'm not doing that," he quickly added. The Bush family has dominated Republican politics for so many years that it is often hard to tell where the family ties end and the party machinery begins. Some strategists argue that the "Bush family primary" is merely a reflection of the family's broad reach in party politics, and that any competent strategist has at one time or another worked for a Bush.

"It's difficult to conceive a candidate with a winning team that's not integrated by a significant number of Bush family loyalists," Cardenas said.

Some of the most prominent Bush-aligned campaign aides may sit out the 2008 race.

Outgoing Republican National Committee chairman Ken Mehlman is said to be pursuing more lucrative corporate jobs. Another top advisor to President Bush, lobbyist and former Republican National Committee Chairman Ed Gillespie, has already decided to focus more locally. He is preparing to become chairman of the Virginia GOP and, associates say, plot his own possible Senate bid in that state.

To associates of both Jeb and George W. Bush, Romney's success in moving into their network has been a surprise.

One former campaign staff member to President Bush said that Romney has been the buzz of the elaborate network of Bush helpers who are being rewarded with White House receptions and other get-togethers during the holiday season.

"It seems like about 50-50," said the former staffer, referring to the split among these Bush supporters between McCain and Romney.

This is no surprise to anyone who has been on the receiving end of Romney's entreaties.

Earlier this month, after a meeting of GOP governors in Orlando, Fla., Romney traveled north to Panama City in Florida's panhandle for a meeting with local businessman Allan G. Bense, who recently ended a two-year tenure as speaker of the state House.

Bense, a Jeb Bush ally, is no stranger to high-level courtship, having rejected personal appeals by Rove and Gov. Bush to run for the Senate this year in place of the controversial Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.).

But when Romney made the effort to come to his house, Bense said he could not say no.

"He had called and called back and called back, and finally he came to the house," Bense said. "I have all the respect in the world for Sen. McCain, who is a hero. But it's just that Gov. Romney pushed and worked. And like in sales, he asked me for my business. And the product he was selling was one that I liked."

Why It's Dangerous For The Maverick To Be The...Front Runner (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, December 11, 2006

As a rallying cry. "Common sense conservatism" doesn't have quiteÂ the ring of "Straight Talk Express." But the new slogan on the website of John McCain's presidential exploratory committee--a slogan he manages to repeat at least three times in every speech he gives these days--tells you all you need to know about how different this presidential campaign will be from his last one. McCain '08 will be a bigger, more conventional operation--a tank, not a slingshot. The prevailing wisdom about McCain used to be that his bipartisan appeal would make him a sure bet in a presidential race--if only he could get past the Republican primary. But as more and more of the party establishment climb aboard a campaign that McCain has not yet even formally launched, it's starting to look as if the opposite may be true. By trying to become the perfect candidate for the primaries, McCain could be creating difficulties for himself in a general election.

His hard-line position on Iraq is a perfect case in point. McCain has continued to press for more troops there, and spent last week dismissing the Iraq Study Group recommendation to bring them home as nothing short of a recipe for defeat. That's the kind of strong, consistent hawkishness that G.O.P. primary voters look for. "Besides," says McCain strategist Mark Salter, "it's what he believes." The problem is that exit polls in last month's election said only 17% of voters overall share that view, which could leave the other 83% wondering whether McCain's famous independent streak, so appealing on most issues, would be such a good thing to have in a Commander in Chief who has the power to take the country to war. Already there are signs that his image is taking a hit. In the CBS/New York Times poll, McCain's favorability rating slid 6 points, to 28%, between January and September.

McCain insists that he has always been more conservative than many of his fans believe him to be. But the most important perception people have about McCain is not about ideology; it's about integrity. After staking his reputation on the moral high ground by speaking truth to power on issues ranging from deficits to torture, McCain is uniquely vulnerable to anything that hints of hypocrisy--even on questions that ordinary politicians would get a pass on. To have a shot at winning a presidential election these days, for instance, it is nearly a requirement that candidates opt out of the federal finance system, forgoing its matching funds because it's too difficult to mount a credible campaign within the law's spending caps. But that move, however pragmatic, would look bad coming from an author of the McCain-Feingold campaign-finance-reform law.

Also, it's harder for McCain than most to explain away inconsistencies. How, for example, could a deficit hawk vote to make President Bush's tax credits permanent after opposing their passage in the first place as fiscally irresponsible? Or why, after declaring Jerry Falwell to be an agent of intolerance during the brutal 2000 primary campaign, did McCain deliver the commencement speech last May at Falwell's Liberty University in Virginia?

Such overtures might make inroads in a skeptical Republican base, but these shifts make some of his longtime allies worry. "A profile in courage can become a profile in unrestrained ambition," says former Reagan White House chief of staff Ken Duberstein, who was one of the few G.O.P. establishment figures to support McCain's 2000 presidential campaign. "He has to remember who his friends are and not spend his integrity on one-night stands with those who will never fully trust him."

Critics pounced last week when McCain let it be known that he has lined up a top G.O.P. operative to run his campaign--Terry Nelson, who was national political director for President Bush's 2004 campaign. "Terry's a great get," says Salter. "He's a good, savvy, very disciplined, smart guy with a lot of experience." Nelson is yet another recruit from the once antagonistic Bush operation, and more evidence that the party establishment is falling into place behind McCain. But Nelson is known for hardball tactics that don't exactly square with the Arizona Senator's white-knight image.

Most recently, Nelson oversaw the Republican National Committee's independent expenditure operation, which produced the most notorious ad of the 2006 campaign. In it, a bare-shouldered white actress claimed that she had met the black Senate candidate Harold Ford at a Playboy party. The ad ended with the blond cooing, "Harold, call me." The resulting protest by black leaders and union groups was enough to force Wal-Mart to sever its ties with Nelson, who had been a consultant for the company's campaign to improve its image. Ford lost the election.

McCain strategists say they will all be taking their lead from the candidate, not the other way around. "Any campaign has to be a reflection of who the candidate is," Nelson says. In 2000, McCain ran his insurgent operation out of a dilapidated headquarters just outside D.C. that had previously been occupied by homeless people. Now, as the front runner, he faces a different set of expectations. Nearly from Day One, he will have to have full-fledged operations up and running in 15 or 20 states. Last time around he could skip Iowa to focus on staging an upset in New Hampshire, but this time McCain will have to compete--and avoid losing his balance--on every battleground. Says an aide: "We will go wherever one vote is available."

While the Republican Party has a history of anointing its candidates early, this rarely happens without a fight. "It's easy to throw the bombs," says G.O.P. pollster Tony Fabrizio. "It's tough to be the front runner every day." For McCain, the biggest potential threats at the moment appear to be Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney, who is getting good buzz on the right but is largely unknown even to Republicans, and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, who comes out ahead of McCain in many polls but has yet to begin building much of a campaign operation.

McCain's forces say they are preparing for all challengers. But what will it cost him? That's a question that McCain himself has struggled with. There was a time just a few years back when he would tell people he didn't think he wanted to run for President again. Not because he was getting too old. And not because he didn't think he could win. McCain thought it just couldn't possibly be as much fun as it was the first time around. He would say wistfully, "You can't bottle lightning." But while he may be in a better position to win now, he'll still need some of that old electrical charge to do it.

Exploratory Committees Build Buzz (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

It is the season of exploration.

Everywhere you look, prospective 2008 presidential candidates are forming exploratory committees. Three leading Republicans and one prominent Democrat who have long been pursuing the presidency announced such committees in recent days, saying they are not ready to announce a real presidential committee, and so are taking an intermediate step to raise money and put together a campaign operation just in case they decide to run.

What's the deal?

According to the Federal Election Commission (FEC), there is no difference between an exploratory committee and a presidential campaign committee. The ideas behind creating an exploratory committee, strategists and experts say, are to create buzz -- and to do what everybody expects you to do.

"You get two press releases, one when you form the exploratory committee, and one when you say you're actually running," said Kenneth A. Gross, a lawyer specializing in politics and elections.

Dorothy James, a Connecticut College government professor who specializes in presidential elections, said creating an exploratory committee has become a routine campaign ploy. "A lot of people have to do it because it's done," she said. "There's no proof that bumper stickers and posters turn out more voters. But if everybody does it, then you do it."

Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kerry, the 2004 Democratic nominee, and then-Gov. George W. Bush of Texas in 2000 created exploratory committees before announcing their candidacies. But the number of candidates creating such committees at this point in the election cycle, a month after the midterm elections, is unusual.

Scott Reed, who managed Robert J. Dole's 1996 presidential candidacy, said, "It appears the entire timetable has moved up two to three months as these candidates struggle to get out there and define their piece of the pie." Reed said it does not make sense for candidates to declare officially this early. "It's too soon for the voters to take seriously a formal announcement before the end of the year. Everyone is still dealing with 2006 fatigue."

Already, Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) have registered exploratory committees with the FEC. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R) has created a "testing the waters" committee in his home state that allows him to raise money but not disclose contributors unless he formally declares. Other prominent candidates are expected to create exploratory committees in coming weeks.

Last week, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), apparently trying to get three bites out of the apple, announced that he would announce next month whether he would form an exploratory committee.

Outgoing Gov. Tom Vilsack (D-Iowa), meanwhile, bypassed the exploratory stage, a move that departing Gov. Mitt Romney (R-Mass.) is reportedly considering. "There is no reason to be coy or cute with the interim step," said Jeff Link, Vilsack's spokesman. "I don't know the advantage unless you want to appear to be courted in some way by people."

Candidates who form exploratory committees often say it is the next reasonable thing they can do to prepare for a White House bid without officially getting into the race. They say they need to talk it over with their families and assess their odds, though in many cases they have been evaluating a race for months or years.

Bayh, for example, had made almost 20 trips to early-primary states when he announced on ABC's "This Week" that he would form an exploratory committee. But Bayh suggested to host George Stephanopoulos that he still had serious thinking to do.

"I will be forming an exploratory committee to take the next practical step," Bayh said in a deadly serious tone. "I'll make a final decision over the holidays with my family and have some final decision to announce early next year."

Dan Pfeiffer, Bayh's spokesman, said it was important to get certain processes underway even before the senator made a final decision. "In a primary this competitive and compact, there is no excuse for doing things next year that you could have done this year."

According to FEC Chairman Michael E. Toner, the exploratory committees are in fact plain old committees used to raise money and run campaigns in presidential primaries. The only change, once a candidate decides to run, is the name of the committee. "If they file with the FEC, it's a full-blown primary campaign," Toner said.

Giving California A Voice In Presidential Contests (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

Sacramento — What's sure to be a hot presidential contest is warming up and once again California is likely to be a mere spectator in a lousy seat.

Starting to get excited about watching Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois compete here, then helping to select one as the Democratic nominee? Not a chance.

Intrigued about weighing in on Arizona Sen. John McCain versus former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani for the Republican nomination? Sorry, you can only root from the bleachers.

California's 2008 presidential primary won't be held until June, long after the nominations already have been locked up. Our votes will be meaningless.

Maybe it's time for California to become an early caucus state, voicing its candidate preferences and choosing national convention delegates through community meetings of party activists and interested citizens, as Iowans long have done to great ballyhoo. But more about that later.

First, the horrid, humbling background:

California experimented with "early" primaries for three presidential elections, beginning in 1996. The goal was to exert our rightful clout in the nominating process and force candidates to pay attention to our special issues: water, environment, illegal immigration, getting shortchanged by the feds…. After all, we are the most populous state.

It flopped. New Hampshire, Iowa and other pampered pipsqueaks leapfrogged ahead of us. Our votes still didn't matter.

DOJ_NMG_0104504

Moreover, California moved not only its presidential primary, but also its regular state primary up to March. Very bad idea. That added three months to the campaign season for state candidates, taxing donors' pocketbooks and voters' attention spans.

So the Legislature and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger did the right thing. They gave up and moved the joint primary back to June, where it had resided for 52 years.

But now we're really going to be ignored by the presidential candidates — all of us, that is, except for the richest folks. California is the nation's biggest ATM for candidates, who slip in to pick up money and then quickly leave to spend it in other states.

In 2004, says California Democratic Chairman Art Torres, "$184 million left the state for presidential and other campaigns and none of it came back."

One obvious remedy for the voters' irrelevance is being mulled in the Capitol, talked up especially by Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles): Split the primaries. Move up the presidential primary again, to perhaps February, but leave the state contests in June.

Nuñez has a personal motivation. He'd like an early 2008 election of some kind to place before voters a proposed change in legislative term limits — not adding more total years, but allowing all of them to be spent in one house. Unless that's done, Nuñez won't be able to run for reelection in 2008, because he'll be termed out.

The term limits proposal would be packaged with redistricting reform — the Legislature surrendering the power to draw its own districts.

Both reforms — term limits and redistricting — are badly needed. But the public just might regard this whole political maneuver as too convoluted, cynical and self-serving.

There's an even bigger hurdle for primary-splitters: cost. The state would be out $50 million to hold a separate presidential primary. Fiscal conservatives undoubtedly would balk.

So a separate, early presidential primary may be beyond California's grasp. If it is, here's a bold alternative: a caucus system. Most caucus states are peewees, but let's not be haughty. What we're doing now isn't working.

Caucuses work for Iowa, which is smothered in candidate attention. Nevada also now has stepped into the limelight by moving its Democratic caucuses to Jan. 19, four days after Iowa. Then come the trumpeted New Hampshire and South Carolina primaries, both in January.

California could hold caucuses in early February and produce a political earthquake.

And there'd be one huge advantage for state taxpayers: They wouldn't have to foot the bill. The political parties would be stuck.

"A lot of us have toyed with the caucus idea," Torres says, "but then we looked at the numbers and almost got heart attacks."

Collect it from the big donors who feed the ATM.

Republican state Chairman Duf Sundheim has a more common reason for opposing caucuses: "It's best when people vote. It puts the emphasis on what people want rather than political organizations."

But pollster Mark Baldassare of the Public Policy Institute of California notes: "Primary elections are on life support. In concept, people like having a direct say. But in reality, we're seeing lower and lower turnouts in primary elections."

Baldassare thinks "many people could be convinced" that caucuses are worth trying.

Caucuses — held in school auditoriums, lodge halls, even living rooms — create a sense of community. They inspire democratic participation and open up the process of political activism.

"There's more reliance on the grass roots and less on advertising, which is a good thing for the democratic system," says Matthew Dowd, a caucus advocate who was Schwarzenegger's main reelection strategist and also a top advisor to President Bush in 2004.

Which candidates would benefit from caucuses? "Candidates who can motivate people," Dowd says. "Candidates who come less manufactured, who are more real."

Candidates like Obama. Like McCain.

Veteran Democratic consultant Bill Carrick also says he'd prefer early caucuses to no state influence at all.

But would many Californians get off their couches and venture out on a winter night to spend three hours deliberating politics and choosing up sides? "No question about it," Carrick says. "It would be exciting, a big deal."

A lot more exciting than watching TV reports of coddled New Hampshire voters flexing their muscles. More meaningful than casting a vote that no candidate really cares about.

Jefferson Win Poses Dilemma For Party (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

DOJ_NMG_0104505

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 10 -- Rep. William J. Jefferson may be a pariah in some Washington political circles, but voters in this storm-battered city weighed in over the weekend with their own verdict regarding their scandal-plagued congressman: He's still our guy.

Voters gave the Louisiana Democrat an emphatic reelection victory over state Rep. Karen Carter, even though his campaign had been weighted with revelations that federal authorities had videotaped him taking $100,000 in alleged bribe money, and that $90,000 of it had been found inside a freezer in his apartment in the District. The investigation led his House colleagues to dump him from a key committee, donors abandoned him and the state Democratic Party switched its allegiance to his opponent.

But before cheering supporters at a hotel room on election night, Jefferson called his win "a great moment" and said, "I thank almighty God for making it possible."

He declined to discuss the probe.

Divinely inspired or not, his victory now poses a quandary for Democrats, some of whom have shunned him politically, and possibly also for the city, as leaders here seek to project an image of civic probity as they lobby for more federal money for recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

"This has to be seen as troubling," said Brian Brox, a political science professor at Tulane University. "I don't think his victory does any good for New Orleans as it presses its claims on the national government."

The federal corruption investigation, now 21 months old, was front and center in the campaign.

Carter pushed the corruption issue in television ads, saying that the cloud of suspicion alone would make him an ineffective representative, and Jefferson responded with some of his own ads in which he attacked Carter and looked evenly into the camera to tell voters: "I have never taken a bribe from anyone."

But while the allegations were widely discussed here, exactly what people made of them seems to have depended at least partly on race.

Though both candidates in the runoff are African American, voters generally split along racial lines.

Jefferson won 57 percent of the vote to Carter's 43 percent. He won 79 percent of votes in largely black precincts, while she won 76 percent of votes in largely white precincts, according to a post-election analysis by Greg Rigamer, a consultant for the Carter campaign.

For some of Jefferson's core black constituency, "they've heard the news" about the allegations. "They just don't believe it," Brox said.

Moreover, while Jefferson lost some key Democratic endorsements, he did pick up those of two others who are particularly influential in the black community, Mayor C. Ray Nagin and Bishop Paul Morton, often named as the city's most influential black minister. Jefferson appears to have won votes by attacking Carter for supporting same-sex marriage.

In conversations with voters here on Sunday, the racial divide was apparent. "I just wish we could one day elect someone who wouldn't look ridiculous to the rest of the country," said Betty Holahan-Smith, 45, a white voter from the Lower Garden District. "First, we had 'Chocolate City' Nagin. Now we have 'Dollar Bill' Jefferson."

"If the federal government really wanted to help New Orleans, they would have indicted him and taken him out of the game," said Tom Gault, 50, who is white and a Democrat, outside his townhouse in the Garden District. "It amazes me that people would vote for someone who may be indicted soon."

But after Sunday services at the First Pilgrim Baptist Church in the Bywater neighborhood, a group of three friends, all African American, concurred in their support for Jefferson and dismissed the allegations as unproved. Though two of Jefferson's associates -- a business partner and a former staff member -- have pleaded guilty in the bribery scheme, they cautioned against a rush to judgment.

"I just kind of felt if they had something on him why haven't they indicted him?" said Tyra Bryant, 34, of Jefferson Parish. "I'm not even sure it's really true."

"He hasn't done anything the rest of the folks up in Washington haven't done -- he just got caught," said Sharon Williams of Mid-City.

She said Carter seems to have forgotten who she is, Williams said.

"Sometimes when you are an African American and you get too high on yourself, well, Karen Carter thought she was a Caucasian," she said. "You have to always remember where you came from."

While the racial divide formed the basic demographic framework of the election, however, what played a critical role in the outcome was Jefferson's curious ability to appeal to white voters in suburban Jefferson Parish. A campaign led there by Sheriff Harry Lee blasted Carter for appearing in Spike Lee's Katrina documentary, in which she criticized the parish's law enforcement for turning back fleeing residents.

In a concession speech on Saturday night, Carter pledged to work with Jefferson, especially on post-Katrina rebuilding.

"I guess the people are happy with the status quo," she said.

Scandal-Tainted Rep. Jefferson Wins Congressional Runoff In Louisiana (WSJ)

By Erika Lovley

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Despite an continuing federal probe that turned up $90,000 in cash in his freezer last year, embattled Democratic Rep. William J. Jefferson was re-elected Saturday in Louisiana's 2nd District.

The victory leaves the state frozen in the scandal, which could cramp the flow of rebuilding funds from Washington, experts warn. The Big Easy has had a long history of political corruption. Former state governor Edwin Edwards was sentenced to 10 years in prison in 2001 on charges of racketeering.

Jefferson supporters contended that the Big Easy would suffer if it lost his 16 years of seniority in Congress and pointed out that the congressman has yet to be charged, despite more than a year of investigation.

Mr. Jefferson won the support of 57% of the electorate, while the runner-up, State Rep. Karen Carter, received 43% of the vote. Ms. Carter struggled to take advantage of her opponent's legal woes, despite guilty pleas from both a Kentucky businessman and a former Jefferson aide for various bribery charges.

No charges have been brought against Mr. Jefferson, but he is already being punished in Washington. Nancy Pelosi, now the incoming House speaker, voted with Democrats last June to unseat the congressman from the powerful House Ways and Means Committee. In another upset, the state Democratic Party chose to bypass the incumbent and endorse the 37-year-old Ms. Carter several weeks before the primary.

The House Democratic leadership isn't expected to make a final decision on any committee assignment for Mr. Jefferson until this week. Ms. Pelosi's office had no comment Sunday but she is expected to use this week to consult with the Congressional Black Caucus on the matter.

Mr. Jefferson, 59, is the state's first African-American congressman since Reconstruction and is in his eighth term.

The white community largely supported Ms. Carter as the face of change, while Mr. Jefferson retained his longtime supporters -- the black majority. Although Ms. Carter raised almost five times more cash during the campaign, Mr. Jefferson secured more prominent endorsements; among his supporters: Mayor Ray Nagin and several other black politicians.

Much of Mr. Jefferson's campaign focused on painting his opponent as corrupt, claiming that Ms. Carter has not accurately reported earnings from her bond work as a private attorney. She has not been under any type of investigation.

New Orleans Voters Support Their Man Over F.B.I. (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 10 — Outside the Greater St. Stephen Full Gospel Baptist Church, there was no surprise on Sunday at the re-election of Representative William J. Jefferson, only satisfaction.

The late-night comedians could joke all they wanted about the $90,000 that the Federal Bureau of Investigation said it found in Mr. Jefferson's freezer and that the agency said was bribe money. White New Orleans could tut-tut at the seamy portrait outlined by the F.B.I. in its investigation of him, and at the guilty pleas of two associates of Mr. Jefferson, who is a black Democrat.

Supporters in the broken-down, crime-plagued Central City neighborhood here saw another picture: of a godly man persecuted by a racially biased government.

"There's been no indictment; how can you say he's guilty?" asked Brenda Dumas, clutching her Bible.

"Some call him a crook," Ms. Dumas added. They say he's corrupt. They have to prove that. To give up on somebody after all he's done for us, that would be wrong."

To the crowd streaming from Sunday services, the months of harsh headlines proved only Mr. Jefferson's sanctity. His dignified mien, his church-going habits and omnipresent family entourage set the seal.

"I wouldn't have voted for anybody else," Johnnie Mae Patterson said. "He's a God-sent man."

Mr. Jefferson crushed his opponent, State Representative Karen R. Carter, also a Democrat, in a runoff election on Saturday, gaining 57 percent of the vote. How he did so may speak to strikingly different views of government here.

"The background to this is the cultural divide between blacks and whites, and their different attitude to law enforcement," said Susan E. Howell, a political scientist at the University of New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0104507

In the eyes of some, those differences have been accentuated by the legacy of Hurricane Katrina, and Washington's failure to get New Orleans back on its feet. Mr. Jefferson is not blamed for the ruined black neighborhoods, but the United States government — his prosecutor — is.

Though Jefferson Parish voted overwhelmingly for him, the contest was decided in New Orleans, where the racial divide was stark. His opponent, Ms. Carter, won about 90 percent of the white vote; Mr. Jefferson won about 80 percent of the black vote. Mr. Jefferson played up this difference in support, suggesting that Ms. Carter, who is also black, was the preferred candidate of well-to-do white Republicans.

His constituents "wanted to believe him, they wanted to believe the big bad guys in Washington were picking on him," said Cynthia Hedge-Morrell, a black member of the City Council who supported Ms. Carter. "There's such a distrust toward Washington now, after Katrina."

Mr. Jefferson also appeared to have benefited from adroit maneuvering by one of his former political rivals, State Senator Derrick Shepherd, who is from Jefferson Parish and trailed in the primary, but later endorsed the congressman. Mr. Shepherd has not hidden his hope to wind up in Washington someday — perhaps a likelier prospect under a Jefferson re-election, given the congressman's legal problems.

"I endorsed Congressman Jefferson for a totality of reasons," Mr. Shepherd said, adding: "Of course, my desire to be a congressperson was one factor."

Ethics and lawfulness was the mantle assumed by Ms. Carter in the race, but it appeared to have wound up working for Mr. Jefferson instead.

"I voted for him," P. V. Weber said as he arrived at church on Sunday. "I didn't like the fact that they were trying all that to destroy his character."

Runoff In Tex. 23rd May Show Impact Of 2006 Redistricting (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

SAN ANTONIO, Dec. 10 -- Almost everywhere nationwide, the midterm elections are but a distant memory, supplanted by Christmas shopping and holiday parties. But here, candidates are still battling to determine the makeup of the House and the fate of Texas's first Hispanic Republican elected to Congress.

The election for the state's 23rd Congressional District -- the largest in the country, with 52,621 square miles and 20 counties -- is what GOP and Democratic strategists are calling a "tossup" under new boundaries ordered this summer by the U.S. Supreme Court. Republican incumbent Henry Bonilla, seeking an eighth term, and Democrat Ciro Rodriguez, a former congressman, are in a runoff set for Tuesday.

The short campaign began with Rodriguez, 60, challenging Bonilla, 52, to defend his support of Bush administration policies and the war in Iraq mano a mano. Both agreed to two debates sponsored by civic groups, but Rodriguez canceled, citing scheduling conflicts. Rodriguez then challenged Bonilla to a bilingual debate, in Spanish and English. Bonilla didn't bite, later calling the request "a stunt."

Instead, the candidates have attacked each other's patriotism and posture on terrorism in television ads, news conferences and "robo-calls."

Rodriguez accused Bonilla of voting to cut veterans' benefits and to deny health-care coverage for National Guardsmen returning from Iraq. Bonilla countered by saying that Rodriguez showed "dangerous judgment" in Congress by opposing a law that allowed secret evidence to be used in immigration proceedings against suspected terrorists and by accepting a $250 contribution from a man later convicted of conducting illegal business transactions with Libya. The donation was made in 1998, years before the man was convicted, Rodriguez said.

The Supreme Court ordered the boundaries of the 23rd District redrawn after determining that the old map -- created under a 2003 redistricting by the Texas Legislature but orchestrated by then-House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) -- discriminated against Latino voters and did not comply with the Voting Rights Act. The new district is now more Hispanic (61 percent as opposed to about 50) and less Republican (54 percent instead of 62).

Because the new map was not finalized until August, five months after the state's primary election, a special election was held Nov. 7. State election law required a runoff if no candidate broke 50 percent. Bonilla won 48.6 percent of the vote; Rodriguez led a field of six Democrats with 19.9 percent.

Buoyed by the Democrats' midterm election wins and banking on the 23rd District's new demographics and Bonilla's weakness among Hispanics -- he won only 8 percent of the Hispanic vote in 2002 before the 2003 redistricting replaced 100,000 Hispanics with white voters -- national Democrats have infused the race with staff support and media buys. Former president Bill

Clinton campaigned for Rodriguez on Sunday in San Antonio while Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) stumped with Bonilla in nearby Hondo.

Since Nov. 7, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has spent almost $900,000, more than two-thirds of it toward television and direct-mail advertising, for the cash-strapped Rodriguez campaign to counter Bonilla's runoff war chest of $1.6 million.

"We're committed to seeing Ciro cross the finish line to victory," said Adrienne Elrod, a spokeswoman for the DCCC. "This is a very competitive race."

State Democrats are running an aggressive Spanish-language media campaign and have raised more than $100,000 to beef up voter-turnout efforts.

"Let's give the GOP one more surprise by taking out another Tom DeLay Republican," wrote Texas Democratic Chairman Boyd L. Richie in a letter to party activists.

Bonilla said he is not concerned. He emphasizes he has run and won previously in 19 of the 20 counties that comprise the new district and that much of the area, which stretches from San Antonio 700 miles west to El Paso County, is largely conservative. Bonilla was endorsed by the San Antonio Express-News, which cited his seniority and his seat on the House Appropriations Committee.

Bonilla has focused his campaign on friendly audiences, such as at a recent high school football playoff game in San Antonio's Alamodome. The team from Hondo, a Bonilla stronghold in Republican-leaning Medina County, played and won, and Bonilla took advantage of halftime to work some of the crowd, hot dog and soda in hand. "Runoffs are all about getting your people out one more time. It's not a time to convert voters," Bonilla said.

The Supreme Court added to the district the heavily Democratic south side of San Antonio, which Rodriguez represented until he lost his seat after the 2003 redistricting. He has focused efforts on meeting voters in the sprawling district, espousing support for Democratic positions on raising the minimum wage, universal health care and a cheaper Medicare prescription plan.

"We saw in November that people have had enough, and Bonilla has been part of the leadership supporting the [Bush] administration on Iraq and other issues," Rodriguez said following a recent neighborhood forum in northwest San Antonio.

Runoff In Redrawn Texas District Could Be A Tight Race (LAT)

By Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

HOUSTON — One of the nation's last unresolved House races will be decided Tuesday when seven-term Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla faces former congressman Ciro Rodriguez in an unusual runoff in a newly redrawn district.

In a special election Nov. 7, a well-financed Bonilla won 49% of the vote, just shy of the majority he needed to win outright.

Rodriguez, 59, who represented a neighboring district in the House from 1997 to 2005, finished second with about 20% of the vote.

Bonilla, 52, was at one time strongly favored to win without a runoff. Though his conservative stands on issues such as immigration had eroded Latino support, a 2003 redistricting plan engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay minimized the problem by cutting the number of Latino precincts in Bonilla's district. In 2004, Bonilla won with 69% of the vote.

However, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that the new district lines unconstitutionally diluted minority votes. A panel of three federal judges reconfigured the district in August.

In its current form, the 23rd congressional district — the largest in Texas — stretches from San Antonio to the Texas-Mexico border and out to far West Texas. Sixty-one percent of the district's voting-age population is Latino, compared with 51% in 2004.

Now that Democrats have taken over Congress, there's a new dynamic in play, said Andy Hernandez, a political scientist at the University of Texas at San Antonio.

"I think ordinary Democratic voters are hepped up and there's a growing energy to beat Bonilla and finish the job in Texas," Hernandez said. "I don't think his conservative Anglo base has enough enthusiasm to save him."

Larry Hufford, a political scientist at St. Mary's University in San Antonio, disagreed, saying voter turnout in runoff elections is notoriously low in the south Bexar County precincts that are Rodriguez's strength.

"If early voting and turnout in this election parallels past elections, Republicans will turn out in higher numbers and Bonilla should win," Hufford said.

The latest public poll shows Bonilla leading Rodriguez 53% to 46%, but the race could be much tighter, Hernandez said.

"If Henry Bonilla couldn't win outright in the special election with his money and name recognition, he's in deep trouble," Hernandez said.

DOJ_NMG_0104509

Campaign finance reports show that as of Nov. 22, Bonilla, with $955,000, had almost 10 times the cash on hand as Rodriguez, with $94,000. But the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has reportedly spent about $871,000 on Rodriguez's behalf.

The candidates have spent much of the money on attack ads but, in a district largely bordered to the south by Mexico, have avoided the topic of immigration. Bonilla voted in favor of a 700-mile border fence; Rodriguez has said he would not have. The topic isn't listed as an issue on either candidate's campaign website.

"They're scared" to talk about it, Hufford said, perhaps because missteps could alienate one or more groups in a diverse district voting population: West Texas ranchers, Latinos in border towns, Republicans on the north side of San Antonio and Democrats in the south.

Chad Foster, president of the Texas Border Coalition, a group of border mayors and judges, said Bonilla's vote in favor of the fence angered many in the area. "I don't think the fence is realistic. It's an 18th century solution to a 21st century problem," said Foster, who also is mayor of the Texas border town Eagle Pass.

However, Bonilla spokesman Phil Ricks said border sheriffs believed the fence would curb drug smuggling and human trafficking. "People are in favor of the fence," he said.

Bonilla won the majority of the west Texas counties in his district during the special election.

Tuesday's runoff falls on a holy day for many Roman Catholic Latinos — the Feast of the Virgin of Guadalupe.

Latino groups protested when Texas Gov. Rick Perry set the date, saying it was an attempt to help Bonilla by suppressing the Latino vote. But after early voting was extended, the Justice Department approved the runoff date.

Negative Campaigning Marks Texas Runoff (AP)

By Elizabeth White

AP, December 10, 2006

It's been a month since control of Congress was decided, but Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla and Democrat Ciro Rodriguez are still campaigning as if the balance hangs on the outcome of their runoff.

For incumbent Bonilla, a victory at the polls Tuesday would give him an eighth term representing Texas' largest congressional district, the 23rd.

For Rodriguez, it would mean a return trip to Washington after a two-year absence. He served in Congress during 1997-2005 but was ousted in the 2004 by Rep. Henry Cuellar.

Neither Bonilla nor Rodriguez received 50 percent of the vote in a crowded field Nov. 7.

Bonilla has been airing TV commercials criticizing Rodriguez for past votes, including one against establishing the Homeland Security Department. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is airing ads for Rodriguez that attack Bonilla for what it says are cuts in veterans and military benefits.

Rodriguez resurrected reports that Bonilla employed an illegal immigrant British nanny for almost seven years, a small scandal that erupted in 1994. The Justice Department investigated but declined to charge anyone.

Rodriguez said he's relying on voters' dissatisfaction with Bonilla.

"They'll vote for you because they like you, but they'll also vote for you because they dislike the other guy," Rodriguez said. "You get them whichever way you can."

In a campaign this short, turnout from the base will be the key to a victory for either candidate, said Jason Casellas, assistant professor in government at the University of Texas at Austin.

"The people who are going to turn out in a special election are going to be the partisans," Casellas said.

A Rodriguez victory would be an additional blow to the Texas redistricting plan engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay in 2003, which allowed the GOP to pick up several congressional seats, said Gary Keith, a senior lecturer in government at UT Austin.

The DeLay plan moved 100,000 predominantly Democratic Laredo Hispanics out of the 23rd and into another district. However, the Supreme Court ruled in June that the new district unconstitutionally diluted Hispanic voting strength, and a new map was drawn in August by a three-judge panel.

Rodriguez lost to Cuellar in this year's District 28 primary. The redistricting put his San Antonio home in the redrawn District 23, allowing him to enter the race against Bonilla — with the endorsement of Cuellar.

The 23rd stretches along the Mexican border from San Antonio to the eastern edge of El Paso, yet immigration isn't listed on either of the Hispanic candidates' Web sites. Bonilla voted to build a border fence to fight illegal immigration; Rodriguez said he would not have.

DOJ_NMG_0104510

"Because (immigration) is so divisive, which of the candidates could use the issue to really boost their turnout without really angering the opposition and boosting their turnout?" Keith said. "It may be an issue that's too radioactive. ... Because it could blow up on you as much as it could help you."

Clinton Makes S.A. Stop To Stir Rodriguez Crowd (SAEN)

By Greg Jefferson

San Antonio Express News, December 11, 2006

In a hot, crowded gymnasium Sunday, former President Clinton sought to wind up supporters of Democrat Ciro Rodriguez enough to unseat Rep. Henry Bonilla and strengthen the Democratic Party's hold on Congress.

Rodriguez's campaign stop at Palo Alto College came less than two days before the runoff in Congressional District 23 between the former congressman and the Republican incumbent.

"You couldn't have a clearer choice. You couldn't have a better candidate," Clinton told a throng of cheering supporters. "And you've got just about 48 hours to bring it home."

Democrats picked up 29 congressional seats this year, Clinton noted, but they also lost 10 races by slim margins.

"You have to decide whether this House seat is going to be with the 29 or the 10," Clinton said.

"On Nov. 7, voters across the country voted for change," Rodriguez said. "This Tuesday, voters across this district are going to vote one more time for change."

Clinton, meanwhile, laced his nearly 20-minute stump speech with shots at congressional Republican leadership and Bonilla. At one point, he highlighted the seven-term congressman's votes against increasing the minimum wage.

Later, Bonilla spokesman Phil Ricks defended his boss' minimum-wage votes.

"All of the small-business owners ... tell him that if they had to pay a higher minimum wage, they would have to lay off workers in order to do that," he said. "Funny that they didn't mention that during the rally."

Bonilla spent Sunday afternoon campaigning in Hondo with Republican Sen. John Cornyn. Ricks said President Bush's nephew George P. Bush, a Dallas attorney, would make an appearance today at Bonilla's campaign headquarters at 1:30 p.m.

Bonilla emerged from the Nov. 7 seven-way special election just shy of the majority he needed to avoid a runoff. Rodriguez followed with 20 percent.

Ricks said Clinton's San Antonio stop would only help fire up Bonilla's base because of Clinton administration policies and the Monica Lewinsky scandal.

"This is someone who committed a despicable act in the Oval Office, lied about it and then got impeached," Ricks said. "And now he's campaigning side-by-side with Ciro Rodriguez."

On Friday, after learning of Clinton's plan to stop in San Antonio, Ricks said the former president was out of touch with District 23 voters.

Clinton mocked that contention at Sunday's rally, saying his administration had overseen high job growth, expansion of the middle-class and reduction in poverty.

"America is about empowerment," he said. "This election will be determined by whether people understand that."

The race is expected go to the candidate who can best fire up his base of supporters to get to the polls Tuesday — a theme Clinton and several other speakers hammered on Sunday.

"We need more people to be there on Tuesday than ever before, or we will lose," said U.S. Rep. Charlie Gonzalez, a San Antonio Democrat.

Former Mayor Henry Cisneros, who served as secretary of housing and urban development under Clinton, called last month's election results "a political earthquake." He urged the crowd to keep the Democratic momentum going.

Together, Va.'s Elite Democrats Target GOP (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

It was Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine's party, but two other Democratic stars seemed to dominate a reception in Tysons Corner last week to raise money to help unseat Republicans in the General Assembly.

Former governor Mark R. Warner and Sen.-elect James Webb arrived early and stayed late as they greeted contributors to Kaine's political action committee, which plans to help finance Democratic candidates next year.

What was unthinkable in Virginia six months ago is now the political reality: With Webb's election last month, the state has three prominent Democrats who say they are working as a team to build the party in a historically Republican state. Their first mission is trying to defeat Republicans in next year's legislative races.

DOJ_NMG_0104511

"I want to use my personal energies and the energies of my office in the right sense of the word to help Tim Kaine have the right kind of majority next year," Webb told the donors, adding that he will help recruit candidates and campaign extensively for them.

Warner, one of the state's most popular politicians who recently said he will not run for president in 2008, was also schmoozing as if his own campaign were on the line.

"I clearly intend to be active in the Virginia General Assembly races," said Warner, whom political insiders mention as a possible candidate for governor or U.S. senator.

Six years ago, it appeared as if the state's Democratic Party was on the verge of irrelevancy, with Republicans having won two successive governor's races and holding both U.S. Senate seats and majorities in the Virginia House and Senate.

But today, Democrats are the ones who can point to two straight victories for governor -- Warner in 2001 and Kaine last year -- as well as Webb's narrow win over Sen. George Allen (R).

Virginia Republicans claimed some wins last month, keeping a majority of the state's congressional seats and holding on to the top Prince William County government job. But Republicans say they are worried about gains Democrats have made in recent elections.

Despite competing in General Assembly districts whose boundaries were drawn by the GOP, Democrats have picked up seats, giving Kaine hope that the party can reclaim the Senate and make inroads in the House in 2007.

Democrats need to win four seats to reclaim the Senate and nine to 11 seats to retake the House, depending on which party three independents align with.

Legislative races are traditionally decided on local issues. But Kaine, who is frustrated by Republican efforts to stymie his plans to raise money for transportation projects, is hoping to turn next year's elections into a referendum on the GOP's priorities.

Kaine raised about $1 million at two events last week for his political action committee, Move Virginia Forward, and said he plans to campaign next year "as if my own name is on the ballot."

His political action committee has one goal, he said: "to find partners" in the General Assembly.

Republican Del. L. Scott Lingamfelter of Prince William, one of the lawmakers Democrats are targeting, said Kaine is "always focused on campaigning as opposed to governance."

"The governor has chosen the path of starting the November 2007 campaign in November 2006," Lingamfelter said. "The people want us to stop the bickering and do the people's work. All I hear from the other side is campaign, campaign, campaign."

Kaine has said he will have several initiatives in the coming year, including pushing for additional funding for health care, pre-kindergarten programs and open-space acquisition.

Virginia GOP Chairman Ed Gillespie acknowledged the strength of the Democrats.

"There is no doubt they are going to wage a very aggressive effort to retake the Senate and make gains in the House, and they are in a position to raise significant resources to fund efforts to do that, and we have to do everything we can to counter that," Gillespie said.

The Democrats plan to focus on unseating Republican lawmakers in Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads, two traffic-clogged areas where Webb and Kaine did well in their races.

In Northern Virginia, Republican Dels. Vincent F. Callahan Jr. and Timothy D. Hugo of Fairfax, Lingamfelter and Jeffrey M. Frederick, also of Prince William, can expect stiff challenges, Democratic leaders say. Senate Democrats hope to unseat Sen. Jeannemarie Devolites Davis (R-Fairfax), among others.

"We are organized and hungry," said Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Alexandria), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "We've had enough wins. We feel confident."

Despite recent successes, there are plenty of signs that Virginia remains anything but a Democratic-leaning state.

Although Webb beat gaffe-prone Allen by about 9,000 votes, Democrats didn't pick up any congressional seats. Voters also overwhelmingly approved a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, which Kaine had campaigned against.

In Prince William, where Democrats are hoping to make gains, Republican Corey A. Stewart easily won the chairmanship of the Board of County Supervisors. Jackson H. Miller, a conservative Republican, also won a special election in Manassas to succeed the late moderate Republican Harry J. Parrish in the House.

"You had a Republican win on a positive message of low taxes and controlling growth in Prince William County," Lingamfelter said.

"We are still a right-of-center state," said Sen. R. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), who narrowly lost his bid for attorney general last year. "While parts of Northern Virginia are blue . . . we still have a lot of work to do."

Some Democratic activists and political bloggers have been critical of the Virginia Democratic Party for not doing more to win lower-profile races by rallying the grass roots of the party.

DOJ_NMG_0104512

During Webb's campaign, they noted, large parts of the party structure didn't become fully engaged until the fall, when it became clear that Allen could lose.

"Obviously, we have to do better," said Lowell Feld, founder of RaisingKaine, a blog that served as a focal point for grass-roots efforts to elect Kaine last year and Webb this year. "Webb won, but we didn't win any of the [congressional] races. . . . We are really going to have to crank it up."

Political analysts say Webb, who brought several thousand activists into the party for the first time, Kaine and Warner may prove a formidable team.

"It's becoming almost a perfect storm for Democrats in Virginia," said Sean O'Brien, executive director of the Sorenson Institute for Political Leadership at the University of Virginia. "You got a recipe for a Democratic Party that is going to be united like you have never seen before in Virginia."

Although they have a common goal, the three might have separate motivations for becoming involved next year:

Kaine needs more Democrats in the General Assembly to further his agenda. Warner needs to continue to maintain his goodwill with Democratic activists in case he runs for governor in 2009. Webb, a former Republican, wants to test his brand of populism as well as repay Kaine for helping get him elected.

But it remains to be seen what, if any, impact Kaine, Warner and Webb will have on local races, especially in districts where voters are prone to split their tickets.

Last year, Del. David B. Albo (R-Fairfax) and Frederick won their races even though Kaine swamped Republican challenger Jerry Kilgore in their districts.

And despite pledges of unity, some Democrats say that with so many high-profile politicians on the same stage, it's only a matter of time before ego-driven divisions start to emerge.

"We'll just have to buy a bigger tent," Moran said. "It's a nice problem to have."

U.S. News and World Report, December 11, 2006

To tell the truth and shame the devil, newly minted presidential candidate Tom Vilsack's top issue of energy independence is a snoozer. Yes, yes, of course conservation, energy usage, and fuel supplies are superimportant, but it's a tough opener for the outgoing Iowa governor, who's expected to face Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama, and other Democratic superstars in 2008. That is, until he cites God's endorsement. It's right there in his church bulletin.

In two interviews, he says energy security trumps partisanship. For proof, he pulls out a tattered copy of the October 7-8 bulletin from Des Moines's St. Catherine of Siena that lists several conservation tips. "My God," he says, "this has the opportunity to unite the country." A little homework found that even local evangelical ministers were preaching energy security. "People take this notion very seriously that God has given us this gift and we have this responsibility to extend that gift," he says.

He can thank Al Gore and Sister JoAnne Talarico, the church's office manager, for the endorsement. She tells us that after St. Catherine's showed Gore's global warming movie An Inconvenient Truth, she started putting tips in the bulletin. "It would be nice," says Sister JoAnne, "if it would become a real issue." How can Vilsack thank her? Send the church some energy-saving tips of his own. "I think I've run out of all I had," she says.

A Second Act in Cyberspace

Tom DeLay's back, this time on the Internet. Friends tell us that the powerful former House majority leader, dubbed the "Hammer" for his tough persuasion tactics, this week unveils TomDeLay.com, where he'll blog-DeLay's Daily-on newsy issues and build a coalition he's calling Grassroots, Action, and Information Network. Sources said the right-leaning Texan will give GAIN members insider information on the conservative movement and urge them to step in on key issues. And Democrats need not apply: His site will have a way to filter them out.

Getting Mushy in His Fine Old Age

Those weren't tears of pain former President Bush shed last week during a tribute to his son Jeb, Florida's outgoing governor. Just the opposite. Family friends say the old guy is getting more emotional and has been prone to joyful crying jags when bragging on his kids. And-bless his heart-he doesn't try to stop it; he just lets the tears pour out. His buddies tell us that Bush, 82, also gets weepy when discussing the importance of his family and the blessings he has enjoyed throughout his life. "He has always been an emotional guy," says a pal.

What's Wrong? Don't You Trust Us?

"Oh, no you won't" is the reaction of cops and other first responders to an almost rude FBI decision to ask its Joint Terrorism Task Force members to take a lie detector test. To the FBI, it's a smart move: Since 9/11, the task force of federal and local officials has expanded to some 1,500 in over a hundred offices nationwide. But to some members it's a slap, and something that could hurt their careers if the polygraph-whose accuracy is widely questioned by scientists-burps out an error. Joining local cops in opposition are agents with the Homeland Security Department's Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Wash. State Sees Results From 'Plain Talk' Initiative (USAT/AP)

By Rachel La Corte

USA Today, December 11, 2006

OLYMPIA, Wash. — Washington state officials want to deploy changes to alleviate state personnel's employment of acronyms, jargon and legalese that routinely pervade interfaces with constituents. Or, in plain speak: Talk to the public as you would talk to any other person — simply, and in clear language.

In the 20 months since Gov. Chris Gregoire ordered all state agencies to adopt "plain talk" principles, more than 2,000 state employees have attended classes on writing letters, announcements and documents in everyday language.

Words such as abeyance, cease and utilize are out, replaced by suspension, stop and use.

"If people are able to apply for an environmental permit and get it right the first time because they were able to understand it, that's success," said Larisa Benson, director of the Government Management Accountability and Performance program.

When people know what the government asks of them, there's a better chance they'll comply, officials have found.

For example, by rewriting one letter, the Department of Revenue tripled the number of businesses paying the "use tax," the widely ignored equivalent of sales tax on products purchased out of state. That meant an extra $800,000 collected over two years by the department, which had started its own plain-talk initiative before the governor's order.

"Simple changes can have profound results," said Janet Shimabukuro, manager of the department's taxpayer services program. "Plain talk isn't only rewriting, it's rethinking your approach and really personalizing your message to the audience and to the reader."

Though other states have done similar work, Washington state is believed to be the first to have a full-scale effort, said Thom Haller, executive director of the Center for Plain Language in Washington, D.C.

The non-profit center urges government and business officials to use clear, understandable language in laws and other public communication.

In 1997, newly elected Gov. Gary Locke issued an executive order requiring the Washington Administrative Code to be written and organized in a more simple way.

Around that time, some state agencies started using plain-language rules for training, on websites and in letters to the public.

The government of the District of Columbia started a plain-language initiative in 2004, and many federal agencies have such programs as well, Haller said.

"We're seeing them embrace it because they're recognizing that clarity in structure and language is important," he said. "It enables people to get their jobs done more efficiently."

How did state workers start speaking bureaucratic gobbledygook?

"It's almost as if we have hundreds of different tribes out there with different languages," said Dana Howard Botka, the plain-language program coordinator for Gregoire. "Knowing the language of that tribe is essential to belonging to it. There's pride in knowing the language of your profession."

Writing consultant Sharon Bridwell, who teaches up to three classes a month for state employees, said her students need help breaking old habits.

At a recent class in Olympia, Bridwell used slides and easels to write out pointers such as keeping sentences short.

Rich Coleman, a project manager with the state Employment Security Department, said he would try to be more concise in his letters to the public.

"I'm more wordy than I would like to be," said Coleman, who corresponds with prisoners or their families to help them rejoin the workforce. "It's an opportunity to see that the less I write, the more effective I am in getting the information across."

Botka said the heart of the plain-talk initiative is to get state workers to think about the person who is reading the document or the Web page before they write it.

"We're talking about people's rights and benefits," she said. "If they can't understand them, then they really don't have access to their government."

Sponsorship Pulls Arena Into Nuclear Debate (NYT)

By Martin Stolz

New York Times, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104514

SALT LAKE CITY, Dec. 8 — Utah officials hope that the state's image can be best defined by its vast public lands and unspoiled forests, lakes and mountains.

But some here fear that a recent change in the name of the city's professional basketball arena may create for Utah new and far less savory associations with corruption and nuclear waste.

Since the arena's opening in 1991 as the home of the Utah Jazz, it was called the Delta Center, for Delta Air Lines, which struck the original deal for naming rights with Larry H. Miller, the team's owner. But in November, a hazardous waste services company based here, EnergySolutions, outbid bankrupt Delta to win a 10-year naming-rights contract.

The winning bid, the price of which neither side would disclose, has created the EnergySolutions Arena.

Steve Creamer, the company's president, is looking to overcome the negative publicity that the company, known until 10 months ago as Envirocare of Utah, has received over its operation of a large nuclear waste facility in the Utah desert.

EnergySolutions was formed in February by the merger of three companies, including Envirocare, which set up the nuclear waste facility on public land in 1988 with the approval of Larry F. Anderson, then director of the Utah Division of Radiation Control.

Mr. Anderson was later convicted on federal bribery charges of taking cash and a condominium in the resort town of Park City from Envirocare's founder and former owner, Khosrow B. Semnani. Mr. Semnani pleaded guilty to a charge of tax evasion.

The state has granted EnergySolutions a license to double the size of the low-level nuclear waste site, to about two square miles, though the approval is not final, in part because the Legislature and the governor also must have a say. But an antinuclear group, the Healthy Environment Alliance of Utah, or Heal Utah, has sued the state to revoke the license, and that is also delaying the expansion. The alliance also opposes the company's plan to expand the nuclear waste facility to a height of about eight stories.

On her way into a recent Jazz game, Leslie Birkett, a 42-year-old advertising executive from Kearns, said she had heard the nicknames for the arena: HazzMat Center, Half-Life Arena, Radium Stadium, the Tox Box.

"Utah already has enough strikes against it," Ms. Birkett said. "This is the last thing we need."

More disgusted was Tom Kessler, 66, a hard-core fan wearing a leather Jazz jacket. "Utah's always been the 'stick-it' state; whatever you don't want in your state, stick it here," said Mr. Kessler, an executive with a medical device company. "We're not tree huggers, but these guys lend credence to bringing all this stuff to Utah. It's bogus."

But another Jazz fan, Weston Anderson, 21, of West Valley City, felt differently. He first learned about the company when he passed people carrying signs at a pregame protest sponsored by Heal Utah, Mr. Anderson said. The arena's new name does not roll off the tongue, he said, "but I don't have a problem with that line of business because I believe in the free market."

The alliance has called on Mr. Miller to rescind the naming-rights deal, and on consumers to boycott his other businesses, which include car dealerships, movie theaters, a television station and an auto racetrack.

Mr. Miller issued a statement saying he was proud of his association with EnergySolutions.

Mr. Creamer has said his company is vital to Utah's future, has brought dozens of talented scientists and engineers to the state, and hopes to become a worldwide business for transporting, processing, storing and disposing of radioactive materials.

The company recently won a federal grant to study sites that might be used for reprocessing nuclear fuel, a recycling process in which plutonium is extracted from spent fuel and mixed with uranium to make new fuel.

But this year, the company had a setback with the Utah government. Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. vetoed legislation that would have made it easier for the state to approve proposals for new or expanded nuclear waste sites.

In a letter to state legislators, Mr. Huntsman said the bill would have weakened the governor's authority "to protect Utah's image and environment." His administration has invested in strengthening Utah's image as a welcoming place for tourists, especially those attracted to outdoor activities in the state's mountains and forests. Part of that push has been a multimillion-dollar advertising campaign, "Utah: Life Elevated," featuring the state's landmarks and landscapes.

EnergySolutions also has embarked on a media campaign, emphasizing the company's environmental cleanups nationwide and the safety of its operations.

Kedrick Black, a 26-year-old electrical engineer and Jazz fan, said he learned about the company from its advertisements. "It's a good company," Mr. Black said. "Yes, they handle nuclear waste, but they're making it safer."

Vanessa Pierce, executive director of Heal Utah, does not see it quite that way. EnergySolutions' advertisements "make it look like they're curing cancer and building golf courses" and solving global warming, Ms. Pierce said. She accused the company of trying to mislead the public by promoting a wholesome image to gain support for the waste site expansion.

At the protest outside the arena, Louis Borgenicht, 64, a Salt Lake City pediatrician, told those gathered that EnergySolutions officials "are part of the problem, not, as they claim, part of the solution."

How To Bring Our Schools Out Of The 20th Century (TIME)

By Claudia Wallis, Sonja Steptoe

Time, December 11, 2006

There's a dark little joke exchanged by educators with a dissident streak: Rip Van Winkle awakens in the 21st century after a hundred-year snooze and is, of course, utterly bewildered by what he sees. Men and women dash about, talking to small metal devices pinned to their ears. Young people sit at home on sofas, moving miniature athletes around on electronic screens. Older folk defy death and disability with metronomes in their chests and with hips made of metal and plastic. Airports, hospitals, shopping malls--every place Rip goes just baffles him. But when he finally walks into a schoolroom, the old man knows exactly where he is. "This is a school," he declares. "We used to have these back in 1906. Only now the blackboards are green."

American schools aren't exactly frozen in time, but considering the pace of change in other areas of life, our public schools tend to feel like throwbacks. Kids spend much of the day as their great-grandparents once did: sitting in rows, listening to teachers lecture, scribbling notes by hand, reading from textbooks that are out of date by the time they are printed. A yawning chasm (with an emphasis on yawning) separates the world inside the schoolhouse from the world outside.

For the past five years, the national conversation on education has focused on reading scores, math tests and closing the "achievement gap" between social classes. This is not a story about that conversation. This is a story about the big public conversation the nation is not having about education, the one that will ultimately determine not merely whether some fraction of our children get "left behind" but also whether an entire generation of kids will fail to make the grade in the global economy because they can't think their way through abstract problems, work in teams, distinguish good information from bad or speak a language other than English.

This week the conversation will burst onto the front page, when the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, a high-powered, bipartisan assembly of Education Secretaries and business, government and other education leaders releases a blueprint for rethinking American education from pre-K to 12 and beyond to better prepare students to thrive in the global economy. While that report includes some controversial proposals, there is nonetheless a remarkable consensus among educators and business and policy leaders on one key conclusion: we need to bring what we teach and how we teach into the 21st century.

Right now we're aiming too low. Competency in reading and math--the focus of so much No Child Left Behind (NCLB) testing--is the meager minimum. Scientific and technical skills are, likewise, utterly necessary but insufficient. Today's economy demands not only a high-level competence in the traditional academic disciplines but also what might be called 21st century skills. Here's what they are:

Knowing more about the world. Kids are global citizens now, even in small-town America, and they must learn to act that way. Mike Eskew, CEO of UPS, talks about needing workers who are "global trade literate, sensitive to foreign cultures, conversant in different languages"--not exactly strong points in the U.S., where fewer than half of high school students are enrolled in a foreign-language class and where the social-studies curriculum tends to fixate on U.S. history.

Thinking outside the box. Jobs in the new economy--the ones that won't get outsourced or automated--"put an enormous premium on creative and innovative skills, seeing patterns where other people see only chaos," says Marc Tucker, an author of the skills-commission report and president of the National Center on Education and the Economy. Traditionally that's been an American strength, but schools have become less daring in the back-to-basics climate of NCLB. Kids also must learn to think across disciplines, since that's where most new breakthroughs are made. It's interdisciplinary combinations--design and technology, mathematics and art--"that produce YouTube and Google," says Thomas Friedman, the best-selling author of The World Is Flat.

Becoming smarter about new sources of information. In an age of overflowing information and proliferating media, kids need to rapidly process what's coming at them and distinguish between what's reliable and what isn't. "It's important that students know how to manage it, interpret it, validate it, and how to act on it," says Dell executive Karen Bruett, who serves on the board of the Partnership for 21st Century Skills, a group of corporate and education leaders focused on upgrading American education.

Developing good people skills. EQ, or emotional intelligence, is as important as IQ for success in today's workplace. "Most innovations today involve large teams of people," says former Lockheed Martin CEO Norman Augustine. "We have to emphasize communication skills, the ability to work in teams and with people from different cultures."

Can our public schools, originally designed to educate workers for agrarian life and industrial-age factories, make the necessary shifts? The Skills commission will argue that it's possible only if we add new depth and rigor to our curriculum and standardized exams, redeploy the dollars we spend on education, reshape the teaching force and reorganize who runs the schools. But without waiting for such a revolution, enterprising administrators around the country have begun to update their schools, often with ideas and support from local businesses. The state of Michigan, conceding that it can no longer count on the ailing auto industry to absorb its poorly educated and low-skilled workers, is retooling its high schools, instituting what are among the most rigorous graduation requirements in the nation. Elsewhere, organizations like the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching and the Asia Society are pouring money and expertise into model programs to show the way.

What It Means to Be a Global Student

Quick! How many ways can you combine nickels, dimes and pennies to get 20¢? That's the challenge for students in a second-grade math class at Seattle's John Stanford International School, and hands are flying up with answers. The students sit at tables of four manipulating play money. One boy shouts "10 plus 10"; a girl offers "10 plus 5 plus 5," only it sounds like this: "Ju, tasu, go, tasu, go." Down the hall, third-graders are learning to interpret charts and graphs showing how many hours of sleep people need at different ages. "¿Cuantas horas duerme un bebé?" asks the teacher Sabrina Storlie.

This public elementary school has taken the idea of global education and run with it. All students take some classes in either Japanese or Spanish. Other subjects are taught in English, but the content has an international flavor. The school pulls its 393 students from the surrounding highly diverse neighborhood and by lottery from other parts of the city. Generally, its scores on state tests are at or above average, although those exams barely scratch the surface of what Stanford students learn.

Before opening the school seven years ago, principal Karen Kodama surveyed 1,500 business leaders on which languages to teach (plans for Mandarin were dropped for lack of classroom space) and which skills and disciplines. "No. 1 was technology," she recalls. Even first-graders at Stanford begin to use PowerPoint and Internet tools. "Exposure to world cultures was also an important trait cited by the executives," says Kodama, so that instead of circling back to the Pilgrims and Indians every autumn, children at Stanford do social-studies units on Asia, Africa, Australia, Mexico and South America. Students actively apply the lessons in foreign language and culture by video-conferencing with sister schools in Japan, Africa and Mexico, by exchanging messages, gifts and joining in charity projects.

Stanford International shows what's possible for a public elementary school, although it has the rare advantage of support from corporations like Nintendo and Starbucks, which contribute to its $1.7 million-a-year budget. Still, dozens of U.S. school districts have found ways to orient some of their students toward the global economy. Many have opened schools that offer the international baccalaureate (I.B.) program, a rigorous, off-the-shelf curriculum recognized by universities around the world and first introduced in 1968--well before globalization became a buzzword.

To earn an I.B. diploma, students must prove written and spoken proficiency in a second language, write a 4,000-word college-level research paper, complete a real-world service project and pass rigorous oral and written subject exams. Courses offer an international perspective, so even a lesson on the American Revolution will interweave sources from Britain and France with views from the Founding Fathers. "We try to build something we call international mindedness," says Jeffrey Beard, director general of the International Baccalaureate Organization in Geneva, Switzerland. "These are students who can grasp issues across national borders. They have an understanding of nuances and complexity and a balanced approach to problem solving." Despite stringent certification requirements, I.B. schools are growing in the U.S.--from about 350 in 2000 to 682 today. The U.S. Department of Education has a pilot effort to bring the program to more low-income students.

Real Knowledge in the Google Era

Learn the names of all the rivers in South America. That was the assignment given to Deborah Stipek's daughter Meredith in school, and her mom, who's dean of the Stanford University School of Education, was not impressed. "That's silly," Stipek told her daughter. "Tell your teacher that if you need to know anything besides the Amazon, you can look it up on Google." Any number of old-school assignments--memorizing the battles of the Civil War or the periodic table of the elements--now seem faintly absurd. That kind of information, which is poorly retained unless you routinely use it, is available at a keystroke. Still, few would argue that an American child shouldn't learn the causes of the Civil War or understand how the periodic table reflects the atomic structure and properties of the elements. As school critic E.D. Hirsch Jr. points out in his book, The Knowledge Deficit, kids need a substantial fund of information just to make sense of reading materials beyond the grade-school level. Without mastering the fundamental building blocks of math, science or history, complex concepts are impossible.

Many analysts believe that to achieve the right balance between such core knowledge and what educators call "portable skills"--critical thinking, making connections between ideas and knowing how to keep on learning--the U.S. curriculum needs to become more like that of Singapore, Belgium and Sweden, whose students outperform American students on math and science tests. Classes in these countries dwell on key concepts that are taught in depth and in careful sequence, as opposed to a succession of forgettable details so often served in U.S. classrooms. Textbooks and tests support this approach. "Countries from Germany to Singapore have extremely small textbooks that focus on the most powerful and generative ideas," says Roy Pea, co-director of the Stanford Center for Innovations in Learning. These might be the key theorems in math, the laws of thermodynamics in science or the relationship between supply and demand in economics. America's bloated textbooks, by contrast, tend to gallop through a mind-numbing stream of topics and subtopics in an attempt to address a vast range of state standards.

DOJ_NMG_0104517

Depth over breadth and the ability to leap across disciplines are exactly what teachers aim for at the Henry Ford Academy, a public charter school in Dearborn, Mich. This fall, 10th-graders in Charles Dershimer's science class began a project that combines concepts from earth science, chemistry, business and design. After reading about Nike's efforts to develop a more environmentally friendly sneaker, students had to choose a consumer product, analyze and explain its environmental impact and then develop a plan for re-engineering it to reduce pollution costs without sacrificing its commercial appeal. Says Dershimer: "It's a challenge for them and for me."

A New Kind of Literacy

The juniors in Bill Stroud's class are riveted by a documentary called Loose Change unspooling on a small TV screen at the Baccalaureate School for Global Education, in urban Astoria, N.Y. The film uses 9/11 footage and interviews with building engineers and Twin Towers survivors to make an oddly compelling if paranoid case that interior explosions unrelated to the impact of the airplanes brought down the World Trade Center on that fateful day. Afterward, the students--an ethnic mix of New Yorkers with their own 9/11 memories--dive into a discussion about the elusive nature of truth.

Raya Harris finds the video more convincing than the official version of the facts. Marisa Reichel objects. "Because of a movie, you are going to change your beliefs?" she demands. "Just because people heard explosions doesn't mean there were explosions. You can say you feel the room spinning, but it isn't." This kind of discussion about what we know and how we know it is typical of a theory of knowledge class, a required element for an international-baccalaureate diploma. Stroud has posed this question to his class on the blackboard: "If truth is difficult to prove in history, does it follow that all versions are equally acceptable?"

Throughout the year, the class will examine news reports, websites, propaganda, history books, blogs, even pop songs. The goal is to teach kids to be discerning consumers of information and to research, formulate and defend their own views, says Stroud, who is founder and principal of the four-year-old public school, which is located in a repurposed handbag factory.

Classes like this, which teach key aspects of information literacy, remain rare in public education, but more and more universities and employers say they are needed as the world grows ever more deluged with information of variable quality. Last year, in response to demand from colleges, the Educational Testing Service unveiled a new, computer-based exam designed to measure information-and-communication-technology literacy. A pilot study of the test with 6,200 high school seniors and college freshmen found that only half could correctly judge the objectivity of a website. "Kids tend to go to Google and cut and paste a research report together," says Terry Egan, who led the team that developed the new test. "We kind of assumed this generation was so comfortable with technology that they know how to use it for research and deeper thinking," says Egan. "But if they're not taught these skills, they don't necessarily pick them up."

Learning 2.0

The chairman of Sun Microsystems was up against one of the most vexing challenges of modern life: a third-grade science project. Scott McNealy had spent hours searching the Web for a lively explanation of electricity that his son could understand. "Finally I found a very nice, animated, educational website showing electrons zooming around and tests after each section. We did this for about an hour and a half and had a ball--a great father-son moment of learning. All of a sudden we ran out of runway because it was a site to help welders, and it then got into welding." For McNealy the experience, three years ago, provided one of life's aha! moments: "It made me wonder why there isn't a website where I can just go and have anything I want to learn, K to 12, online, browser based and free."

Stub It Out (WP)

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

STATE LAWMAKERS in Maryland and Virginia may have heard later than most, but the debate over the health effects of secondhand smoke is over. A landmark report by the surgeon general in the summer confirmed that breathing in smoky bars, restaurants or waiting rooms causes lung cancer and heart disease, not to mention chronic coughs, irritated nostrils and, for pregnant women who wait on tables or tend bars in smoke-filled establishments, babies with lower birth weights. The report also poured cold water on complaints from restaurant and bar owners: There is growing evidence that more people will frequent restaurants and bars when a smoking ban is in place.

Sixteen states and more than 2,000 localities have prohibited smoking in bars and restaurants; in the Maryland suburbs, they include Howard, Montgomery and Prince George's counties. But so far the Maryland General Assembly has failed to follow suit, letting bills to ban smoking in such workplaces statewide die the last four years -- lately in cliffhanger votes. An attempt planned for the legislative session starting in January should stand the best chance yet of enactment -- especially if Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) throws his weight behind it.

As mayor of Baltimore, Mr. O'Malley opposed citywide smoking prohibitions, saying a statewide ban makes more sense. But now, as he prepares to move into the governor's office, he's being coy; after all, say his aides, Mr. O'Malley never committed himself to any statewide smoking ban as a candidate. That sort of caution worked well for Mr. O'Malley on the campaign trail, but as governor he will need to be more resolute. The outgoing governor, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), opposed a ban, thereby dissuading fence-sitting lawmakers from taking a chance on the bill. By backing a ban, Mr. O'Malley could tip the scales toward enactment and have a tangible, near-term impact on public health in Maryland. If, as he is fond of saying, Mr. O'Malley has no higher priority than to save lives, this is one sure way to do it.

In Virginia, the nation's third-leading tobacco-growing state, prospects for a smoking ban are cloudier. Although the state Senate passed such a prohibition last year for the first time, the measure was opposed by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) as overly broad -- it included a wide range of public places, plus most hotel rooms -- and it died in the House of Delegates. Mr. Kaine understands that secondhand smoke can kill you; in October he ordered a ban on smoking in most state government office buildings. And he says that he would be willing to consider a bill that reaches his desk, depending on its scope. But that, unfortunately, is as far as he'll go.

More forthright leadership is needed. Restaurants are prohibited from serving poisonous food, so why should they be able to subject customers to toxic air? Moreover, smoking no longer has the constituency it once did as the number of smokers nationally, and in Maryland and Virginia, has fallen in recent years, thanks to the higher cost of cigarettes and aggressive publicity campaigns. And the hospitality industry's arguments about the economic peril posed by smoking bans have crumpled like a used pack of Winstons.

Perhaps a careful reading of the surgeon general's report will help convince Maryland and Virginia governors and other officeholders that the time is right to get serious about secondhand smoke. Then-Surgeon General Richard H. Carmona said in June: "Smoke-free environments are the only approach that effectively protects nonsmokers from the dangers of secondhand smoke."

Life-or-death Data (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

YOUR MEDICAL RECORDS can save your life, or they can almost kill you. So the prospect of making them more easily accessible is at once comforting and scary — and a new effort to convert them into digital form will raise the stakes on both counts.

It's not hard to understand why. Suppose you're on vacation and become so ill you have to go to the hospital. Without your medical records, you could be given a drug that interacts badly with one you're already taking. Now imagine the same scenario, only this time you have access to all your medical and insurance records electronically. The physician examines them and gives you an appropriate drug. You recover nicely.

Now imagine a third possibility: You have your medical records — and they're not completely accurate. You get a drug you're allergic to, become even more sick and have to be admitted. Before long, lawyers become involved, subpoenaing everyone from your insurer to the datamanagement company that keeps your records.

Technology giveth, and technology taketh away. This country's medical recordkeeping system is undoubtedly outdated and inefficient, and bringing it into the 21st century will be a huge improvement. But it will create new problems as it solves old ones, and some problems it simply will port over to the digital age.

Five major U.S. corporations — Applied Materials, BP America, Intel, Pitney Bowes and Wal-Mart — who provide health benefits to 2.5 million people announced plans last week to gather employees' records from medical groups, hospitals, insurers and laboratories, then store them online. Employees can add or delete information to correct errors and fill in blanks. The main objective of the program, called Dossia and run by the nonprofit Omnimedix Institute, is to help them give complete, accurate information to their healthcare providers.

The most immediate benefit of this program, and others like it, may be to show how complex the problem is. For starters, the entire healthcare industry has to digitize its records and put them in a standard format that any doctor or hospital can use — a gargantuan task. Then there has to be a way for individuals to correct errors in the records without rendering them unreliable. The error rate is particularly high for insurance records — from 7% to 15%, according to various estimates.

Protecting health records from hackers and identity thieves is another challenge. Information brokers pay top dollar for health information — reportedly $50 per record, compared to less than $2 for a Social Security number — because they are so valuable to so many entities: drug companies, insurers, medical underwriters, health researchers and employers, to name a few.

There are scores of new initiatives such as Dossia, and all of them have weaknesses. Some appear to be good-faith efforts to give people more control over their own records and doctors access to better information. Others seem like thinly veiled marketing vehicles for drug makers and others in the healthcare industry.

To its credit, Dossia got two important things right. It won't collect employees' records without their permission. And it says it won't supply those records to anyone but the employee (or authorized family member), sacrificing some efficiency for security.

DOJ_NMG_0104519

Eventually, perhaps, the program will show the way to have both. The most important contribution Dossia is likely to make, though, is that it will show how much more work needs to be done throughout the industry to solve the medical records morass in a way that works for doctors and patients alike.

Two Mommies Is One Too Many (TIME)

By James C. Dobson

Time, December 11, 2006

A number of social conservatives, myself included, have recently been asked to respond to the news that Mary Cheney, the Vice President's daughter, is pregnant with a child she intends to raise with her lesbian partner. Implicit in this issue is an effort to get us to criticize the Bush Administration or the Cheney family. But the concern here has nothing to do with politics. It is about what kind of family environment is best for the health and development of children, and, by extension, the nation at large.

With all due respect to Cheney and her partner, Heather Poe, the majority of more than 30 years of social-science evidence indicates that children do best on every measure of well-being when raised by their married mother and father. That is not to say Cheney and Poe will not love their child. But love alone is not enough to guarantee healthy growth and development. The two most loving women in the world cannot provide a daddy for a little boy--any more than the two most loving men can be complete role models for a little girl.

The voices that argue otherwise tell us more about our politically correct culture than they do about what children really need. The fact remains that gender matters--perhaps nowhere more than in regard to child rearing. The unique value of fathers has been explained by Dr. Kyle Pruett of Yale Medical School in his book Fatherneed: Why Father Care Is as Essential as Mother Care for Your Child. Pruett says dads are critically important simply because "fathers do not mother." Psychology Today explained in 1996 that "fatherhood turns out to be a complex and unique phenomenon with huge consequences for the emotional and intellectual growth of children." A father, as a male parent, makes unique contributions to the task of parenting that a mother cannot emulate, and vice versa.

According to educational psychologist Carol Gilligan, mothers tend to stress sympathy, grace and care to their children, while fathers accent justice, fairness and duty. Moms give a child a sense of hopefulness; dads provide a sense of right and wrong and its consequences. Other researchers have determined that boys are not born with an understanding of "maleness." They have to learn it, ideally from their fathers.

But set aside the scientific findings for a minute. Isn't there something in our hearts that tells us, intuitively, that children need a mother and a father? Admittedly, that ideal is not always possible. Divorce, death, abandonment and unwed pregnancy have resulted in an ever growing number of single-parent families in this culture. We admire the millions of men and women who have risen to the challenge of parenting alone and are meeting their difficult responsibilities with courage and determination. Still, most of them, if asked, would say that raising children is a two-person job best accomplished by a mother and father.

In raising these issues, Focus on the Family does not desire to harm or insult women such as Cheney and Poe. Rather, our conviction is that birth and adoption are the purview of married heterosexual couples. Traditional marriage is God's design for the family and is rooted in biblical truth. When that divine plan is implemented, children have the best opportunity to thrive. That's why public policy as it relates to families must be based not solely on the desires of adults but rather on the needs of children and what is best for society at large.

This is a lesson we should have learned from no-fault divorce. Because adults wanted to dissolve difficult marriages with fewer strings attached, reformers made it easier in the late 1960s to dissolve nuclear families. Though there are exceptions, the legacy of no-fault divorce is countless shattered lives within three generations, adversely affecting children's behavior, academic performance and mental and physical health. No-fault divorce reflected our selfish determination to do what was convenient for adults, and it has been, on balance, a disaster.

We should not enter into yet another untested and far-reaching social experiment, this one driven by the desires of same-sex couples to bear and raise children. The traditional family, supported by more than 5,000 years of human experience, is still the foundation on which the well-being of future generations depends. Dobson is the founder and chairman of Focus on the Family

Name That Source (NYT)

By Murray Fromson

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

Los Angeles

THE article was headlined “Vietnam: The Signs of Stalemate,” and it appeared on the front page of this paper on Aug. 7, 1967. Written by R. W. Apple Jr., it was a bombshell that resonated in both Washington and Saigon, caused consternation in the United States Army and the intelligence community and gradually altered perceptions of American success or failure for the remainder of the Vietnam War.

DOJ_NMG_0104520

Over nearly four decades, dozens of historians and journalists asked Johnny (as he was known) and me, because I did a similar story for CBS, to identify our source for that report, and we steadfastly declined to name him. But now, the source has come forward to release us from our pledge of confidentiality.

In 1967, when I was a CBS News correspondent in Vietnam, I met an American general at a cocktail party in Saigon. He whispered to me: "Westy just doesn't get it. The war is unwinnable. We've reached a stalemate and we should find a dignified way out." He was referring to Gen. William Westmoreland, the commander of United States forces in Vietnam.

The reception was crowded and noisy, and I asked whether I could meet with him at another time. "O.K., but no cameras," he replied. Might I bring another reporter with me? "O.K., but one only." I had advised CBS News in New York that I probably had an important story to report but that it would be what we used to call a standupper on camera with no film. The reaction was decidedly cool. Had Walter Cronkite or Mike Wallace been available, such a report might have led "The CBS Evening News." On the other hand, I guessed — correctly — that once it appeared in The Times, the universal scream would be for me to match it.

So I ambled up Tu Do Street to Johnny's office and invited him to come along. We took a helicopter ride into the Mekong Delta and then spent two hours with one of the more erudite general officers either of us had ever met in Vietnam.

The general pledged us to absolute confidentiality. Later, when Johnny and I compared notes to ensure we had understood him correctly, both of us were stunned. His article was published 24 hours later. Mine, in the era before satellites, reached CBS News in New York days later. Here, in essence, is how we quoted the general for our reports:

" 'I've destroyed a single division three times,' a senior American general said the other day. 'I've chased main-force units all over the country and the impact was zilch. It meant nothing to the people. Unless a more positive and more stirring theme than simple anti-communism can be found, the war appears likely to go on until someone gets tired and quits, which could take generations.' " The report enraged President Lyndon Johnson, General Westmoreland and, as I recall it, Gen. Earle Wheeler, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Johnson then initiated action to call up an additional 205,000 troops for the coming war against the North Vietnamese. But the action was negated by the misleading perception many of us had that the Communists achieved a major victory in the Tet offensive, which began on Jan. 30, 1968.

The "stalemate" story re-surfaced in 1984, when Westmoreland filed a multibillion-dollar libel suit against CBS News for a report that said the general had knowingly understated the strength of North Vietnamese and Vietcong forces to make it appear that victory was in sight. David Boies, CBS's lead lawyer, remembers asking Westmoreland: "General, I want to read you an excerpt from a story reported by R. W. Apple in The New York Times on Aug. 7, 1967. In it, Mr. Apple refers to an American general who said the war is unwinnable. What about that, General Westmoreland?"

The normally composed Westmoreland, then retired, was shaking as he replied, "No general of mine would ever have said that." I called Mr. Boies's office the following day and told one of his associates that the general in question had said it not once, but twice — the first time in my conversation with him in Saigon.

In 1995, on the 20th anniversary of the war's end, I was invited to participate in a Freedom Forum discussion in Oakland, Calif. With Johnny's knowledge, I called our source to ask whether he might release us from our pledge of confidentiality so that we could set the record straight. He was hesitant. "Westy is an old friend," he said, "and I would not want to hurt or embarrass him. Let's wait until he's no longer with us."

Westmoreland died in 2005. The officer in question, then a three-star general, now 90 years old and retired and living in Hawaii, is Frederick Weyand. General Weyand was a distinguished combat officer and commander of III Corps in the Mekong Delta who later supervised the American withdrawal from Vietnam and then became United States Army Chief of Staff. Last week, in the interest of historical accuracy, I called to tell him about the coming memorial service for Johnny. I told him Johnny had described the "stalemate" piece as the most important story he'd ever done, and I was renewing my request for a release from the pledge of confidentiality we had given him 40 years ago. He agreed.

I believe both Johnny and I were struck, in 1967, by General Weyand's sober, intellectual analysis of the problems facing both the Americans and the Vietnamese. So many years later, I suspect there may be other officers of his caliber who are thinking about the contradictions in yet another war.

There is, of course, no way of determining how much of an impact the "stalemate" story had on Lyndon Johnson's decision to abandon plans to seek re-election in 1968. The daring of the Communists' Tet offensive undoubtedly swung American public opinion irreversibly. But to me, writ larger, our reports demonstrated how important it was and is for journalists to offer pledges of confidentiality to credible sources in order to report the kind of stories officials normally are reluctant to discuss. It was essential during the Vietnam War, as it is essential today in Iraq.

The Media Is In Need Of Some Mending (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0104521

By Peter R. Kann

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

Thomas Jefferson, a better president than we've had in a very long time, penned a line back in 1787: "Were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without government, I would not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter." By 1807, in his seventh year as president and after seven years of being subjected to severe press criticism, he wrote: "I deplore the putrid state into which our newspapers have passed, and the malignity, the vulgarity and the mendacious spirit of those who write them."

You'll be relieved to know that Jefferson did remain true to his primary principle: "The press," he concluded, "is an evil for which there is no remedy. Liberty depends upon freedom of the press and that cannot be limited without being lost." He was right then, and we are right now, to prefer a free press, however flawed, to any controlled alternative. Still, as we watched CNN flashing its pre-election logos each day -- "Broken Borders," "Broken Government," "Broken Politics," Broken Everything -- I can't help thinking the media, too, is in need of some mending.

At its best news informs and enlightens the citizens of a free society and thereby safeguards and strengthens our democracy. At its worst -- dishonest, unfair, irresponsible -- the media has potential to erode the public trust on which its own success depends and to corrode the democratic system of which it is so indispensably a part. So, let me touch on 10 current trends in the mass media that ought to disturb us.

The blurring of the lines between journalism and entertainment. Journalism that puts too high a priority on entertaining is almost destined to distort and mislead. Compounding this confusion is a diffusing definition of "journalist." When political operatives moonlight at moderating news shows, when people alternate between being political editors and political consultants, when celebrity newspeople pocket $20,000 fees speaking at corporate conventions while criticizing congressman for conflicts of interest -- we jumble public perceptions of newspeople as well as news.

The blurring of lines between news and opinion. Newspapers have a format that helps maintain the distinction. The Internet, TV and most magazines have neither that format nor that tradition. The result is a blending of news and views. The two are not ingredients to mix together for a tastier meal, they are different courses. Part of the problem here lies in fashionable new philosophies that argue there are no basic values of right and wrong, that news is merely a matter of views. It's a dangerous philosophy for our society and a dagger at the heart of genuine journalism.

The blending of news and advertising, sponsorships or other commercial relationships. The resulting porridges may be called "advertorials" or "infomercials"; they may be special sections masquerading as news, news pages driven by commercial interests, or Web pages where everything somehow is selling something. Without clear distinctions between news and advertising, readers or viewers lose confidence in the veracity of a news medium. And advertisers lose the business benefit of an environment of trust.

The problems and pitfalls inherent in pack journalism. Individually, most reporters are decent, dedicated, fair-minded people. But the press, en masse, tends to lose its common sense and its sense of fairness and independence and what we see all too often is the spectacle of a pack of hounds in pursuit of a quarry. We frequently see this phenomenon in political reporting, where the faintest whiff of scandal, or even of weakness, can send the pack in pursuit. At its worst, the pack, not finding a real problem, proclaims the "perception" of one and this perception becomes self-fulfilling.

The issue of conflict and context. On most issues most Americans are not on polar extremes. On abortion, for example, most seek a sensible center. Where is that center reflected in media coverage that mainly portrays rabid feminists or irate pro-life activists? Balance is not achieved by the talk show format of two extremists yelling at each other. And how many of us recognize our own communities from their depiction on local TV news shows -- a nonstop montage of mayhem, murder, rape, arson, child molestation and more?

The exaggerated tendency toward pessimism. Just look back a few years over much of the media coverage of "American competitiveness." All those news magazine covers on the coming "Japanese Century." And along with it, all the pessimism about the ability of U.S. industry to compete globally. It was nonsense. Similarly, it's one thing -- and an appropriate one -- for the press to probe particular instances of political corruption. It's quite another thing to jump to the cynical conclusion that our political process, and all politicians, are corrupted -- that "they all do it." They don't, and they aren't. Skepticism and criticism are essential to the media's role; reflexive pessimism is not.

The growing media fascination with the bizarre, the perverse and the pathological -- John Mark Karr journalism. Such so-called journalism helps instantly legitimize crackpot ideas, deviant behavior, or alleged victimization in our society. My point is not to argue for "good news" vs. "bad news," but to ask whether much of this amounts to news at all?

Social orthodoxy, or political correctness. These are reflected in a media whose job is not to parrot prevailing fashions, but to question, probe and thereby challenge them. Businessmen are not, by definition, greedy, and environmentalists, by definition, saintly. Third World poverty is not, by definition, a result of overpopulation as opposed to inane economic policies. And so on.

The media's short attention span. As the press hops from Baghdad to Beirut, Natalee Holloway to Valerie Plame, Super Bowls to Super Tuesdays, it justifiably can blame some combination of the nature of the news and the short attention span of the public. The public, meanwhile, bombarded and bewildered can blame a fickle and shallow press. There are too many instant celebrities. Too many two-day crises. Too many "defining moments" from people in search of instant history. In a world where everything is considered critical, nothing needs to be taken very seriously.

The matter of power. The press is at least partially responsible for greater public skepticism toward traditional institutions in America. But the truth, not lost on our public, is that the press is a large and powerful institution, too: "60 Minutes" is more powerful than almost all of the subjects it exposes. This newspaper, arguably, has more influence on national economic policy than do most corporations. Networks are owned by giant industrial corporations, magazines by entertainment conglomerates, and most newspapers by national chains. Given these realties, we cannot plausibly pretend to be a David out there smiting Goliaths and expect the public to believe it.

Annan To Blast U.S. In Farewell (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, December 11, 2006

In a farewell speech on U.S. soil today, retiring United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan plans to deliver a tough critique of President Bush's policies. He will accuse the administration of trying to secure the United States from terrorism in part by dominating other nations through force, committing what he termed human rights abuses and taking military action without broad international support.

Though Annan has long been a critic of the war in Iraq and other Bush foreign policies, the planned speech is among his toughest and is unusual for a U.N. secretary-general concluding his tenure.

Annan's remarks, provided to USA TODAY by his office, list principles for international relations, among them "respect for human rights and the rule of law."

These ideas can be advanced only "if America remains true to its principles, including in the struggle against terrorism," the speech says. "When it appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused."

In the 61-year history of the U.N., no secretary-general has ended his tenure by criticizing U.S. policies so sharply, said Stanley Meisler, a historian of the United Nations and author of a new biography of Annan.

Ric Grennell, spokesman for the U.S. mission to the U.N., said he would not discuss the remarks prior to their delivery. John Bolton, outgoing U.S. ambassador to the U.N., also declined to comment.

In his speech, Annan refers to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. When "military force is used, the world at large will consider it legitimate only when convinced that it is being used for the right purpose … in accordance with broadly accepted norms."

The speech continues that "governments must be accountable for their actions in the international arena, as well as in the domestic one."

The speech, to be delivered at the presidential library of the late Harry Truman in Independence, Mo., contrasts Truman's support for the United Nations with the Bush administration's unilateral actions.

Annan acknowledges terrorism and other global threats but cautions against nations acting alone. "Against such threats as these, no nation can make itself secure by seeking supremacy over all others," the speech says.

Annan leaves office Dec. 31 and will be replaced by former South Korean foreign minister Ban Ki Moon.

Annan's predecessor, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, developed a personal hostility toward then-U.S. ambassador to the U.N. Madeleine Albright, but saved his anger for a book after he left office, Meisler said.

The United States supported Annan for the job 10 years ago, when it blocked Boutros-Ghali from serving a second five-year term. Annan has worked with the United States on a number of issues, including U.N. reform, said Lee Feinstein, a U.N. expert at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Critics of Annan in Congress, including Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., faulted the Ghana-born, U.S.-educated diplomat for lax management of the $64 billion U.N. oil-for-food program. The 1996-2003 effort was tainted by $1.5 billion in kickbacks to the regime of Saddam Hussein.

"Annan's legacy will be one of missed opportunity and failed leadership," said Coleman, who urged Annan to resign last year.

What I've Learned (WP)

By Kofi A. Annan

Washington Post, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104523

Nearly 50 years ago, when I arrived in Minnesota as a student fresh from Africa, I had much to learn -- starting with the fact that there is nothing wimpish about wearing earmuffs when it is 15 degrees below zero. All my life since has been a learning experience. Now I want to pass on five lessons I have learned during 10 years as secretary general of the United Nations that I believe the community of nations needs to learn as it confronts the challenges of the 21st century.

First, in today's world we are all responsible for each other's security. Against such threats as nuclear proliferation, climate change, global pandemics or terrorists operating from safe havens in failed states, no nation can make itself secure by seeking supremacy over all others. Only by working to make each other secure can we hope to achieve lasting security for ourselves. This responsibility includes our shared responsibility to protect people from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. That was accepted by all nations at last year's U.N. summit. But when we look at the murder, rape and starvation still being inflicted on the people of Darfur, we realize that such doctrines remain pure rhetoric unless those with the power to intervene effectively -- by exerting political, economic or, in the last resort, military muscle -- are prepared to take the lead. It also includes a responsibility to future generations to preserve resources that belong to them as well as to us. Every day that we do nothing, or too little, to prevent climate change imposes higher costs on our children.

Second, we are also responsible for each other's welfare. Without a measure of solidarity, no society can be truly stable. It is not realistic to think that some people can go on deriving great benefits from globalization while billions of others are left in, or thrown into, abject poverty. We have to give all our fellow human beings at least a chance to share in our prosperity.

Third, both security and prosperity depend on respect for human rights and the rule of law. Throughout history human life has been enriched by diversity, and different communities have learned from each other. But if our communities are to live in peace we must stress also what unites us: our common humanity and the need for our human dignity and rights to be protected by law.

That is vital for development, too. Both foreigners and a country's own citizens are more likely to invest when their basic rights are protected and they know they will be fairly treated under the law. Policies that genuinely favor development are more likely to be adopted if the people most in need of development can make their voice heard. States need to play by the rules toward each other, as well. No community suffers from too much rule of law; many suffer from too little -- and the international community is among them.

My fourth lesson, therefore, is that governments must be accountable for their actions, in the international as well as the domestic arena. Every state owes some account to other states on which its actions have a decisive impact. As things stand, poor and weak states are easily held to account, because they need foreign aid. But large and powerful states, whose actions have the greatest impact on others, can be constrained only by their own people.

That gives the people and institutions of powerful states a special responsibility to take account of global views and interests. And today they need to take into account also what we call "non-state actors." States can no longer -- if they ever could -- confront global challenges alone. Increasingly, they need help from the myriad types of association in which people come together voluntarily, to profit or to think about, and change, the world.

How can states hold each other to account? Only through multilateral institutions. So my final lesson is that those institutions must be organized in a fair and democratic way, giving the poor and the weak some influence over the actions of the rich and the strong.

Developing countries should have a stronger voice in international financial institutions, whose decisions can mean life or death for their people. New permanent or long-term members should be added to the U.N. Security Council, whose current membership reflects the reality of 1945, not of today.

No less important, all the Security Council's members must accept the responsibility that comes with their privilege. The council is not a stage for acting out national interests. It is the management committee of our fledgling global security system.

More than ever, Americans, like the rest of humanity, need a functioning global system. Experience has shown, time and again, that the system works poorly when the United States remains aloof but it functions much better when there is farsighted U.S. leadership.

That gives American leaders of today and tomorrow a great responsibility. The American people must see that they live up to it.

The writer, secretary general of the United Nations, will leave office Dec. 31. This article is based on an address he will give today at the Truman Presidential Museum & Library in Independence, Mo.

Bolton's Spot May Sit Empty For Months (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104524

It's beginning to look like the post of U.S. ambassador to the United Nations is once again going to be vacant for several months. John Bolton's recess appointment ended over the weekend -- he's said to be heading back to his perch at the American Enterprise Institute -- and there's still no white smoke from the White House on a successor.

Unless President Bush uses his recess appointment powers once again, a new ambassador probably won't make it through the Senate much before March, and that's if the eventual nominee isn't controversial.

The front-runners these days of course include our man in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, any number of losing GOP House and Senate candidates -- starting with outgoing Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine-- to veteran diplomat and Chicago lawyer Richard Williamson, who had been a top official at the mission a few years back.

For the moment, though, career diplomat Alejandro Wolf, now No. 2 in New York, looks to be acting ambassador for a bit.

Meanwhile, Rich Grinnell, who holds the record for longevity as top spokesman at the mission -- five years and two months -- is likely to be moving on. He was spokesman for ambassadors John D. Negroponte, John C. Danforth and Bolton. It is unclear what's going to happen to Bolton's unusually large six-member staff in his spacious office in Foggy Bottom.Farewell, Weldon

Outgoing Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), a cherished Loop favorite, waxed eloquent at his last hearing of the House Armed Service Committee Thursday, going on for a good 20 minutes about how he and the committee can take credit for, among other things: a "normalized relationship" with Libya; two meetings with the North Koreans despite Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice doing "everything she could to stop us"; ensuring the unmanned drone "Predator would be armed"; developing "missile defense"; and, negotiating "the framework to end the Kosovo War."

"I am the troublemaker," he said proudly, maybe losing his seat because of his "pushing the envelope." Or perhaps it was those FBI agents searching his offices? "And God willing, I'll be going back to North Korea in the next two months to continue that dialogue," he vowed.

So the six-party talks will be seven-party talks?

Gonna miss him a lot.A Few Words on Terror

Everyone but Michigan football fans mark your calendars. On Dec. 13, author John Mueller is appearing at a Cato Institute forum to discuss his book "Overblown: How Politicians and the Terrorism Industry Inflate National Security Threats, and Why We Believe Them." Mueller, our invite says, holds the Woody Hayes Chair of National Security Studies at Ohio State University.Time to Move On Ron Bonjean, the highly regarded communications director for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and before that public affairs director at the Commerce Department, is moving over to the Senate side to be executive director of the Senate Republican Conference. Bonjean earlier served as press secretary to then-Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and communications director to then-Rep. J.C. Watts (R-Okla.), and before that worked for several other House members.

Republican aides are moving around, going private, in large part because Democrats have taken over. But Democratic staffers are also moving to the private sector. Lloyd Ritter, formerly Washington representative for the Union of Concerned Scientists and more recently point man on renewable energy for Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) on the Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee, is off to do green-energy consulting.Is There an Ambassador in the House?

It's not often that famous guests pop in on House committee Christmas parties, but one celebrity came early and stayed late Thursday evening at the House Judiciary gathering. He was even recognized -- to a brief round of applause -- during remarks by incoming committee chairman Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.).

The honored guest? Former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, he of the Iraqi yellowcake and the Valerie Plame controversies. Didn't somebody named Pelosi say impeachment was off the table?Party Faux Pas, Averted

Finally, Pentagon folks note that all those Dec. 15 Christmas parties could have caused logistical and security nightmares if someone like President Bush or Vice President Cheney were to show up that day, outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's last, to pay their respects. So they really had to be moved to other days. It wasn't just that everyone would be seen partying the day he left.

U.S. May Soon Seek Iran Sanctions Vote (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, December 11, 2006

The U.S. and its closest Western allies may soon call a vote on U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran, even at the risk that Russia and China may abstain or veto the measures, officials said Sunday.

"They're talking about a vote as soon as possible," a U.S. official said of plans by the Americans, French and British. He and other diplomats and representatives of Western governments spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to divulge Western strategies on Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0104525

The decision to risk a Russian and Chinese veto would reflect recognition by the five permanent Security Council members that they cannot agree on a common approach to dealing with concerns that Iran might be seeking to develop nuclear arms.

That would mean a serious setback to months of efforts by six world powers — the five permanent members plus Germany — to act in concert in getting Iran to freeze its uranium enrichment activities either, through enticements or the threat of punitive U.N. action.

In a fresh bid to win Russian and Chinese support, France and Britain circulated a revised U.N. resolution Friday narrowing proposed sanctions.

The new draft still would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs, but it spells out in much greater detail what items are prohibited. Russia and China had complained that the proposed sanctions in the original draft were too broad.

The new draft keeps a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs, measures Russia opposes.

Russia and China, which have major commercial ties with Iran, have continued to push for dialogue instead of U.N. punishment, despite the collapse in October of an EU attempt to entice Iran into talks.

Russia proposed major changes to the original European text, including limiting sanctions to measures that would keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons and missiles. Russia also proposed eliminating any travel ban, asset freeze or mention of the nuclear facility being built by the Russians at Bushehr, Iran.

The new European draft drops all mention of Bushehr, which is projected to go on line in late 2007 and would be Iran's first atomic power plant. It still would limit technical assistance to Iran by the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, and urge countries to prevent Iranian students from studying nuclear-related disciplines.

A second U.S. official said the Russians now want even more concessions. He said Moscow was insisting that any resolution not mention tentative Russian plans to build a second reactor for the Iranians. As well, the Russians want to limit any sanctions to three months, after which they would be reviewed, the official said.

These and other demands were resulting in "a lot of frustration" within the Western camp, he said.

He said Washington was expecting "enough compromise to get it down to the level where the Russians (and Chinese) won't veto." But he acknowledged that the risk of rejection by the two countries could not be ruled out.

"If we cannot get an agreement on sanctions that are effective, we would want to table a resolution and take the chance of an abstention, or a veto," he said.

Ambassadors from the six countries were expected to discuss the new draft early next week, possibly Monday.

Iran maintains its nuclear program is purely peaceful, aimed solely at producing nuclear energy, but the U.S. and the Europeans believe Tehran's enrichment activities are ultimately aimed at producing nuclear weapons.

Reflecting fresh Iranian defiance of Security Council demands, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Saturday that his country had begun installing 3,000 uranium enriching centrifuges, which would give the program the capability to make fuel for power generation — or the fissile material for nuclear warheads.

Seeking Iran Intelligence, U.S. Tries Google (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

When the State Department recently asked the CIA for names of Iranians who could be sanctioned for their involvement in a clandestine nuclear weapons program, the agency refused, citing a large workload and a desire to protect its sources and tradecraft.

Frustrated, the State Department assigned a junior Foreign Service officer to find the names another way -- by using Google. Those with the most hits under search terms such as "Iran and nuclear," three officials said, became targets for international rebuke Friday when a sanctions resolution circulated at the United Nations.

Policymakers and intelligence officials have always struggled when it comes to deciding how and when to disclose secret information, such as names of Iranians with suspected ties to nuclear weapons. In some internal debates, policymakers win out and intelligence is made public to further political or diplomatic goals. In other cases, such as this one, the intelligence community successfully argues that protecting information outweighs the desires of some to share it with the world.

But that argument can also put the U.S. government in the awkward position of relying, in part, on an Internet search to select targets for international sanctions.

None of the 12 Iranians that the State Department eventually singled out for potential bans on international travel and business dealings is believed by the CIA to be directly connected to Iran's most suspicious nuclear activities.

"There is nothing that proves involvement in a clandestine weapons program, and there is very little out there at all that even connects people to a clandestine weapons program," said one official familiar with the intelligence on Iran. Like others interviewed for this story, the official insisted on anonymity when discussing the use of intelligence.

What little information there is has been guarded at CIA headquarters. The agency declined to discuss the case in detail, but a senior intelligence official said: "There were several factors that made it a complicated and time-consuming request, not the least of which were well-founded concerns" about revealing the way the CIA gathers intelligence on Iran.

That may be why the junior State Department officer, who has been with the nonproliferation bureau for only a few months, was put in front of a computer.

An initial Internet search yielded over 100 names, including dozens of Iranian diplomats who have publicly defended their country's efforts as intended to produce energy, not bombs, the sources said. The list also included names of Iranians who have spoken with U.N. inspectors or have traveled to Vienna to attend International Atomic Energy Agency meetings about Iran.

It was submitted to the CIA for approval but the agency refused to look up such a large number of people, according to three government sources. Too time-consuming, the intelligence community said, for the CIA's Iran desk staff of 140 people. The list would need to be pared down. So the State Department cut the list in half and resubmitted the names.

In the end, the CIA approved a handful of individuals, though none is believed connected to Project 1-11 -- Iran's secret military effort to design a weapons system capable of carrying a nuclear warhead. The names of Project 1-11 staff members have never been released by any government and doing so may have raised questions that the CIA was not willing or fully able to answer. But the agency had no qualms about approving names already publicly available on the Internet.

"Using a piece of intel on project 1-11, which we couldn't justify in open-source reporting, or with whatever the Russians had, would have put us in a difficult position," an intelligence official said. "Inevitably, someone would have asked, 'Why this guy?' and then we would have been back to the old problem of justifying intelligence."

A senior administration official acknowledged that the back-and-forth with the CIA had been difficult, especially given the administration's desire to isolate Iran and avoid a repeat of flawed intelligence that preceded the Iraq war.

"In this instance, we were the requesters and the CIA was the clearer," the official said. "It's the process we go through on a lot of these things. Both sides don't know a lot of reasons for why either side is requesting or denying things. Sources and methods became their stated rationale and that is what they do. But for policymaking, it can be quite frustrating."

Washington's credibility in the U.N. Security Council on weapons intelligence was sharply eroded by the collapse of prewar claims about Iraq. A senior intelligence official said the intelligence community is determined to avoid mistakes of the past when dealing with Iran and other issues. "Once you push intelligence out there, you can't take it back," the official said.

U.S., French and British officials came to agree that it was better to stay away from names that would have to be justified with sensitive information from intelligence programs, and instead put forward names of Iranians whose jobs were publicly connected to the country's nuclear energy and missile programs. European officials said their governments did not rely on Google searches but came up with nearly identical lists to the one U.S. officials offered.

"We do have concerns about Iranian activities that are overt, and uranium enrichment is a case in point," said a senior administration official who agreed to discuss the process on the condition of anonymity. "We are concerned about what it means for the program, but also because enrichment is in violation of a U.N. Security Council resolution."

The U.S.-backed draft resolution, formally offered by Britain and France, would impose a travel ban and freeze the assets of 11 institutions and 12 individuals, including the commander of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, the directors of Iran's chief nuclear energy facilities, and several people involved in the missile program. It would prohibit the sale of nuclear technologies to Iran and urges states to "prevent specialised teaching or training" of Iranian nationals in disciplines that could further Tehran's understanding of banned nuclear activities.

The text says the council will be prepared to lift the sanctions if Mohamed ElBaradei, the IAEA's director general, concludes within 60 days that Iran has suspended its enrichment and reprocessing of uranium and has halted efforts to produce a heavy-water nuclear energy reactor.

Many Security Council members are uneasy about the sanctions. The Russians and the Chinese -- whose support is essential for the resolution to be approved -- have told the United States, Britain and France they will not support the travel-ban element of the resolution, according to three officials involved in the negotiations. Russia is building a light-water nuclear reactor in Iran and some people on the sanctions list are connected to the project.

"The Russians have already told us it would be demeaning for people to ask the Security Council for permission to travel to Russia to discuss an ongoing project," a European diplomat said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0104527

U.S. and European officials said there is room for negotiation with Russia on the names and organizations, but they also said it is possible that by the time the Security Council approves the resolution, the entire list could be removed.

"The real scope of debate will be on the number of sanctions," one diplomat said. "Companies and individuals could go off the list or go on."

Arab Nations Plan To Start Joint Nuclear Energy Program (NYT)

By Hassan Fattah

New York Times, December 11, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Dec. 10 — Arab leaders, meeting in the Saudi capital, Riyadh, on Sunday, said they intended to start a joint nuclear energy development program, a move certain to heighten concerns over a possible race for nuclear power in the oil-rich Persian Gulf.

Leaders of the Gulf Cooperation Council concluded a two-day summit meeting in Riyadh on Sunday, agreeing to study how to proceed with development of such capacity.

At the same time, they called for a peaceful settlement of the crisis over Iran's nuclear program, which the United States and some other Western nations say is for nuclear arms.

"The states of the region have a right to possess nuclear energy technology for peaceful purposes," the summit meeting's closing communiqué said, echoing Iran's insistence that it, too, had the right to peaceful nuclear technology.

Publicly, officials of the gulf council said the development of a nuclear energy program would help meet their rising demand for electricity, despite the huge oil reserves.

"Nuclear technology is an important technology to have for generating power, and the gulf states will need it equally," said Prince Saud al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's foreign minister, speaking to reporters. "It is not a threat," he said. "It is an announcement so that there will be no misinterpretation for what we are doing."

But analysts and officials said the announcement had a different purpose — to warn the United States not to acquiesce to Iran's nuclear ambitions as pressure grows on the Bush administration to reach out to Iran for help in stabilizing Iraq.

A report released by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group last week recommended that the United States open negotiations with Iran.

The predominantly Sunni Arab states fear that the United States may abandon Arab concerns to gain assistance from Iran, which could confirm Iran as the regional hegemon.

"The message is that the gulf countries will develop their own nuclear program if Iran is rewarded with the terms of the Baker-Hamilton report," said Abdelaziz O. Sager, chairman of the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, who is familiar with the nuclear initiative. "They are trying to say that if the Iranian program continues, you will force us to become nuclear capable too."

At a Persian Gulf security conference in Bahrain on Saturday, Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, insisted that Iran was seeking only peaceful nuclear capacity.

"The time of nuclear weapons is over," Mr. Mottaki said. He added that if nuclear weapons served as an effective deterrent, they should have stopped the fall of the Soviet Union and Israel would not have had to go to war in Lebanon against Hezbollah this past summer.

Saudi officials have warned that a nuclear Iran could cause a regional arms race, suggesting that Saudi Arabia would be forced to acquire nuclear technology, too.

King Abdullah said Saturday that the region was increasingly becoming "a powder keg ready to explode," citing conflict in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, as well as the continuing Iranian nuclear crisis.

At least six Arab countries have reportedly sought to develop nuclear power programs, including Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco and Algeria.

Ahmadinejad And Thin Ice (NSWK)

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - How gruesome was 2006? The year's most consequential person was Iran's president, who says the Holocaust did not happen and vows to complete it. Regarding his nuclear aspirations, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose manias are leavened with realism, treated the United Nations as a figment of the imagination of a fiction—the "international community."

Democrats, given control of Congress because of Iraq, vowed to raise the minimum wage. Nimble and graceful Barack Obama became the Democrats' Fred Astaire, adored because of, well, perhaps the way he wears his hat, the way he sips his tea. And the way he isn't Hillary.

This year's civil-rights outrage was "soaring" and "record" gasoline prices, a violation of Americans' inalienable right to pay for a gallon no more than they paid 25 years ago. By December the price of a gallon, adjusted for inflation, was 83 cents lower than in 1981. Kansas voters removed some skeptics of evolution from the state's school board. A fossil 3.3 million years old revealed that a little girl from the human lineage had arms and shoulders suited to climbing and swinging through trees.

In order to show "tolerance of people's beliefs," government workers in England's West Midlands were told, after a Muslim complained, to remove from sight all pig-related items, such as a tissue box featuring Winnie the Pooh and Piglet. But tolerance was episodic in Europe in 2006: In Sweden, police said the soccer fan who wore on his clothes a Swedish flag, which features a cross, "provoked some emotions." Indeed. He was beaten nearly to death by Muslim immigrants. Inspector Clouseau, call your office: French police denied that anti-Semitism was involved in the kidnapping and murder of a Jewish man by Muslim immigrants who demanded a ransom from a synagogue. Angry about those Danish cartoons depicting the prophet, Iran's bakers renamed Danish pastries "Roses of the Prophet Muhammad pastries." Although no one had complained, the human-rights director for the provocatively named city of St. Paul, Minn., had a HAPPY EASTER sign removed from city hall.

The unusually tranquil Atlantic hurricane season was explained as a consequence of ... global warming affecting the Pacific. Two senators, Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia and Olympia Snowe of Maine, warned ExxonMobil that global warming is an undeniable fact, so the corporation should desist from its "dangerous" support of research by persons with doubts. The senators did not explain the danger involved in doubting the indubitable. There were dangers—disorder, sporadic violence—among those gathered outside stores in the predawn hours before the PlayStation 3 gaming console went on sale.

Hundreds Of Thousands Protest In Lebanon (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas And Zeina Karam

AP, December 11, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah members and their allies flooded central Beirut on Sunday demanding changes in the government's makeup as soldiers strung more barbed wire around the offices of the Western-backed premier.

Buoyed by the big turnout after a week of street protests, the pro-Syria opposition gave Prime Minister Fuad Saniora an ultimatum of a "few days" to accept its demand to form a national unity government with a big role for Hezbollah or face an escalating campaign to oust him.

Saniora, who has been holed up in his fortified office downtown, rejected the demand and urged his foes to resume negotiations. The opposition should "return to the constitutional institutions to discuss differences and reach real solutions," he said in a written statement.

Political unrest has split the country along sectarian lines, with most Sunni Muslims supporting the Sunni prime minister and Shiite Muslims backing the militant Hezbollah. Christian factions are split between the two camps.

But despite the heated rhetoric of the political confrontation, Sunday's mass gathering remained peaceful and left the door open to the possibility of a settlement.

DOJ_NMG_0104529

"Hopefully it won't be long. At the end, there will be no winner, no vanquished. We should all be winners," Saad Hariri, leader of parliament's anti-Syria majority and a Saniora supporter, told The Associated Press.

Police had no immediate crowd estimate, but the horde that jammed downtown plazas and many neighborhoods appeared one of the biggest in a country that has seen a string of mammoth demonstrations by both sides in recent years. A Hezbollah anti-government rally Dec. 1 drew 800,000 of Lebanon's 4 million people, according to police figures.

Pro-government groups staged a rival demonstration that drew tens of thousands in the northern port city of Tripoli.

Hezbollah's supporters streamed into downtown from all corners of Lebanon, waving Lebanese and Hezbollah flags as loudspeakers blasted anti-government speeches. Musicians pounded drums in a carnival-like atmosphere, while Hezbollah security agents fanned out in the crowd.

"We have come to show them how big our size really is," said Reem al-Zein, a 20-year-old philosophy student. "I think this lying government will not be able to last much longer after today."

Sheik Naim Kassem, Hezbollah's deputy leader, said the opposition was willing to stay on the streets for months to achieve its goal.

"Does Bush want popular expression in Lebanon? Do the West and the Arabs want to hear the voice of the people in Lebanon? Tell them 'Death to America!' Tell them 'Death to Israel!'" the crowd repeated behind him.

Michel Aoun, a Christian leader allied with Hezbollah, warned Saniora he had only "a few days" to accept a national unity government or face further action.

"What we hope for today is for them to understand that their era is over," he said in a video link shown on giant screens.

Aoun added that the opposition was committed to "to peaceful means, but even other means are legitimate."

Lebanese media have speculated the opposition's next steps could include civil disobedience, disruptions of public services and resignations from parliament.

The political crisis began after talks on a national unity government collapsed and six pro-Hezbollah ministers resigned from the Cabinet. Hezbollah is demanding that it and its allies hold a third of the Cabinet posts, which would allow them to veto government decisions.

Relations between the two camps deteriorated after the Israel-Hezbollah war last summer and a U.N. push for an international tribunal to try suspects in the 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Premier Rafik Hariri, which many people blame on neighboring Syria.

Hezbollah's fight against Israel sent its support among Shiites skyrocketing, emboldening it to push for more political power. The militant group also accuses Saniora and some elements in his government of working with Israel to destroy the guerrilla force.

Pro-government groups, in turn, resent Hezbollah for sparking the war by capturing two Israeli soldiers. Saniora's allies, along with the United States and others, accuse Hezbollah's Syrian and Iranian backers of seeking to overthrow the government.

If Saniora resigned, he would continue in a caretaker capacity until parliament named a new premier and formed a new Cabinet, but he has shown no sign of giving in. Soldiers and police sealed off major roads in Beirut and strengthened defenses around Saniora's downtown complex, where he has been living with other Cabinet ministers.

On Sunday, Saniora said he was open to dialogue and acknowledged the political crisis threatened Lebanon's security, economy and political system.

"We don't want Lebanon to be an arena of the wars of others," Saniora said, in a veiled reference to Syria and Iran. "Lebanon is a nation, not an arena."

Saad Hariri, son of the assassinated premier, said the government was open to meeting opposition demands but only as part of a broader deal.

Among those, he said, would a decision on the fate of President Emile Lahoud. Anti-Syria groups have repeatedly demanded his resignation, accusing him of being a front for Syria, whose army occupied Lebanon for nearly three decades.

Hariri said the opposition also would have to agree to support the international tribunal on his father's slaying and to implement all of the U.N. resolution that ended the summer war. One of the latter's requirements is for Hezbollah to disarm, something it has refused to do.

"Once we agree on the principles there is no problem," Hariri told AP.

Protest Crowds Surge As Beirut Braces For Next Step (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104530

BEIRUT, Dec. 10 -- Hezbollah and its allies turned out the biggest crowds yet in downtown Beirut, sending hundreds of thousands of followers to the gates of the government headquarters Sunday in a feat of mobilization and discipline described by some leaders as the last mass protest before the 10-day campaign escalates.

Legions of flag-waving protesters danced, blew horns and beat drums in a demonstration that, as in past days, was festive, swathed in a cool breeze on a sunny day. But its leaders stipulated only a few days before more measures were taken to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora. By nightfall, the city, suffused with a military presence, was rife with rumors over the next step. Hezbollah refused to confirm or deny that it planned to cut roads in the capital in a mounting campaign of civil disobedience, and Michel Aoun, a Christian ally, suggested a more forceful march on the government itself.

"All these actions become legitimate when the rulers start committing crime after crime, and refuse to step down, and find refuge in illegitimate actions," he told the crowd. "Legitimate actions are for rulers who respect the legitimacy of its people."

The crisis, Lebanon's worst since the end of the 15-year civil war in 1990, has relentlessly deepened since it erupted in October with the demand by Hezbollah and its allies for a greater say in Siniora's cabinet. Since then, it has escalated into deeply personal attacks between Siniora and Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah. Both communities have mobilized their supporters, sometimes along bluntly sectarian lines, sending a chill through a capital that still bears the civil war's scars. Both communities rule out a retreat in a confrontation that could decide the country's political culture, foreign policy and priorities for years to come.

In the broadest terms, the conflict pits Hezbollah, Aoun and an allied Shiite movement, Amal, against the government and a coalition that coalesced in protests last year after former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri was assassinated. But within the struggle is an array of some of the most deeply felt issues here: whether the government's ally, the United States, or Hezbollah's allies, Iran and Syria, will have greater influence; the power of the Shiite community that Hezbollah largely represents; frustration over corruption that Hezbollah and Aoun have framed as populist demands; and Lebanon's posture toward Israel.

"This is a coup against the state in the name of God," Samir Jisr, a parliament member and ally of Hariri's son, Saad, who inherited leadership of Lebanon's Sunni community, told tens of thousands at a counter-protest in northern Lebanon.

Two of Lebanon's most powerful television stations played to their crowds. Future Television, loyal to Hariri and his Sunni constituency, devoted extensive coverage to the counter-protests in Tripoli. Hezbollah's al-Manar, calling the protests here "an unprecedented popular flood," aired four scenes simultaneously of the crowds surging downtown. The broadcast was laced with the vocabulary of this summer's war with Israel: victory, steadfastness and salvation.

"People who survived 33 days of war in the south have no problem staying here for a year, or even two," said Nada Mroueh, joining protesters flying flags that denoted their affiliation -- yellow for Hezbollah, orange for Aoun, green for Amal. "Is it wrong to ask for our rights? Is Siniora more Lebanese than us? We are Lebanese, too."

The demonstrators filled a swath of downtown and backed up into the main arteries leading into the city. Hezbollah has sought to cast the protest as representative of what it calls the national opposition, and the crowd unfurled a sea of red, white and green Lebanese flags across downtown. Overlooking the main square, two banners were draped over a building. One showed Siniora embracing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"Thanks, Condy!" it read in English.

"Hold a news conference tonight or tomorrow, no rush, and announce your resignation as a gesture to preserve the unity of the Lebanese people and rejection of foreign tutelage," said Naim Kassem, the deputy leader of Hezbollah, addressing Siniora, as protesters in a tightly packed square strained their heads to get a glimpse of the turbaned leader.

At another point, he urged the crowd to repeat after him: "Death to America! Death to Israel!"

In the streets outside the square, some of the chants that followed were angry. "There is no fear! There is no fear! The blood of Shiites is a Kalashnikov."

But more often they were fitting for a carnival, the tone that the protests -- disciplined, organized and peaceful -- have hewn to since they began Dec. 1 with a similar but smaller crowd, followed by a round-the-clock sit-in in scores of tents. As Kassem led the crowd in chants, others down the road danced the traditional debke, and knots of youths beat drums. Women in tight jeans chatted, sometimes shouting over martial music blared from speakers, as Shiite clerics in robes passed by.

"Beirut is free!" some chanted.

"I want to send a small message," said Mohammed Ali Ghandour, a 17-year-old who has attended the protests five of the past 10 days. "The government doesn't respect us. They're not taking care of us. They say they do, but they don't."

Ghandour held a poster that read, "As with victory, change is coming, coming, coming."

"What's happening, it's us or them. And whoever wins receives the country. All of it," he said. "This is Lebanon."

Through the crisis, followers in the two camps have split into views that almost never intersect. The speeches of leaders like Nasrallah are echoed almost immediately in the streets. Siniora's contention that the protests amount to a coup d'etat is mentioned in almost every conversation with Hezbollah's opponents. After Nasrallah accused the government of complicity in Israel's waging war this summer, protester after protester mentioned it in interviews Sunday. The government, many claimed, was at best under the sway of U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey Feltman, at worst staffed by traitors.

"In the trash can of history, the government of Feltman," one sign read.

"The government walks as the Americans tell it to walk. It does what Feltman asks it to do," said Hussein Awadeh, a 17-year-old from the largely Shiite southern suburbs of Beirut. "Is it possible we'd accept a government like that?"

Aoun, who entered into an alliance with Hezbollah last year, said the demonstration Sunday would mark the last mass protest. Like Hezbollah, he was unclear about what might follow. Both he and Nasrallah have said they might demand a transitional government that would pave the way for early elections, but constitutionally, Hezbollah and its allies don't have the numbers in parliament to do so. Some here have read the call as a veiled threat of a coup, but so far, the military has strived to stay neutral.

"In the next few days, we expect to change the status quo," Aoun said.

Government officials, at least publicly, have struck a confident tone. So far, they say they have yet to lose anything in the confrontation, and Siniora has repeatedly ruled out resigning, while, like Nasrallah, leaving the door open for negotiations.

"No one ever had any doubt about Hezbollah's capacity to bring huge crowds to the street," said Wael Abou Faour, a parliament member and supporter of Siniora. But, he added, "they have reached a dead horizon."

He said Siniora planned to offer a compromise this week, though it would not diverge far from previous positions. Most talks have revolved around Hezbollah and its allies receiving just short of a third of the cabinet, with independents holding one or two posts. Hezbollah and its allies have pushed for just over a third, a number that would allow them to force the cabinet's resignation.

Lebanon Heading Toward A Breaking Point (MCT)

By Tom Lasseter

McClatchy, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Hundreds of thousands of demonstrators piled into downtown Beirut Sunday, demanding that the U.S.-backed government step down immediately or face an escalation in a siege on the prime minister's headquarters being coordinated by the Shiite Muslim Hezbollah militia.

While accounts vary of what the heightened tactics could consist of - a government worker's strike and a storming of the headquarters have both been mentioned - it's clear that the nation is headed toward a breaking point. Hezbollah and its allies have been camped in the center of the capital for more than a week, demanding that Sunni Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and his Cabinet step down.

The implications are profound for U.S. efforts to counter Syrian and Iranian influence in the Middle East.

The Bush administration counts the massive "Cedar Revolution" protests that expelled Syrian forces from Lebanon last year as a key victory for pro-western democracy. But now, as U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan face significant setbacks, it is Syrian and Iranian ally Hezbollah that is filling the streets of Beirut and calling for revolution.

Speaking in front of the crowd on Sunday, Hezbollah's second in command, Naim Qassim, said in a message to Saniora: "Have a press conference tonight or tomorrow to tell the Lebanese people that you are resigning. ... If you resign today, it would be a positive step, but if you don't it will be negative for the future" of Lebanon.

Qassim also led the crowd in a booming chorus of "Death to America" and "Death to Israel."

Michel Aoun, a Christian leader who has aligned himself with Hezbollah, went a step further.

"This must be the last big rally we'll call for, because in the next one there will be no room for all the protesters," Aoun said. "And the barbed wire will no longer protect the (government building) because people will move there naturally and without any instigation."

Sunni and Christian leaders have warned that a storming of the building could lead to large-scale unrest.

"You can control the people for one, two, maybe 10 days, but after that you cannot control the people; we will take down any fences between us" and the government building, said Ali Zein, one of the demonstrators. "The cup is full now, everything has its limits."

Both sides appear to have hardened their positions: Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah accused Saniora of working with the Israelis last summer during a 34-day war between Israel and the militia, and Saniora replied that Nasrallah's remarks were "an unnecessary fit of anger and rudeness."

Representatives from the Arab League have tried brokering a deal that would lead to an increased Hezbollah say in Cabinet decisions - a process marked by rumors of success that have yet to pan out. Hezbollah officials said Sunday night that they were working to find a solution to the impasse, but it was unclear if anything would come from the Arab League discussions.

Tensions between Lebanon's sects - particularly Sunnis and Shiites - have been moving toward a boil during the past week. With each story of a fight between men with pipes and rocks, each insult heard and repeated, the divide between the groups widens.

The Lebanese Army has blocked the entrances to many Sunni neighborhoods between downtown and the southern Shiite suburbs in an effort to prevent Shiite protesters from clashing with mobs.

Many in the Lebanese government are concerned that increased Sunni-Shiite violence could split the army along confessional lines.

"It will continue to be OK, unless there is a big clash between the two communities, this would put the army in a difficult position," said Joe Sarkis, a Cabinet member and a senior official in the Christian militia cum political party, the Lebanese Forces. "The army is telling us, please solve this soon, because if more time passes the situation might change for us."

Ahmed Fatfat, a Sunni Cabinet member and former Interior Minister, said he's gotten reports to that effect from officers in the army and other Lebanese security forces.

"It's risky," he said.

Asked how likely he thought it was that troops would abandon their posts and fight for their sect, Fatfat grimaced.

"It can happen," he said, and then paused for a moment: "Yes, it can."

The soldiers "go home at the end of the day," Sarkis said, "and there are politics in these neighborhoods."

The Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods are grouped closely together in the capital, a vestige of the 15-year civil war that drew battle lines between Christian and Muslim neighborhoods.

"There are going to be problems in the neighborhoods, the street is out of control, they fight here every night," said Ghazi al-Koush, who owns an electronics store in the predominantly Sunni neighborhood of Basta. "There is a lot of tension on the streets, and it's going to explode - things here are not going to end peacefully."

Al-Koush ran his hand across his face, and rested it for a moment near his glass eye. "During the civil war I lost my eye, I lost my house, I lost my shop, but I never saw Muslim brothers fighting brothers as they are now," he said. "This neighborhood stayed together during most of the civil war, but now it's falling apart."

He blamed most of the fighting on Shiites driving down the streets at night and yelling anti-Sunni slogans. But it was clear from interviews with residents across Beirut during the past week that members of both sects are picking fights.

"If the Shiites keep the siege on the (Cabinet building), the Sunnis will keep attacking the Shiites on the street," said Mohammed Saaidon, a local leader in the Sunni neighborhood of Aisha Bakkar. "You can't imagine how angry the Sunnis are ... we won't let the Shiites take Beirut."

That sense of Sunni rage is met in many Shiite neighborhoods with a confidence that at times borders on an eagerness to fight.

"If this continues there will be problems," said Mohammed Hussein, who was walking through the streets of Dahiya, a Hezbollah stronghold south of Beirut.

A friend piped up, cheerfully: "It will be civil war."

Down the street, Bassam Boulud was sitting with a group of men, including a Hezbollah security worker.

"If we want, we can control the whole country in 72 hours, according to the latest (Hezbollah) study," Boulud said.

The Hezbollah guard put his hand on Boulud's shoulder.

Boulud corrected himself: "But because of the wisdom of Hassan Nasrallah, this will not happen."

After the demonstration Sunday, a group of women were standing beside the bus that brought them up from their south Lebanon homes in the town of Tyre.

One of them, who gave only her first name, Ibtihal, said that she hoped another civil war wasn't coming, but that the time to act was drawing near. She said she knew that going into the government center downtown was a "redline" for the Sunnis and Christians, but that she hoped to be "the first one in the building."

"We have been patient until now," she said, "but after today, we are willing to cross all redlines."

Both Sides Appear Cornered In Beirut (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT — When hundreds of thousands of demonstrators choked downtown Beirut on Sunday to demand the ouster of the U.S.-backed government, their crushing show of political strength came carefully packaged with a harsh threat: Time for a political compromise is running out.

At the podium, a menacing tone laced the speeches of party officials from Hezbollah and its allies. On the jammed streets, a fraying, frustrated tinge crept into the cries of demonstrators who washed over downtown in waves. The massive sit-in has moved into its second week without tangible results, and within the opposition, calls are mounting for an escalation in civil disobedience.

Gen. Michel Aoun, a powerful Maronite Christian leader and political ally of the Shiite Muslim movement Hezbollah, closed the demonstration with a threat. Cheers rose among the crowds as a fiery Aoun declared the people that "this stage has come close to its end."

"In the few coming days, we expect to change the status quo we're in. This must be the last big rally we'll call for, because in the next one there will be no room for all the protesters," he said. "And the barbed wire will no longer protect the [government offices] because people will move there naturally and without any instigation."

Aoun pledged to remain peaceful but, in the next breath, said that "other means" were also legitimate. He spoke admiringly of the seizure of government buildings in Serbia and Ukraine, and argued that extreme actions were legitimate when used to oust corrupt rulers.

From Arab diplomats to Christian clerics, negotiators are still struggling to broker a power-sharing compromise to bring Lebanon back from the brink of collapse.

Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa was expected to return to Lebanon this week to continue searching for a deal. Late Sunday, reports emerged that Hezbollah might be willing to accept the Arab League proposal. But the details weren't clear — and other flashes of optimism have repeatedly been squelched in weeks of contentious negotiations.

Dismissing the street protests as an attempted coup d'etat engineered by Hezbollah's main foreign backers, Syria and Iran, Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and his Cabinet ministers have clung resolutely to power.

But the rain of insults and criticism unleashed in recent days on Siniora, a Sunni Muslim, has stirred fury among the government's supporters and raised the ire of Sunnis.

Meanwhile, through its media, Hezbollah and its allies have stepped up warnings of impending eruptions of civil disobedience: a large-scale labor strike, the closure of roads and the airport, the storming of the government offices to oust Siniora. Such escalation would run the risk of sparking serious clashes by provoking the government and its supporters and, potentially, the army and security forces.

Largely because of the sectarian overtones of the crisis, both the government and its critics have found themselves in a delicate position, analysts say.

Despite a nuanced set of allegiances among religious sects on both sides of the divide, the demonstration is fundamentally viewed by Lebanese as a standoff between a Sunni-dominated government and Shiite-led street protesters.

The government can't give up too much power without raising questions of weakness among the Sunnis. Nor can Hezbollah go home, or accept too little, without accepting defeat on behalf of Shiites.

"You can't back off in Lebanon," said Hilal Khashan, a political science professor at the American University of Beirut. "If you do, it means an entire sect has been defeated."

And in a country where losing face is akin to ceding power, Hezbollah and its allies have staked their credibility on the pledge to oust the government.

"Everybody is in a corner now," Ibrahim Moussawi, editor of Hezbollah's newspaper and a de facto spokesman for the party, said Sunday. "If the government continues to be stubborn and not listen to the people, then there will be some kind of escalation, although not necessarily violent. This will come in the next few days, not more than that."

From the beginning, the protesters confidently predicted that the Siniora government would crumple in the face of their massive demonstrations.

But that hasn't happened.

Despite curses and cries from the streets outside, despite the crippling of downtown Beirut, a relatively unflappable government has continued to plug away at its business in a heavily fortified compound. International delegations come and go. Siniora appears on television every day, weary-looking but composed and nattily dressed. Police guard the streets; trash gets picked up.

Meanwhile, the nights are getting colder and longer and an eagerness to shatter the status quo is mounting on the streets. Among Hezbollah and its allies in the opposition, there is a growing fear that the first flush of revolutionary enthusiasm will soon sink into stagnation — or, worse, that their demonstration and, by extension, their political movements, will begin to appear irrelevant.

"We are not tired," Ali Hassan Khalil, a lawmaker for the Shiite Amal party, told the crowd Sunday. "They push us to adopt other options…. Let the whole world know, we do have other options."

Demonstrators poured into Beirut from around the country, many of them bused into the capital from predominantly Shiite hinterlands. They milled around the packed streets in a daze, shoving impatiently through the bodies, giddily chanting "Down with Siniora!" and buying gritty street food from vendors.

DOJ_NMG_0104534

As young boys formed human pyramids and banged on drums, the mood was at times festive, but just below the surface, frustration was building up.

"It seems they don't want to step down so easily," said Mohammed Azwar, a 22-year-old protester who had been bused to the capital from the Bekaa Valley. "We did not expect this. But it's just because of all the support they're getting from abroad."

Azwar carried a cardboard poster bearing a picture of U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey Feltman meeting with Lebanese officials. It read, "We don't want Feltman's government."

Lebanon's Shiites are well acquainted with the experience of being brushed aside by those in power. Still, there was a sense of dawning surprise at the government's tenacity, and the bruised mood of being ignored in a mass endeavor that was specifically designed to blast through any attempts to overlook the people's demands.

"Hasn't he seen all these people? Hasn't he looked out the window of his castle?" an announcer said, his voice blaring from massive speakers. "What does he want, blood? Let this government fall! We want this government to leave us!"

As Crowd Demands Change, Lebanese Premier Is Puzzled (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 10 — The center of Beirut was packed Sunday with hundreds of thousands of pro-Hezbollah and allied demonstrators who, in a jubilant mass of protest and carnival, pressed their call for the government to resign.

The pounding of martial music and the roaring din of the excited crowd floated up a nearby hill to pierce the thick walls of the stately government building, the Grand Serail, as the prime minister, Fouad Siniora, entered a ceremonial room for a news conference. “I don’t understand what is this great cause that is making them create this tense political mess and stage open-ended demonstrations,” he said to a small group of reporters.

Over and over, the crowd, the speakers and the posters offered clear explanations. They did not want a government controlled by the so-called March 14 coalition, an amalgam of Sunni, Christian and Druse parties. They did not want a government aligned with Washington. In short, a very large number of Lebanese citizens said they did not want the present leadership.

A banner hung down the side of a building, showing a picture of the prime minister hugging Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. “Thanks Condy,” it said, just beneath an image of dead children, referring to Lebanese civilian casualties during Israel’s war with Hezbollah in the summer.

“There is no longer a place for America in Lebanon,” Hezbollah’s deputy leader, Sheik Naim Qassem, said in remarks that boomed through loudspeakers.

“Do you not recall that the weapons fired on Lebanon were American weapons?” he added.

Prime Minister Siniora’s somewhat surprising expression of bewilderment seemed to capture the spirit dividing this country of just four million people. There are government supporters who appear afraid and threatened, and there are opponents of the government, particularly those who support Hezbollah, who seem empowered and confident that they stand at the threshold of victory.

In a subdued ceremony that seemed a reverse image of the boisterous protests, several thousand people gathered to mark the anniversary of the assassination of Gibran Tueni, the anti-Syrian newspaper publisher killed in a car bombing last year. The front of the convention center was filled with Range Rovers, Jaguars and Mercedes-Benzes. Inside, the audience was dressed for a funeral, in suits and ties.

“Everyone is afraid,” said Michel Khoury, a former governor of the central bank, as he left the memorial, a shiny new cellphone pressed to his ear. “The Shiite community is very important. It is the first time it is monolithic, the first time in the history of this country you have one of the communities united.”

In Tripoli on Sunday, tens of thousands of pro-government demonstrators rallied.

This fight between Lebanese factions, defined primarily along sectarian lines, is a struggle for control of the government that will help determine Lebanon’s future, and whether the nation eventually leans toward Iran and Syria, as the radical Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah would like, or toward the United States and Europe, as the governing alliance would like.

“We are today at the last phase of our struggle before we consolidate our independence, freedom and sovereignty, because the government has proven to be a failure at all levels,” said Michel Aoun, a former general and a Christian leader, in a live video broadcast to the demonstrators in Beirut. “They have failed to isolate the Lebanese people from one another and we are here today to represent unity and we are leading this struggle together.” He has aligned his Christian party, the Free Patriotic Movement, with Hezbollah.

He said that within a few days, the allied groups would press to form an interim cabinet and then for early parliamentary elections. There have been rumors flying around Beirut that the next step would be attempts to block roads, the airport and the ports, to grind the country to a halt. But there have been no official announcements.

Hezbollah and its allies have managed for 10 days to control the center of Beirut with a loud, peaceful, organized protest. In many ways, Hezbollah has adopted a strategy that has been cheered by the White House in the past, in places like Ukraine, and even Lebanon, leaning on large, peaceful crowds to force unpopular governments to resign and pave the way for elections.

But this time Washington and its allies have said the protest amounts to a coup d'état, fueling charges that the United States supports democratic practices only when its allies are winning.

"Does Bush want national expression in Lebanon?" Sheik Qassem said to the crowd. "Do the West and Arabs want the voice of the people in Lebanon? Tell them, 'Death to America.' Tell them, 'Death to Israel.' Tell them, 'Glory to a free Lebanon.' "

The Hezbollah alliance took its protests to the streets after the governing coalition refused its demands to give Hezbollah and its allies more power, including the ability to veto all government action.

The current demonstration began Friday, with hundreds of thousands of people pouring into the center of the city, many bused in from the poor, war-ravaged Shiite communities of the south. The government appeared to hope that the protesters would grow weary and go back to the negotiating table.

But on Sunday, there was the huge crowd, a vista of humanity pressed shoulder to shoulder, flying flags and calling for the government to resign.

"We want a clean cabinet," read one banner.

"Victory, change, is coming," read another.

The gravity of the situation was underlined by roads sealed by soldiers and razor wire, and the many shops and restaurants that remained closed.

But high spirits seemed dominant. "I am having fun overthrowing the cabinet," said Hassan Katteya, 10, as he walked with his mother, Reema, through the crowd.

"We feel that we are the strong party," Mrs. Katteya said. "The government is the weak party. They are hiding up there in the Grand Serail."

Hezbollah Steps Up Protests Against Lebanese Government (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson, Usa Today

USA Today, December 11, 2006

BEIRUT — Hezbollah and its allies stepped up their campaign to oust Lebanon's government Sunday by flooding downtown Beirut with hundreds of thousands of chanting protesters in a show of force.

Sunday's turnout appeared to be the largest since 800,000 protesters poured into downtown Dec. 1.

Since then, several thousand protesters have camped outside the offices of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. There were no official estimates of Sunday's crowd.

Pressure on the government could increase today. The anti-government newspaper Ad-Diyar said the opposition would call for a work strike. A strike could close Beirut's international airport and shipping ports and slow other public services.

"I support a strike and will (strike) if it is called," said protester Tony Khoury, 37, of suburban Beirut. "I'm willing to give blood to bring this government down."

Khoury was one of hundreds of flag-waving, slogan-chanting Lebanese from across the country of 4 million people to swamp Riad el Solh and Martyrs squares on the 10th day of protests Sunday. Protesters flooded streets and arteries feeding into downtown for blocks, filled highway overpasses and climbed on nearby small buildings.

They roared approval as anti-government speakers alternately decried the government and urged peace among Lebanon's religious groups that are split over the political crisis.

Hezbollah, a political and militant Shiite group backed by Iran and Syria, and its allies launched the demonstrations to demand a third of the Cabinet posts in the government, which would give them veto control. If not, they want Saniora to resign. They vow to keep up the pressure until their demands are met.

Saniora, who leads an anti-Syrian majority ruling coalition, has refused to give in and has branded the demonstrations a coup attempt backed by Iran and Syria.

The United States, other Western governments and moderate Arab states support Saniora.

"Our political, security and economic lives, our whole system, is facing a major challenge," Saniora said Sunday. But, he said, the country and its democracy are strong enough to weather it.

The protesters say they won't give in. No solution to the standoff seems imminent.

DOJ_NMG_0104536

"We are here, so the government will fall," said protester Ruwayda Dilbani, 29, who works for a trading company in Rayak, a town in Lebanon's Bekaa region.

Some speakers also decried the government as a puppet of the United States for not supporting Hezbollah when its guerrillas waged a 34-day war against Israel this summer.

"After the (Israeli) aggression … there is no place for America in Lebanon," Hezbollah deputy chief Naim Kassem told the crowds.

They responded, "Death to America! Death to Israel! Long live a dignified Lebanon!"

One Shiite Muslim youth was killed Dec. 3 in a Sunni Muslim neighborhood on his way home from a demonstration. Since then, there have been skirmishes between supporters of the two sides.

Whose War Crimes? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

A few scenes from modern warfare:

Mohammad Abd al-Hamid Srour moved missiles across southern Lebanon under cover of a white flag. Hussein Ali Mahmoud Suleiman used the porch of a private home to fire rockets. Maher Hassan Mahmoud Kourani dressed in civilian clothes, hid his Kalashnikov in a tote bag and stored anti-aircraft missiles in the back of a green unmarked Volvo. The three men, all members of Hezbollah, were captured by Israel during last summer's war.

Now their videotaped interviews form part of a remarkable report by retired Lieutenant Colonel Reuven Erlich of Israel's Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center. Relying heavily on captured Hezbollah documents, onsite and aerial photography and other first-hand evidence, the report shows how the Shiite group put innocent civilians at risk by deliberately deploying its forces in cities, towns and often private homes.

Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, has accused Israel's military of "indiscriminate warfare" and "a disturbing disregard for the lives of Lebanese civilians." Mr. Erlich demolishes that claim, and in the process shows the asymmetric strategy of Islamist radicals.

The most persuasive evidence here is photographic, so we urge readers to access the report itself on the Web site of the American Jewish Congress (ajcongress.org1). Hezbollah's headquarters in Aita al-Shaab, for instance, sits in the heart of the village. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah's office and home are in a densely built neighborhood of Beirut. In the town of Qana -- site of an Israeli bombing on July 30 that killed 28 and that Hezbollah's apologists were quick to label a "massacre" -- an arms warehouse can be seen adjacent to a mosque. There are photographs of rockets in the back seats of cars, missile launchers adjacent to farm houses, storage bunkers hidden beneath homes. There is also a trove of before-and-after photography demonstrating the precision of most Israeli bombing.

The report also shows how the use of civilian cover was explicitly part of Hezbollah's strategy. "[The organization's operatives] live in their houses, in their schools, in their churches, in their fields, in their farms and in their factories," said Mr. Nasrallah in a TV interview on May 27, several weeks before the war. "You can't destroy them in the same way you would destroy an army."

Exactly what Mr. Nasrallah means is illustrated in the testimonials of the captured fighters. Asked why Hezbollah would risk the destruction of civilian areas by firing from them, Mr. Suleiman replied that while in theory private homes belonged to "the residents of the village . . . in essence they belong to Hezbollah."

Perhaps that's true; if so, then Human Rights Watch has no grounds to accuse Israel of atrocities when Mr. Nasrallah has effectively declared everyone and everything in southern Lebanon to be his fief. Our sense, however, is that not all southern Lebanese were delighted to have their livelihoods appropriated for Hezbollah's political purposes, even if they were too intimidated to register a protest. Either way, it is Hezbollah, not Israel, that is guilty of war crimes here.

Beyond the war in Lebanon, these images suggest how Islamists seek to use the restraint of Western powers against them. They shoot at our civilians from the safety of their own civilian enclaves that they know we are reluctant to attack. Then if by chance their civilians are killed, they call in CNN and al-Jazeera cameras and wait for the likes of Mr. Roth to denounce America or Israel for war crimes.

None of this means the U.S. shouldn't continue to fight with discrimination and avoid civilian casualties. But it means our political leadership needs to speak as candidly as Israelis now are speaking about this enemy strategy, so the American people can understand and be steeled against this new civilian battleground.

Ideas: Presidential Provocation (NSWK)

Newsweek, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104537

Dec. 18, 2006 issue - President Carter has a new book out, his 23rd since leaving office and his most controversial. "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid" has drawn fire for its use of the word "apartheid," and a former associate, Kenneth Stein, a professor of Middle Eastern studies at Emory University, is raising questions about the book's accuracy. (Disclosure: NEWSWEEK's Christopher Dickey was one of the people asked to comment on an early draft of the book.) President Carter spoke to Eleanor Clift:

You've created quite a stir. I suspect it was partly intentional.

Well, it was. But one of the purposes of the book was to provoke discussion, which is very rarely heard in this country, and to open up some possibility that we could rejuvenate or restart the peace talks in Israel that have been absent for six years.

The word apartheid—did you agonize about that?

Not really, because I knew that's an accurate description of what's going on in Palestine. I would say that the plight of the Palestinians now—the confiscation of their land, that they're being suppressed completely against voicing their disapproval of what's happening, the building of the wall that intrudes deep within their territory, the complete separation of Israelis from the Palestinians—all of those things in many ways are worse than some of the aspects of apartheid in South Africa. No one can go there and visit the different cities in Palestine without agreeing with what I have said.

Why do you think you're under attack for the book and the title?

You and I both know the powerful influence of AIPAC, which is not designed to promote peace. I'm not criticizing them, they have a perfect right to lobby, but their purpose in life is to protect and defend the policies of the Israeli government and to make sure those policies are approved in the United States and in our Congress—and they're very effective at it.

You're obviously aware of your main critic, Mr. Stein, who used to be with the Carter Center.

Thirteen years ago! He hasn't been associated with the Carter Center for 13 years.

He says that he was a third party in some meetings and his notes don't jibe with yours.

He was a third party in some of the meetings, I can't deny that. And a lot of those meetings took place when I was still president and an exact transcription was kept and it's in the official files. So the reports that I gave in the book are completely accurate.

He also has a veiled hint of plagiarism, saying you took from other sources.

The only source that I took anything from that I know about was my own book, which I wrote earlier—it's called "The Blood of Abraham" ... Somebody told me this morning [Stein] was complaining about the maps in the book. Well, the maps are derived from an atlas that was published in 2004 in Jerusalem and it was basically produced under the aegis of officials in Sweden. And the Swedish former prime minister is the one who told me this was the best atlas available about the Middle East.

To bring it up to the here and now, the Iraq Study Group report recommends ...

Exactly what I did—that the peace talks recommence.

The Big Lie About The Middle East (TIME)

By Lisa Beyer

Time, December 11, 2006

No sensible person is against peacemaking in the Holy Land. Applause and hopefulness would seem the reasonable reaction to the Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the Bush Administration "act boldly" and "as soon as possible" to resolve the conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians. But as a front-row observer of similar efforts over the past 15 years, I could muster neither response. In lumping the Iraq mess in with the Palestinian problem--and suggesting the first could not be fixed unless the second was too--the Baker-Hamilton commission lent credibility to a corrosive myth: that the fundamental problem in the Arab world is the plight of the Palestinians.

It is a falsehood perpetuated not just by the likes of Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden, who came late to the slogan after their actual beefs--Saddam with his neighbors; bin Laden with the Saudi royals--gained insufficient traction in the Arab world. The mantra is also repeated like an axiom in the U.S.--in parts of the State Department, in various think tanks, by editorial writers and Sunday talk-show hosts.

Yes, it was a great disturbance in the Arab world in the 1940s when a Jewish state was born through a U.N. vote and a war that made refugees of many Palestinians. Then the 1967 war left Israel in control of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and thus the Palestinians who lived there. But the pan-Arabism that once made the Palestinian cause the region's cause is long dead, and the Arab countries have their own worries aplenty. In a decade of reporting in the region, I found it rarely took more than the arching of an eyebrow to get the most candid of Arab thinkers to acknowledge that the tears shed for the Palestinians today outside the West Bank and Gaza are of the crocodile variety. Palestinians know this best of all.

To promote the canard that the troubles of the Arab world are rooted in the Palestinians' misfortune does great harm. It encourages the Arabs to continue to avoid addressing their colossal societal and political ills by hiding behind their Great Excuse:

it's all Israel's fault. Certainly, Israel has at times been an obnoxious neighbor, but God help the Arab leaders, propagandists and apologists if a day ever comes when the Arab-Israeli mess is unraveled. One wonders how they would then explain why in Egypt 4 of every 10 people are illiterate; Saudi Arabian Shi'ites (not to mention women) are second-class citizens; 11% of Syrians live below subsistence level; and Jordan's King can unilaterally dissolve Parliament, as he did in 2001. Or why no Middle Eastern government but Israel's and to some extent Lebanon's tolerates freedom of assembly or speech, or democratic institutions like a robust press or civic organizations with independence and clout--let alone unfettered competitive elections.

One might argue that if the Arab dictators were deprived of the Great Excuse, they might begin to rule with greater concern for their constituents' needs. But why should they be allowed to wait--in the meantime cynically selling their people the Israel Myth--especially since the wait is apt to be long? The Baker commission is quite right in wanting to see sooner rather than later a viable Palestinian state. But the report's airy prescription for frog-marching Israelis and Palestinians into new peace talks perpetuates another persistent fiction: that U.S. involvement is the key to a breakthrough. That contradicts the real-life story of all three of the major peace agreements Israel has signed, with the Egyptians, Palestinians and Jordanians. Each was the result of bold initiative not by Washington but by local leaders, when conditions were ripe. In all three cases, the accords were the product of negotiations begun in secret behind the backs of the Americans. The Oslo accords with the Palestinians ultimately fell apart, but not because of a collapse of U.S. diplomacy; rather, because of a failure of leadership by Yasser Arafat.

The Israelis and Palestinians aren't going to make peace until they have brave, inspiring leaders, which they don't, and when they are sick of fighting, which they aren't. When that time comes, the U.S. can facilitate negotiations, as it has before, but only if it re-establishes its reputation as a reasonably honest broker. In the past, Washington tilted to the Israelis' side but not so much that the Palestinians couldn't live with it. President Bush has turned the tilt into a slap-down. He says he supports Palestinian statehood, but the Palestinians don't hear the words; they grasp the lack of feeling he evinces for them. They take in the unprecedented silences in Washington when Israeli forces overreact; they wince at White House endorsements of what the U.S. used to call illegal Jewish settlements in the West Bank. If James Baker had wanted to improve U.S. policy toward the Palestinians, he might have whispered these things into Bush's ear instead of sucking up to the Arab states with his inappropriate and quixotic peace plan.

Opec Plans Squeeze On Oil Stockpiles (FT)

By Carola Hoyos, Chief Energy Correspondent

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

Two years ago Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil exporter, opened its spigots and let supply out-pace demand. The result was a gradual build up in oil inventories in the US, Europe and several Asian oil-consuming countries.

This month Ali Naimi, the country's influential oil minister, appeared abruptly to reverse that accommodating policy. At a meeting in Cairo he told reporters that the market was "significantly" oversupplied.

"Inventories in the US are high, not low . . . That's why the market is out of balance," the minister said, adding that 100m barrels of oil should be cut to rebalance it.

Inventories have indeed swelled in recent years. By the end of September, stockpiles in the world's 30 biggest oil-consuming countries were at eight-year highs, holding enough oil to last 55 days of consumption.

This worries Mr Naimi because, as the spare-oil cushion in consuming countries has grown, some of the power to influence world oil prices has shifted from the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries to its customers.

Saudi Arabia has already begun to regain its clout and rebuild its own cushion of spare supply, which dwindled as the kingdom tapped into it over the past years to quench a growing thirst in the US and China.

Saudi Aramco, Saudi Arabia's national oil company, is on schedule to boost its production capacity from 10.5m to 12.5m barrels a day by 2009, while the energy ministry is keeping tight control of exactly how much of this it chooses to pump each day. The rest remains underground, for use in the event of a sudden supply interruption elsewhere in the world.

In fact, signs of a shift in Riyadh's policy began to emerge in October. It was Saudi Arabia's idea that Opec agree to reduce its production by 1.2m b/d at the cartel's October meeting in Doha.

On Thursday the 11-member group is scheduled to meet again, this time in Abuja, the Nigerian capital.

Mr Naimi's utterance and the immediate echo of agreement from other ministers in Cairo is the best indication yet that the kingdom and Opec are seriously considering another cut to further trim the inventories outside their control.

What remains unclear is whether that cut will come at this week's meeting or whether Saudi Arabia will press fellow members, especially Iran and Kuwait, to better adhere to the Doha cuts before agreeing to deepen them.

Mr Naimi made his position on the issue clear late last month, saying: "The kingdom is not prepared in any way to be alone in the task of balancing the market through what is known as swing production, whereby the kingdom cuts production on its own to maintain prices while others [producers] do not."

DOJ_NMG_0104539

But why would Opec forgo revenue even though prices are again comfortably above $60 a barrel, its unofficial floor?

The answer lies in the nearly 2m b/d of new oil production from outside Opec that the cartel believes will come on stream next year.

Several prominent analysts disagree with Opec's forecasts. Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers, the investment bank, forecasts that countries outside Opec, which are battling steep rates of field decline, will add no more than 1m barrels of net new production in 2007. In fact he argues that, rather than cut supply, Opec will have to plug a hole.

"The question that remains is whether Opec will have the desire or ability to fill the gap that probably will exist next year between growth in demand and non-Opec supply," he wrote in a recent report.

But Opec sees the world supply/demand picture quite differently, especially in the second quarter of next year. In the spring, when the need for winter heating oil drops and petrol demand has yet to pick up for the summer driving season, the cartel expects that the amount of oil it will need to supply the market will plummet to 27.1m b/d from today's 28.9m b/d.

Now the only question is the timing. Will Opec decide to cut this week or wait to reassess the market, inventories and the cartel's adherence to the Doha cuts early next year? Whatever happens, the group's focus, and that of Saudi Arabia in particular, is yet again firmly set on reducing the consuming world's oil inventories and reasserting the group's clout.

North Korea To Return To Multiparty Talks On Nuclear Program (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

SEOUL -- North Korea will return to nuclear-disarmament talks with five other nations in Beijing next Monday. But expectations are low that the meeting, the first such one in 13 months, can produce a breakthrough, reducing tensions with neighbors and the U.S.

After testing a nuclear device Oct. 9, North Korea early last month said it was willing to resume the so-called six-party talks that it abandoned in November 2005. And two weeks ago, officials from China, North Korea and the U.S. met to set a foundation for the reopened discussions, which also include Japan, Russia and South Korea.

The U.S. is ready to offer more specific incentives to North Korea than were agreed to in September 2005, when the six countries reached a tentative pact in which the North would receive financial and energy assistance in return for giving up its nuclear-weapons pursuit. Last month, President George W. Bush reiterated his willingness to discuss a prize long sought by the North Koreans: a declaration that ends the 56-year-old Korean War, in which the U.S. sided with South Korea.

But even with offers of big political and economic incentives, North Korea is unlikely to end its nuclear program quickly. Its dictator leader, Kim Jong Il, depends for power on the perception among the masses that the country is in a continuous fight with hostile foreign forces -- and nuclear weapons provide the ultimate defense.

The U.S. envoy to the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, struck a cautious tone in discussing expectations for next week's meeting. "We've got some things we need done, and I suspect they will have some of their own ideas for what they want from the process," Mr. Hill said in an email. "So we'll see what we can come up with."

North Korea says it is in favor of denuclearization and signed a treaty with South Korea in the early 1990s pledging to keep the Korean peninsula free of nuclear weapons. But Pyongyang continued to develop them. It walked away from the September 2005 deal with complaints about a separate U.S. investigation of its alleged money-laundering and counterfeiting activities. The probe led to a freeze on North Korean assets in a bank in Macau that was a key financial conduit for Pyongyang.

The U.S. also has said it is willing to discuss a way to end sanctions on the Macau bank, but officials say North Korea would have to halt illegal financial activities.

Analysts say the rosiest outcome for the meeting would be for the six countries to return to the conditions set in last year's deal. "If the next round gets us back to September of last year, then we can start talking about a more substantial retooling," says John Feffer, director of global affairs at the International Relations Center, a private group in Washington.

China Gears Up For Six-nation Talks On NKorea Nuclear Program (AFP)

By Karl Malakunas

AFP, December 11, 2006

Six-nation talks aimed at dismantling North Korea's nuclear program will begin in China within one week, the United States said, ending a 13-month hiatus during which Pyongyang tested an atomic bomb.

The US State Department announced late on Sunday that the talks would resume "around December 16" in Beijing, with a firm date expected to be confirmed on Monday.

The talks -- which involve the two Koreas, host China, the United States, Japan and Russia -- started in 2003 in an effort to stop the North acquiring nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0104540

North Korea had boycotted the talks since November last year in protest at financial sanctions against it for alleged money laundering and counterfeiting.

It then stunned the world on October 9 by conducting its first ever nuclear weapons test, triggering global condemnation -- including from closest ally China -- and UN sanctions.

The United States had insisted since then that it would not return to the talks until it was sure Pyongyang would make major concessions and significant progress would be made.

In announcing the December 16 date, US State Department spokeswoman Joanne Moore said Washington expected the talks to focus on implementing an agreement in September last year when the North agreed to give up its nuclear program.

In what was seen then as a major breakthrough, the North said it would end its nuclear weapons activities in return for security guarantees, energy and other aid.

However there was no word from any of the parties involved on Monday if the United States or North Korea had indeed given any ground, fueling pessimism that the talks may degenerate into another round of labored discussions that achieve nothing.

"I find it extremely difficult to be optimistic about this next round of talks," said Ralph Cossa, president of the Pacific Forum CSIS research institute in Hawaii and member of the Council on US-Korean Security Studies.

"It seems to me so many people are now just defining success as holding talks."

Cossa said the North Koreans had made it clear they would return to talks only if the issue of the US sanctions imposed against it -- which has seen 24 million dollars frozen in a Macau bank -- was resolved.

However he said it was extremely unlikely the United States had given the North Koreans any indication that the sanctions would be lifted.

"It's very difficult for the United States to quietly make an agreement on this. It's a matter of (US) law. It can come to a conclusion that they should be lifted but it's pretty remote."

A key policymaker in Japan's ruling party also warned Sunday that major compromise from Pyongyang was a must in the next round of negotiations.

"The six-party talks should not resume without careful consideration," Syoichi Nakagawa, chairman of the Liberal Democratic Party's policy research council, told a television news program.

"It's okay if (North Korea) brings something about progress or contribution to peace. But otherwise, it's no good. We don't think that resuming talks itself is meaningful."

China hosted two rounds of meetings in October and November between the North Korean and Chinese envoys to the talks in an effort to kickstart the negotiations.

China's foreign ministry had no comment when asked on Monday when the talks would resume.

N.Korean Nuclear Talks To Resume Dec. 18 (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, December 11, 2006

International talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear weapons program are likely to resume in the week starting Dec. 18, South Korea's top nuclear envoy said Sunday.

Chun Yung-woo told The Associated Press that he expects the talks to resume in the week starting Dec. 18, but that consultations are still under way and China will announce the date soon.

In Washington, a senior U.S. official said Saturday the talks are expected to reconvene Dec. 18 in Beijing and continue for three to five days. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because host China has not announced a final schedule.

North Korea has boycotted the talks since November last year, angered by U.S. financial restrictions imposed because of Pyongyang's alleged involvement in money laundering and counterfeiting of dollars.

The parties to the talks — the two Koreas, the U.S., China, Russia and Japan — have been trying to set a date for the fresh round of talks. North Korea agreed to a resumption of negotiations after it tested a nuclear bomb on Oct. 9.

Chun said Seoul hopes to see "substantial progress toward implementing the Sept. 19 statement" in the upcoming nuclear talks, referring to a breakthrough agreement reached at talks last year when North Korea agreed to abandon its atomic program in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Saturday that any future nuclear talks must yield "early and concrete results."

"We believe it is necessary for North Korea to show concrete actions toward the abandonment of all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs," Abe said.

DOJ_NMG_0104541

Last month, the U.S. offered North Korea specific details about the kind of economic and energy assistance the North would receive in exchange for shutting down its nuclear arms facilities. But it remains unclear whether the communist country has made specific promises for the outcome of the new talks.

In Tokyo, a top Japanese ruling party official warned Sunday that that his country opposes resuming the nuclear talks unless Pyongyang is ready to compromise.

"It's fine if North Korea can bring some contribution to peace, but simply starting talks is not meaningful," Shoichi Nakagawa, chairman of the Liberal Democratic Party's policy research council, said on a morning talk show carried by public broadcaster NHK.

Vietnam Trade Deal Is Hailed In US (FT)

By Amy Kazmin And Eoin Callan

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

Vietnam and US business leaders hailed a US Congressional vote Sunday to permanently normalise trade relations with Vietnam, the final step on the long road to reconciliation between the two countries after their bitter war 30 years ago.

The historic measure – adopted as part of a massive bill combining various tax and trade measures – ends an old, Cold War-era requirement that Washington evaluate Hanoi's human rights record as a pre-condition for renewing normal trade relations with Vietnam each year.

The pact – passed with strong bi-partisan support over the weekend before the Republicans surrender power in the Congress – will ensure that US companies can fully benefit from Vietnam's accession to the World Trade Organisation on December 28.

"This event is of major significance for the ties between Vietnam and the United States," said Le Dung, Vietnam's foreign ministry spokesman.

George W. Bush – who last month became only the second US president to visit Vietnam since the end of the war three decades ago – said the development "marks a significant step forward in the process of normalising relations with Vietnam, and will benefit both our nations".

The US business community expressed strong relief at the news, after the embarrassing fiasco last month on the eve of Mr Bush's visit, when a rushed effort to normalise trade relations with the Communist-ruled country failed to muster adequate Congressional support.

Since the US and Vietnam signed a bilateral trade deal in late 2001, two-way trade between the two countries has risen to $7.8bn a year, up from $1.2bn in 2000, an increase driven mainly by surging Vietnamese exports of garments, shoes, furniture and seafood to the US. To join the WTO, Hanoi has agreed to liberalise its domestic service industries, including banking and insurance, sectors of keen interest to many US companies, eager to tap into a fast-growing market of 84m people.US companies had feared that they could be disadvantaged in accessing the market if Washington had not fully normalised trade relations with Vietnam.

David Knapp, chairman of the the American Chamber of Commerce in Vietnam, said he was "pleased" with the vote, and that he expected US businesses to enjoy "increased opportunities in both the goods and services sectors" as a result of Vietnam's WTO accession.

Susan Schwab, US trade representative, said: "This bill shows that contrary to conventional wisdom, Democrats and Republicans, the administration and Congress, can work together to further our vital trade agenda."

"The vote also demonstrates to our trading partners in East Asia, the US commitment to strengthen and deepen our relationships in that region," she added.

The advance for the White House trade agenda comes amid setbacks on several fronts, as free trade negotiations with South Korea stall and deals with Peru and Colombia run into opposition from Democrats over labour standards.

US business groups welcomed the normalisation of relations with Vietnam as part of wider trade and tax package. John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said: "These are all critical trade programs for US manufacturers and our trade partners in the development world."

Bruce Josten, of the US chamber of commerce, said the trade measures were of "critical" importance to business and would "expand US trade and economic competitiveness and promote growth".

China's Shifting Growth May Alter Its Taste For Foreign Investment (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104542

BEIJING -- China's entry into the World Trade Organization, five years ago today, sparked an economic expansion that is the envy of the world. But now, that very growth is posing new problems for China and its increasingly uneasy trading partners.

Over the past five years, the size of China's economy has nearly doubled, with annual output surpassing $2 trillion in 2005. The world's most populous nation is now its fourth-largest economy and third-largest exporter.

China's WTO entry did what officials inside and outside the country were hoping it would -- increase trade and make markets more competitive. By becoming more open, China has become stronger and more prosperous. But the growing size and sophistication of its domestic economy have made the outside world less important to China's economic vigor now than it was during the early years of the country's export boom. That raises an important question: Will China continue to be ever-more welcoming to foreign investment in the years ahead?

Even as China has begun to take a more active role in international affairs, its economic strategy has shifted inward. It is increasingly trying to nurture homegrown companies, rather than simply providing an attractive climate for multinational corporations to set up shop.

There's an emerging consensus among the nation's leaders that China no longer needs to cater to the whims of foreign investors in order to grow. That shift in sentiment was underscored earlier this year when China's economic planners called for more-selective approval of foreign investment and fewer giveaways, such as tax breaks or land.

U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's scheduled visit to Beijing this week is part of a continuing effort by China's trading partners to deal with this new reality.

When China won the WTO's seal of approval in late 2001, it was a signal to the world that Beijing wasn't going to turn its back on capitalism. That sent a flood of foreign investment sweeping into China, surging from roughly $40 billion annually in the years before 2002 to more than $70 billion last year.

China's economic ascendance hasn't been altogether comfortable for much of the rest of the world. The addition of China's vast, low-cost labor pool to the global work force has put widespread pressure on jobs and wages in many wealthier nations. It often seems to employees of U.S. and European companies that their bosses prefer to hire workers to make things in China rather than use their home-country assembly lines.

In some ways, the change has also been painful for China. As it has phased out state control of its economy, China has dismantled much of its health-care and social-welfare system and laid off millions of workers from state-run companies. Competition from foreign companies sometimes gets the blame for the resulting social problems.

Even so, China has largely adhered to its WTO commitments, though some critics say it hasn't been aggressive enough in combating copyright piracy or letting market forces influence its currency's foreign-exchange rates.

And while complaints about China's trading practices are rife, it is also clear that China's economy is in many ways more open than Japan's was during its rise in the 1980s and India's is today.

Japan was once notorious for the difficulty foreign companies faced in penetrating its maze of tariffs and regulations. Even though it is much more open now, imports still account for only about 11% of the country's gross domestic product. The equivalent figure for China was 29% last year.

Compared with India, China's greater openness is visible at street level. Wal-Mart Stores Inc. outlets are fixtures in every major Chinese city. The U.S. discount retailer now has 66 stores in China and is building more -- but it has yet to open a single outlet in India, where government rules ban most direct foreign investments in the retail sector.

The regulatory overhaul that China undertook to meet the requirements of WTO membership meant allowing new competition in industries long dominated by state-owned firms. Among other things, that process jump-started financial restructuring. Four of China's five biggest banks now trade on international stock markets and boast big foreign shareholders.

Not every industry is equally open, and some openings have had unanticipated consequences. Take cars, which very few of China's private citizens owned when the WTO pact was signed. Then-U.S. Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky, explaining the benefits of a WTO deal in April 2000, noted how "a combination of trade barriers and industrial policies makes it virtually impossible to export cars to China." The country subsequently removed many of those barriers, and auto sales boomed as car prices fell.

The boom came so quickly that infrastructure and public transport haven't kept up: Major cities are now choked with traffic and smog, especially Beijing, where a car's average speed can be slower than a bicycle's at peak hours.

What didn't happen, however, was a boom in car exports to China. China did buy more cars from abroad -- 143,000 vehicles in 2005, compared with 61,000 in 2001 -- but most of the market has gone to locally made vehicles. Passenger-car sales are expected to top three million this year, up from fewer than one million in 2001. The Chinese market's combination of huge size and rapid growth made it irresistible to global auto makers, but the companies quickly realized that making cars locally was the best way to cater to Chinese tastes and budgets.

Peter Pang, the China president of German auto-parts and power-tools maker Robert Bosch GmbH, has seen a similar shift play out in his business. When the Stuttgart-based company came to China in the 1990s, high tariffs and government policies essentially forced it to use a local joint venture to get into the market. These days, Bosch has much more freedom to import its products if it needs to. But the Chinese market has become so much bigger and tougher, Mr. Pang says, that "you have to make locally simply because otherwise you won't be competitive."

That changing dynamic has raised questions about the future of market-opening reforms in China. The country's entry into the WTO on Dec. 11, 2001, started it on a path of gradually lifting tariffs and other trade and investment barriers. While China hasn't been released from its WTO obligations, it has come to the end of the changes it was specifically required to make under its terms of entry.

As a result, the search is on for ways to continue to engage China. Much of the U.S. cabinet will visit Beijing this week for the first meeting of a so-called strategic economic dialogue, a new series of high-level meetings to discuss the two countries' relationship. The European Union is planning a similar process.

"China is more open than at any time in its history," said Minister of Commerce Bo Xilai in a recent speech. But, he added, "The coming five years will be an even more important period for China's development."

China Faces Fresh Tasks On Trade (FT)

By Alan Beattie And Richard Mcgregor

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

Organising more than 100 countries in the World Trade Organisation was already like herding cats. When China joined the WTO five years ago today, the system faced a rather tougher test: adding a particularly large and fearsome tiger to the enclosure.

China's WTO membership has been an exceptional endeavour both for a country that had turned to the market economy only 20 years before joining and for an organisation that had itself been in existence only seven years. So far China's accession has done the country a lot of good, the WTO a fair amount of good and China's trading partners more good than they are generally willing to admit.

But as evinced by US sabre-rattling ahead of its official mission to Beijing this week headed by Hank Paulson, Treasury secretary, China's challenges will, if anything, increase rather than diminish now its five-year transition period is over.

The milestone marks a difference that is more symbolic than practical, though it does coincide with several deadlines for commitments, such as opening up the banking sector. It also means that as an established member of the club, China will face louder and more urgent calls to play by WTO rules.

Moreover, China has been lucky that its five years of membership have coincided with remarkable resilience in global economic growth. If economies stall and unemployment starts rising across the world, irritation with its perceived failings as a trading partner could easily escalate into virulent anger.

China itself has been the most obvious beneficiary from its WTO membership. Its exporters have benefited greatly from increased and guaranteed access to foreign markets, while trepidation about exposing its industries to what China regards as the multinational "wolves" of world trade has substantially been assuaged. Long Yongtu, who was China's chief negotiator on WTO entry, says he is as surprised as anyone. "No one could have predicted that China's foreign trade could increase at such a speed," he says.

China's exporters were already performing very well outside the WTO. But both exports and imports have accelerated since 2001 – and membership not only helped domestic reform but also reassured both Chinese and foreign companies that access to markets was much less likely suddenly to be taken away.

For Mr Long, and Zhu Rongji, the then premier who forced the accession through a resistant bureaucracy, the past five years have provided a spectacular vindication of their strategy to use pressure from WTO accession to force domestic reform and make the Chinese economy more competitive. Mr Long singles out the automotive and agriculture sectors to illustrate how the economy has been transformed in the past five years because of the WTO.

"Before the WTO, Chinese-made cars were expensive and the quality was poor," he says.

WTO membership mandated a large cut in tariffs from a maximum value of 125 per cent, depending on the type of engine, to 25 per cent, a policy complemented by Beijing's decision to allow foreign carmakers into China en masse through 50-50 joint ventures with local partners. A number of competitive, independent domestic carmakers have also established a foothold.

Falling prices, combined with rising local incomes and increased competition, have seen an explosion in car sales, from just under 1m in 2001 to an estimated 4m this year. "That has changed not just China's car industry but also lifestyles, just like what happened in the US and other western countries," says Mr Long.

Nick Reilly, Asia-Pacific president for General Motors of the US, says he too was pleasantly surprised at the size of the new middle-class Chinese consumer market. Mr Reilly told chief executives at the recent Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation meeting in Hanoi: "A decade ago we thought we might sell 60,000 vehicles a year to government officials and state-owned enterprises. In fact we are selling 900,000 a year, largely to the newly affluent."

Chinese agriculture, considered the most vulnerable sector and the most politically sensitive because of the size of the rural population, has also survived and, in some sectors, thrived. In many ways it has displayed a textbook "comparative advantage" response to being opened up. A populous country with relative shortages of land and water, China has increased imports of water- and land-intensive commodities such as soya beans and wheat – and on occasion even rice, a highly symbolic crop – and shifted domestic production towards labour-intensive crops such as fruit and vegetables.

Mr Long came under sharp attack at home for agreeing to so-called "tariff-rate quotas", a form of price-based import allowance, for grain, which is still regarded in China as strategically vital to food security. His critics said foreigners would fill the quotas, even if the extra grain were not needed, something that has not happened.

"Now people understand how these quotas work," he says. "They were very suspicious."

Still, suspicions remain within China that WTO membership has not prevented China getting a raw deal from international trading partners. Much of China's trading heft has come from foreign-owned companies, which account for 58 per cent of total exports and much larger shares of the higher-value products into which the country is trying to move.

Rupert Schlegelmilch, head of China trade relations at the European Commission, says: "Foreign companies play leading roles in some important sectors in China, which fuels a degree of 'investment nationalism' in some circles in China: complaints that China's economy has a strong body with strong limbs but no head and that there is not enough transfer of technology."

Investment and trade nationalism are not helped by episodes such as the China National Offshore Oil Corporation's failed takeover approach for Unocal, the American oil company, which the US blocked on national security grounds. Nor were the Chinese impressed by the imposition by the EU and US of emergency "safeguard" import restrictions on Chinese clothing shortly after the expiry of a global system of textile quotas last year – a deadline for which they and textile companies had been given 10 years' warning.

Wang Jinzhen, secretary-general of China's Council for the Promotion of International Trade, says: "The US and EU had a lot of time to make the transition but did not until the very last minute."

Outside China, sentiment about its WTO membership is even more mixed. Its massive increase in exports has provoked a tumult of complaints about unfair trade. Capitol Hill tends to look at America's growing bilateral trade deficit with China without accepting that it mainly reflects China's core strength as an assembler of components it imports from elsewhere, and that China's overall trade surplus is quite modest.

Many objections are related to China's manipulation of its currency, which falls outside the WTO's competence. Within the WTO, those industries dependent on intellectual property rights (IPR) protection, particularly films and music, have worn themselves hoarse about the feebleness of China's promised clampdown on compact disc and DVD counterfeiters. The EU and the US say too much of China's service sector, particularly financial services, remains hedged round with impenetrable regulations.

But the dominant feeling so far in Washington and Brussels is that China's WTO membership has been a net positive for both the country and the organisation, rather than the pessimistic minority view that China has flouted WTO rules and brought itself and the system into disrepute. The most dramatic symbol of US protectionism – a bill to impose 27.5 per cent tariffs on all Chinese imports, which would be flatly illegal under WTO rules – was withdrawn by its sponsors in September with the promise of a WTO-compliant replacement.

Only one case against China has so far been pursued in the WTO's dispute settlement body – a joint action by the EU, US and Canada on car parts, imports of which they say China is taxing unfairly. The US continues to warn that a case against IPR violations is likely unless compliance improves.

Though China is at the centre of plenty of other disputes, its membership of the WTO has at least helped to moderate and regulate those. For example, China is both by far the biggest target and an enthusiastic user of so-called "anti-dumping" actions – retaliatory tariffs countries impose on supposedly subsidised imports. These tariffs are imposed bilaterally but WTO rules limit their scope.

Simon MacKinnon, Greater China president at Corning, the US glass and technology company, says China's WTO membership has made a marked difference in atmosphere. Corning, one of the world's biggest manufacturers of optical fibre, was accused but then cleared of dumping in an investigation by China's commerce ministry. "China's WTO membership has brought more visibility," Mr MacKinnon says. "China is part of the WTO trade dispute resolution process and China has a seat at the table." Corning has now invested heavily in China.

Still, there is one area where China has conspicuously avoided responsibility – the stalled Doha round of trade talks, whose launch coincided with China's accession. Beijing has left the representation of the developing world to other governments, notably India and Brazil, despite entreaties from other negotiating parties including the US and EU to play a more active public role. The Chinese attitude has been, in the words of Grant Aldonas, until last year US commerce undersecretary for international trade: "We gave at the office."

Beijing argues that it has had its hands full implementing its WTO accession commitments. This looks more like an excuse than a reason, but a tactically sound one. Silence on Doha deprives of evidence those domestic critics who say Beijing is volunteering to expose too much of China's economy to foreign competition. Bo Xilai, the ambitious commerce minister, is pushing for a promotion to vice-premier at the five-yearly party congress next year. Mr Bo has elevated his profile with strong nationalistic attacks on American and European critics of China's supposedly export-obsessed trade policy.

Internationally, Chinese exporters are already causing more than enough concern among both rich and poor trading partners without its bureaucrats also throwing their weight around. India, for example, says its reluctance to allow deep cuts in import tariffs on industrial goods reflects a fear of exports from China. Similarly, if China volunteered to reduce the protection of its farmers or service companies, other developing countries might have to follow suit.

Looking ahead, trade tensions involving China are if anything likely to rise rather than moderate. As China goes up the value chain to more sophisticated goods, its companies will increasingly compete directly with those in developed countries. Trade lawyers reckon there is a large number of potential WTO legal cases.

Any economic slowdown that pushes up US unemployment would test the patience of American lawmakers with Chinese intransigence on the level of its currency or any other trade-related issue. A big fall in commodity prices will encourage a flood of anti-dumping cases against China from steelmakers that do not share the views of Mr Wang from the trade promotion council, who says: "There is no way for the US to continue to be engaged in those lower-technology industries including textiles and, I personally think, even steel...Maybe [the US steel industry] will last another 10 years."

China's entry into the WTO fold was a big risk and the country needs to continue to pussyfoot warily around its fellow members. But so far, if only tentatively and partially, so good.

A Broad Dialogue With China (WP)

By Henry M. Paulson

Washington Post, December 11, 2006

My highest priority as Treasury secretary is the long-term strength and competitiveness of the U.S. economy. Managing our economic relationship with China to ensure both nations benefit is vital to our nation's future prosperity. A market-based economy in China, with sustainable economic growth and full participation in rules-based international trade, is in our best interest -- and in the interest of the Chinese people.

Since 1980 China's share of the world economy has more than quadrupled. The United States and China now account for almost half of global economic growth. And bilateral trade between our two nations grew by a factor of five over the past decade. Beyond the numbers, the U.S.-China economic relationship epitomizes both the opportunities and challenges of globalization.

This week a delegation made up of U.S. Cabinet secretaries, agency directors and the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben Bernanke, will participate in the first meeting of our new Strategic Economic Dialogue with China.

Presidents Bush and Hu Jintao launched the dialogue in September to focus on China's successful integration into the global economy and ensure that China continues on its market-based reform path.

My colleagues and I will meet with Chinese leaders in Beijing for discussions in three areas: maintaining sustainable growth without large trade imbalances; continuing to open markets to trade, competition and investment; and improving energy security and the environment.

China is at a crucial juncture. Decisions it makes in the next few years will have long-lasting effects around the world. The United States and China each have a vision of how our relationship will evolve, and in many respects our visions are similar.

We both want strong commercial ties that produce benefits for workers and consumers in America and China. We both want China to grow in a way that is sustainable economically and environmentally and that contributes to global prosperity. We both want China to be a responsible stakeholder in the global economy and in multilateral institutions.

We do have our differences. The United States believes China can do more to reduce its trade surplus. We are encouraging China to introduce greater flexibility for its currency, consistent with economic fundamentals. And China needs to do more to protect intellectual property rights.

Our goal is to advance our common interests and find solutions to issues that strain our relationship. The United States and China are engaged in dozens of bilateral negotiations at multiple levels. This has produced positive outcomes, but it can be difficult to address issues that cut across numerous sectors and areas of responsibility. The dialogue will allow us to meet with several Chinese leaders at once and begin to address important issues comprehensively.

For instance, transparency and respect for the rule of law are core principles that affect all economic policy and trade issues. Commitments to these principles are essential to China's maintaining the confidence of international businesses and of its own investors and entrepreneurs. Working on these principles across government ministries can enhance our ability to reach agreement on a number of key issues that we negotiate ministry-by-ministry.

One of the most important topics for discussion is how to help China manage its transition to freer, more open markets, including capital markets. Every strong, vibrant economy in the world has open, competitive capital markets that attract investment and allocate resources to their most productive uses. Such markets will contribute to sustained economic growth and boost job creation in China. And strengthening and reforming financial markets will ultimately allow the Chinese to freely float their currency.

The Chinese government is committed to creation of a social safety net, including health and retirement programs that will contribute to balanced growth by giving Chinese workers and families the confidence to spend more.

China's high saving rate is a major contributor to the country's large global trade surplus. Increasing consumption in China will benefit U.S. and other exporters.

Energy is an issue with far-reaching effects. Both the pattern of China's growth -- with its heavy dependence on industry -- and low domestic prices for energy have led to rapidly increasing energy use by China. Unfortunately, because of technological and infrastructure challenges, much of that energy is produced from sources that generate high levels of pollution. This harms the air and water we all share, and creates health problems for Chinese citizens.

Through the Strategic Economic Dialogue, we can work with China's leaders to help it achieve more environmentally and economically sound growth and constructive engagement with the global energy market.

This is a pivotal moment for China and for our relationship with that country. By engaging Chinese leaders with an eye to producing long-term benefits for our two nations, we can build a productive and prosperous partnership for the 21st century.

Chinese Voices That Oppose Reform Grow Louder (FT)

By Susan Schwab

Financial Times, December 11, 2006

One of the most important events in modern economic history occurred five years ago on Monday when China joined the World Trade Organisation. This anniversary provides the opportunity to take stock – through a congressionally mandated report issued on Monday by the office of the US Trade Representative – of China's integration into the global economy and its compliance with WTO obligations.

The record is profoundly mixed. China has moved with resolve to reform some of its economic and governmental structures over the past five years. It has enacted or revised over 1,000 laws and regulations to help bring its trading system into compliance with WTO rules. It has also reduced tariffs on goods of great importance to US industry from an average of 25 per cent in 1997 to 7 per cent today, with similarly significant reductions for agricultural products.

In addition, it has reduced or eliminated numerous non-tariff barriers, increased market access for international service providers and improved the transparency of its governmental procedures. These steps have expanded economic growth in both countries and contributed to a roughly 190 per cent increase in US goods exports to China over the past five years. Today, China is America's fourth largest export market – up from 15th a decade ago.

WTO accession has also helped promote the rule of law in China and subjected the country to binding international dispute settlement procedures. Nevertheless, looking back on the past year, we see troubling indications that China's momentum towards reform has begun to slow. Voices in China opposing further market liberalisation have grown louder and government intervention in the economy, especially at the provincial level, has increased.

While facing fewer blanket prohibitions or prohibitive tariffs, US companies face an array of regulatory obstacles and government policies that make doing business in China uncertain.

Later this week, I will join other administration officials on a trip to China as part of the new strategic economic dialogue led by Treasury secretary Hank Paulson. As part of this dialogue, we will clearly convey our view that a slowdown in reform hinders China's development and undermines the health of our bilateral ties.

One of the most serious challenges identified by USTR is the rampant infringement of intellectual property rights that persists in China in spite of efforts by central government officials to move against this illegal practice. Counterfeiting, piracy and inadequate enforcement of intellectual property protections rob US businesses of billions of dollars a year in legitimate sales and weaken China's development of its own knowledge-based industries.

Of equal concern is China's continued use of industrial policies that limit imports of goods, government subsidies that encourage exports and protect non-competitive industries, and regulatory barriers that impede participation in China's market by US service providers. There are many other areas, from steel to telecommunications, where China's incomplete move away from a centrally-planned to a market-based economy is creating massive distortions that could leave the Chinese and global economies at risk. In agriculture, we are pleased by the rise in US exports to China. But our exporters continue to be frustrated with practices that make China one of the world's least transparent and predictable markets.

The large US trade deficit with China, which this year will exceed the $202bn reached in 2005, is due to factors including differences in patterns of saving, investment and consumption as well as fiscal and monetary policies. Our trade policies can help reduce the imbalance to the extent it arises from closed markets or unfair trade practices. USTR and other US government agencies are aggressively addressing our trade concerns with China through the Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade and other bilateral forums. Multilateral negotiations under the Doha round of trade talks, litigation through the WTO and the application of trade remedy laws are other important avenues. Whether through dialogue, negotiation or dispute settlement, China must be held to its commitments to reform.

We want a strong trade relationship with this vast and fast-growing economy. The potential benefits for Americans – in exports, jobs and greater economic competitiveness – are enormous. But that depends on China's continued reform, and on a commitment to expand free and fair trade based on decisions by the actors in the market – not by bureaucrats.

Cracking The Currency Puzzle (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Five years ago today, China joined the World Trade Organization. The experiment has gone astonishingly well: China has changed more than 3,000 regulations to comply with WTO requirements. And yet an awkward question hovers over Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's China trip this week: How to deal with a country that appears to distort trade not through tariffs or quotas but through currency and savings policies?

This dilemma reflects a lopsidedness in the rules of globalization. To keep the trade playing field balanced, the WTO presides over a vast apparatus of quasi-law governing subsidies and tariffs; violators can be hauled in front of WTO tribunals. But there is no equivalent mechanism, other than a dormant provision buried in the charter of the International Monetary Fund, to punish countries that skew trade by manipulating their currencies. And there is no sanction at all for pursuing a growth strategy that relies on exports more than domestic consumption.

China has made the most of this vacuum. When it joined the WTO in 2001, its current account surplus (trade plus a few other cross-border payments) was a modest 1.3 percent of gross domestic product. As recently as 2004, when Congress was beating up China for its alleged manipulation of trade, it was possible to retort that China's surplus was just over half the size of Germany's. But this year China's surplus is expected to hit a breathtaking 8 percent or 9 percent of GDP. In absolute terms, it has overtaken Germany's surplus and even Japan's, despite the fact that Japan's GDP remains more than twice the size of China's.

How has China done this? Unlike Japan, it has not closed its economy. Instead, China's surplus reflects, first, a currency that's about a fifth undervalued and so encourages exports; and second, a reluctance to stimulate domestic consumption, which forces companies to sell a large slice of their output to foreigners.

The extraordinary growth of the Chinese surplus has created an unlikely echo of the left's complaints about globalization. The left frequently charges that the international system is unfair: It has rules to enforce open trade, but none to enforce decent labor standards. For years, free-traders have dismissed this as an apples-to-oranges comparison: There are international rules for trade because trade is a necessarily cross-border affair, whereas the appropriate level of labor protection varies among countries. But now economists with impeccable free-trade credentials are saying that there ought to be an international mechanism to enforce responsible exchange-rate policies, and never mind the fact that these have traditionally been viewed as the province of national governments.

The urge to pressure China over its currency policy makes more sense than the urge to punish it for its labor policy. China's dynamic economy has lifted well over 100 million people out of poverty, and excessive labor regulations that slowed growth would harm workers rather than helping them. But China's weak currency, allied with its reluctance to stimulate domestic consumption, damages its economy and workers as well as stirring up trouble for foreigners.

China's commitment to a weak currency limits its freedom to raise interest rates, since higher rates tend to suck in foreign capital and drive the exchange rate upward. This inhibits efforts to use the interest-rate tool to dampen the economy when it overheats -- which explains why China has experienced boom-bust cycles. Meanwhile, a growth strategy that relies on foreign rather than Chinese consumers is not great for the Chinese. China is saving rather than consuming, which means its living standards are lower than they could be.

Then there is the effect of China's policies on foreigners. The challenge of integrating a vast pool of cheap labor into the world trading system is compounded when a low exchange rate makes that labor even cheaper. And the challenge of dealing with America's mirror-image problem of low savings is rendered harder, too. If the United States boosts saving and cuts spending, there'll be a nasty recession unless foreigners buy more U.S. exports. China should let its currency rise so as to assist America's necessary adjustment.

Yet it's one thing to agree that China needs to revalue and quite another to conclude that globalization's rules should punish currency "manipulators." Various forms of currency management are common and sometimes even good -- lots of countries have used currency pegs to conquer inflation, and China's own peg was a bulwark against the turmoil of the East Asian crisis. As to China's savings addiction, American policymakers have to be cautious: China's savings excess is no more egregious than America's savings deficit.

So long as there is globalization, its rules will be debated. It will always feel odd that some aspects of the system are subject to quasi-law while others seem anarchic. But there's a perfectly good reason why trade, unlike labor standards or currency policies, is so intensively rules-based. For nearly all countries at nearly all times, cutting trade barriers make sense. But when it comes to labor standards or currency regimes, such generalization is impossible.

Rights Group Urges China To End Curbs On Lawyers (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 10 — Rules requiring Chinese lawyers to submit to government supervision when representing clients in politically delicate cases have dealt a serious blow to the country's legal system and should be rescinded, Human Rights Watch said in a report to be issued Monday.

The rights group said the rules, known as "guiding opinions," effectively shut down the legal system to people fighting official land confiscations, forced relocation, corruption, pollution and other politically delicate matters in China's one-party system.

"These restrictions effectively deprive people with lawful collective complaints of meaningful legal representations and risk instilling a sense of futility about legal avenues of redress," the report said. "That may exacerbate social unrest in the future."

The Chinese police have reported a surge in "mass incidents," including large demonstrations, in the past several years, with 87,000 such events in 2005.

Statistics for the first nine months of 2006 showed a decline in the number of protests from the year before, but Human Rights Watch said that the numbers were subject to political manipulation and that anecdotal evidence suggested rising discontent.

The "guiding opinions," which were put into effect in the spring, require lawyers who accept cases that involve 10 or more plaintiffs suing organs of the government or the ruling party to submit to "guidance and supervision" by their local judicial bureau and the All-China Lawyers Association, which are under government control.

They also must obtain consent from at least three partners in their law firm before accepting such cases, and they must refrain from "stirring up" news media coverage.

The rules are part of an effort to suppress expression rather than to address the causes of social unrest, lawyers and rights advocates say.

Although rapid economic growth has lifted hundreds of millions of Chinese out of severe poverty, weak property rights and poorly enforced labor and environmental laws have made China's transition to a market economy painful for many millions of people without power to protect their interests.

Lawyers, self-styled legal rights advocates and journalists have been the most conspicuous victims of a campaign by President Hu Jintao to create a more "harmonious society." They have been accused of leading people to take to the streets over lost jobs, unpaid wages, environmental degradation, land seizures and other sources of discontent.

After a rise in protests in 2005, including several well-publicized confrontations in which protesters were killed by riot soldiers or thugs, the authorities moved to prevent social disputes from gaining momentum.

Luo Gan, a member of the Politburo Standing Committee who oversees police and judicial matters for the ruling party, said in an speech published in a state-run magazine that officials should take "forceful measures" against lawyers or rights advocates who use the law as a pretext to "undermine social stability."

DOJ_NMG_0104549

State security officers and the police have arrested or intimidated people associated with China's weiquan, or rights protection movement. At least four prominent lawyers and leading rights advocates, Gao Zhisheng, Chen Guangcheng, Guo Feixiong and Zheng Enchong, were charged with crimes after accepting politically delicate cases.

Human Rights Watch said in its 70-page study of the conditions for defense lawyers that many faced less obvious but nonetheless serious threats to their independence. Their licenses are subject to renewal annually. They depend on the good will of the police, prosecutors and court officials if they wish to take even rudimentary steps to defend their clients.

Several prominent defense lawyers, including Zhang Sizhi, who helped mold the profession after China emerged from the Cultural Revolution, have criticized the "guiding opinions." On Internet sites for lawyers, the rules have been called the biggest blow to the legal system since lawyers won some independence in the 1980s.

The government has defended the rules in the state-run media. Officials contend that they are intended mainly to protect lawyers and plaintiffs in delicate cases and to "safeguard legal rights." Many lawyers and plaintiffs hold the opposite view.

Human Rights Watch said China could not have an effective legal system until it respected the independence of lawyers and freed them from enforcing the will of the ruling party.

Taiwan's Leader Gets Surprise Lift In Local Elections (WSJ)

By Jason Dean And Chiu Piling

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

A better-than-expected performance by Taiwan's governing party in weekend mayoral elections could ease political pressure on President Chen Shui-bian and complicate the opposition's efforts to win back control of the government of Asia's fifth-largest economy in 2008 presidential elections.

The elections for mayor in Taiwan's two biggest cities, Taipei and Kaohsiung, were watched closely as indicators of public support for Mr. Chen's Democratic Progressive Party following a spate of corruption scandals affecting people close to the president. In Saturday's polls, the DPP mayoral candidate in Taipei lost to his opponent from the Kuomintang, or Nationalist Party, by a margin that, while large, was narrower than expected. And the DPP candidate narrowly won in Kaohsiung -- a race the party was expected to lose.

The results are far from signaling an end to Mr. Chen's troubles. His wife, indicted last month for alleged misuse of a secret government diplomatic fund, is likely to face trial next year, and the president's approval ratings remain in the low double digits. But analysts said the mixed outcome could at least mean that Mr. Chen avoids pressure from his party to resign before his second and final four-year term ends in 2008. Such pressure could have increased if Mr. Chen's problems had caused a major defeat for the party Saturday.

The outcome means "relief from President Chen from a potential crisis causing him to step down," said Ho De-fen, a political analyst in Taipei who generally backs the DPP but has been critical of Mr. Chen.

At the same time, the Kuomintang's weaker-than-expected showing dealt a blow to its champion, party chairman and outgoing Taipei mayor Ma Ying-jeou. Mr. Ma has been widely seen as a favorite to win the 2008 presidential vote, a contest already being anticipated by investors and other observers who believe it could yield big changes in Taiwan's relationship with rival China. Mr. Chen's administration has constantly squabbled with China, which claims sovereignty over Taiwan despite nearly six decades of separate rule. Mr. Ma takes a less-confrontational stance toward Beijing, and the possibility of him becoming president has fueled hopes of greater economic ties between Taiwan and China.

But Mr. Ma's previously high popularity has suffered amid allegations that his office improperly accounted for its use of city government funds. And analysts said Mr. Ma is being blamed by many in the opposition for its failure to deal a resounding defeat to the DPP.

The disappointment "has triggered loud criticism from party members of Ma Ying-jeou's integrity and leadership ability," said Wang Yeh-li, a political science professor at Tunghai University in central Taiwan who has supported Mr. Ma in the past.

The Kaohsiung race was especially significant. Southern Taiwan, where Kaohsiung is located, has traditionally been the DPP's base of support. This year, the Kuomintang had hoped that a victory there would debilitate the DPP and solidify its own political momentum heading into legislative elections a year from now and the presidential vote in March 2008.

But DPP candidate Chen Chu won the Kaohsiung race, albeit by just 1,114 votes out of 767,868 total valid ballots. Her opponent, Kuomintang candidate Huang Jun-yin, called for a recount.

In Taipei, Kuomintang candidate Hau Lung-bin won 53.81% of the vote, defeating Frank Hsieh, a former premier under Mr. Chen and possible DPP presidential candidate, who won 40.89%. The margin was far narrower than the 28 points by which Mr. Ma won re-election four years ago.

Augusto Pinochet, Dictator Who Ruled By Terror In Chile, Dies At 91 (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0104550

By Jonathan Kandell

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

Gen. Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, the brutal dictator who repressed and reshaped Chile for nearly two decades and became a notorious symbol of human rights abuse and corruption, died yesterday at the Military Hospital of Santiago. He was 91.

Dr. Juan Ignacio Vergara, head of the medical team that had been treating him, said he died at 2:15 p.m., a week after being hospitalized and undergoing angioplasty and another operation after an acute heart attack. Dr. Vergara said his condition degenerated sharply yesterday morning, and he was moved to the intensive care unit, where he died.

General Pinochet seized power on Sept. 11, 1973, in a bloody military coup that toppled the Marxist government of President Salvador Allende. He then led the country into an era of robust economic growth. But during his rule, more than 3,200 people were executed or disappeared, and scores of thousands more were detained and tortured or exiled.

General Pinochet gave up the presidency in 1990 after promulgating a Constitution that empowered a right-wing minority for years. He held on to his post of commander in chief of the army until 1998. With that power base, he exerted considerable influence over the democratically elected governments that replaced his iron-fisted rule.

He set limits, for example, on economic policy debates with frequent warnings that he would not tolerate a return to statist measures, and he blocked virtually all attempts to prosecute members of his security forces for human rights abuses. Through intimidation and legal obstacles, General Pinochet sought to ensure his own immunity from accountability and in fact was never brought to trial. But in an astonishing turn of events nearly a decade after he stepped down, he was detained in Britain and then, on his return to Chile, forced to spend his retirement years fighting a battery of legal charges relating to human rights violations and personal corruption.

During those last years he lived in near seclusion, mostly at his home in Bucalemu, about 80 miles southwest of Santiago, scorned even by many of his former military colleagues and conservative civilian ideologues. Many were disillusioned by revelations that he held, at the least, $28 million in secret bank accounts abroad.

"The humiliation Pinochet has gone through is probably a better outcome than any trial could have achieved," said José Zalaquett, Chile's foremost human rights lawyer.

He won grudging international praise for some of the free-market policies he instituted, transforming a bankrupt economy into the most prosperous in Latin America. They included removing trade barriers, encouraging export growth, privatizing state-owned industries, creating a central bank able to control interest and exchange rates without government interference, cutting wages sharply, and privatizing the social security system. Many elements of the so-called Chilean model were widely emulated in the region.

But by the time of his death, even some of those economic victories had been called into question. The privatizing of Chile's social security system, in particular, has come under attack as unjust and is undergoing revision. And across Latin America, many of the countries that had adopted similar reforms are reversing some of them, responding to a growing wave of popular, leftist anger over untrammeled foreign competition and unequal distribution of wealth.

Little Use for Constitution

General Pinochet initially led a four-man junta in the 1973 military coup that brought him to power, with the support of the United States government. President Allende, a democratically elected Socialist, was found dead after shooting himself during an assault on the presidential palace in Santiago. The coup followed many months of political unrest and economic chaos. Hyperinflation, recession, labor strife and middle-class protests had sapped the Allende government of popular support.

General Pinochet (pronounced pee-noh-CHET) soon made it clear that he had little use for political parties, banning all of them. He also dissolved Congress and scrapped the Constitution. He blamed the democratic political system for having allowed a coalition of Socialists and Communists to take control of the government. In a 1973 news conference, he asserted that Chile would require "an authoritarian government that has the capacity to act decisively" and would not return to the traditional political party system for a generation. It was a vow he kept.

In 1974, General Pinochet elevated himself to president, reducing the rest of the junta to a consultative role. He appointed military officers as mayors of towns and cities throughout Chile. Retired military personnel were named rectors of universities, and they carried out vast purges of faculty members suspected of left-wing or liberal sympathies.

The press was censored, and labor strikes and unions were banned. A fearsome security apparatus known as the National Intelligence Directorate, or DINA, persecuted, tortured and killed Pinochet opponents within Chile and sometimes beyond its borders. A government-commissioned report issued in 2004 concluded that almost 28,000 people had been tortured during the general's rule.

Military governments were the rule rather than the exception in Latin America in the 1970s. Whether right wing, as in Argentina and Brazil, or left wing, as in Peru, military dictators came to power promising to impose economic discipline but departed, after some initial success, with the economy in disarray.

General Pinochet proved to be the exception. Though no economic expert, he had at his service a team of technocrats who, months before the coup, put together a radical plan to overhaul the country's battered economy. Some had studied with the Nobel Prize winner Milton Friedman at the University of Chicago and embraced his notions of free-market forces and monetarism.

But economic transformation was slow and painful. Mistakes by the general's economic team provoked a deep recession in the early 1980s that left more than a third of the work force without jobs. The poor survived with the help of soup lines and temporary employment in public works projects that paid less than the minimum wage.

Attempts at strikes or other forms of protest were ruthlessly put down by General Pinochet's secret police. That repression gave the free-market policies time to take hold. Since the mid-1980s, Chile's gross domestic product has grown an average of more than 6 percent a year, the most impressive performance in Latin America.

A Steady Rise in the Army

There were few hints in General Pinochet's early life that he harbored either political ambitions or ideological convictions. The son of a customs inspector, he was born into lower middle-class circumstances on Nov. 25, 1915, in the Pacific port city of Valparaíso. He graduated from the military academy in Santiago in 1937 and rose steadily in the officer corps. He was already a general, and only 55, when he was given the important post of commander of the Santiago army garrison in 1971.

It was a crucial moment in President Allende's term. Elected the year before with only 36 percent of the vote, Mr. Allende, a physician, had pressed ahead with a Socialist program to nationalize mines, banks and strategic industries, split up large rural estates into communal farms, and impose price controls. The measures soon resulted in steep declines in production, shortages of consumer goods and explosive inflation. A general strike paralyzed Santiago in late 1972, and General Pinochet, as garrison commander, was called on by Mr. Allende to impose a state of emergency in the capital.

This was the first time most Chileans became aware of the tall, broad-shouldered army officer with a brush mustache on his unsmiling face. General Pinochet imposed a curfew, ordered the arrest of several hundred demonstrators on both the left and the right and announced, "I will not tolerate agents of chaos no matter what their political ideology."

His seemingly neutral stance convinced Mr. Allende that he was an officer who could be relied on to observe the Chilean military's century-long tradition of loyalty to civilian government. In August 1973, he appointed General Pinochet commander in chief of the army.

Less than three weeks later, the armed forces overthrew the government. The presidential palace, known as La Moneda, was bombed and strafed by the air force. Mr. Allende shot himself rather than surrender, according to his personal doctor.

Aside from battles at some factories in the Santiago suburbs, there was little resistance to the overwhelming firepower of the military units that fanned out across the country. Tens of thousands of Allende sympathizers were rounded up and brutally interrogated. A majority of the killings took place in the first three months, long after resistance had ended.

In most cases, prisoners from a slum or agrarian community would be executed as a means of terrorizing their neighbors into accepting military rule. The killings were often cynically, and falsely, justified as cases in which prisoners were shot while trying to escape.

The images that most shaped the outside world's low opinion of the military administration were scenes of Santiago's main sports stadium filled with prisoners, and by the public appearances of General Pinochet, eyes hidden behind dark glasses, face set in a scowl, arms folded defiantly across his chest. Although a majority of executions, jailings and cases of torture took place shortly after the 1973 coup, serious human rights abuses waxed and waned over the next 17 years.

By the late 1980s, the economic prosperity General Pinochet created had lulled him into assuming that in free elections he or his chosen candidate would receive the grateful support of a majority of Chileans. But by then most were either too young to remember the Allende years or too confident about the strength of the economy to believe that only an authoritarian government could ensure growth and stability.

Free Elections Ended Rule

In 1980, a new Constitution backed by the Pinochet government made the armed forces "guarantors of institutionality," giving them a nebulous role as political arbiters. It included several other limitations to full-fledged democracy. But in a 1988 plebiscite, an ample majority of Chileans voted against an attempt by General Pinochet to stay on as president for eight more years.

In presidential elections a year later, the former dictator's candidate was handily defeated by Patricio Aylwin, a centrist Christian Democrat supported by parties of the left. In 1993, another Christian Democrat, Eduardo Frei Ruiz-Tagle, was elected president by an even greater margin.

To the delight of the Chilean business community, foreign investment, which had been stunted during the years the government was regarded with international opprobrium, poured back into the country, and Chilean products were welcomed everywhere abroad. Officials of the new Christian Democratic administration were not inclined to tinker with the roaring economic machine they inherited from the Pinochet administration.

"We may not like the government that came before us," Alejandro Foxley, who was finance minister under Mr. Aylwin and is foreign minister today, said in a 1991 interview. "But they did many things right. We have inherited an economy that is an asset."

With the transition to democracy going so well, even General Pinochet's admirers hoped he would settle into a quieter period. Instead, he staged unannounced military maneuvers or placed his troops on sudden alert and gave notice that he would not tolerate attempts to prosecute his era's human rights violators. "The day they touch one of my men, the rule of law ends," he warned in 1991.

In a rare exception, he stood by as two subordinates were convicted of ordering the murder of Orlando Letelier, foreign minister in the Allende government. Mr. Letelier was killed by a car bomb in Washington in September 1976, along with an American colleague, Ronni Moffitt. The incident, considered the worst act of state-sponsored terrorism on American soil, strained relations between Chile and the United States for almost two decades.

The two went to prison in 1995. Gen. Manuel Contreras Sepúlveda, the head of DINA, the notorious secret police, was sentenced to seven years; his second in command, Col. Pedro Espinoza, was sentenced to six years.

Stories of corruption began swirling around members of General Pinochet's family as well as military personnel, and he used his power as army chief to protect them. He quashed judicial and congressional investigations into the financial dealings of his elder son and of army officers who were accused of running an illegal investment banking operation. Until revelations emerged in late 2004 that he had accumulated secret accounts totaling as much as $8 million at Riggs Bank in Washington, the general, who lived spartanly, was rarely accused of corruption himself. Later, Chilean investigators found that he had as much as $28 million in secret bank accounts in a number of countries.

Through his strong-arm tactics against the democratic governments that succeeded him, General Pinochet was making the point to Chileans that if they wanted to enjoy the capitalist virtues of his former dictatorship, they had better overlook his human rights violations.

Those violations were well documented by the National Commission on Truth and Reconciliation, a nonpartisan group appointed by Mr. Aylwin to investigate the killings and disappearances carried out under the general's 17-year dictatorship. The commission's report cited victims by name and described the ghastly circumstances of their deaths by firing squads, beatings, mutilations, drownings and electrocutions. In all, the report attributed at least 3,200 killings and disappearances to the Pinochet security forces.

General Pinochet scoffed at his human rights critics. Asked about the discovery of a mass grave of his government's victims, he was quoted in the Chilean press as joking that it was an "efficient" way of burial.

Legal Battles to the End

Protected by personal security squads, the general also continued an active social life. He was feted by wealthy admirers on his birthday and on the anniversary of his coup. He was often invited to speak at luncheons given by political supporters and leading businessmen. When he finally stepped down as army chief, he joined the Senate as an unelected, permanent member, apparently intending to grant himself further immunity from prosecution.

But the general did not count on the determination of jurists abroad to bring him to justice. In October 1998, while recuperating in a London clinic from a back operation, he was arrested by the British police in response to an application from a Spanish judge seeking the general's extradition to Madrid to stand trial on charges of genocide, torture and kidnapping.

A 16-month legal battle ensued, ending with a decision to send him back to Chile in March 2000 because his physical and mental ailments made him unfit to stand trial. Days after his return, Ricardo Lagos, the first Socialist to be elected president since the 1973 overthrow of Mr. Allende, assumed office.

For the rest of his life, the general had to fight off lawsuits and accept the humiliation of constant news reports about widespread brutality under his rule. President Lagos allowed the hundreds of criminal complaints filed against General Pinochet to run their course in the courts. He was succeeded in March 2006 by another Socialist, Michelle Bachelet, a former political prisoner and exile. Her father, an air force general loyal to Mr. Allende, was jailed by his colleagues, tortured and died in prison.

General Pinochet spent his final years in near seclusion, with his wife, the former María Lucía Hiriart Rodríguez, 84, with whom he had two sons, Augusto and Marco Antonio, and three daughters, Lucía, Verónica and Jacqueline. They all survive him.

In rare public remarks, he continued to insist that he enjoyed the gratitude and wide support of Chileans. But polls indicated that well over half of his compatriots believed that he should have been prosecuted for his human rights crimes.

A Chilean Dictator's Dark Legacy (WP)

By Monte Reel, J.Y. Smith

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

Gen. Augusto Pinochet, 91, the former Chilean dictator whose government murdered and tortured thousands during his repressive 17-year rule, died yesterday at a Santiago military hospital of complications from a heart attack, leaving incomplete numerous court cases that had sought to bring him to justice.

Pinochet assumed power on Sept. 11, 1973, in a bloody coup supported by the United States that toppled the elected government of Salvador Allende, a Marxist who had pledged to lead his country "down the democratic road to socialism."

First as head of a four-man military junta and then as president, Pinochet served until 1990, leaving a legacy of abuse that took successive governments years to catalogue. According to a government report that included testimony from more than 30,000 people, his government killed at least 3,197 people and tortured about 29,000. Two-thirds of the cases listed in the report happened in 1973.

An austere figure who claimed to be guided by "the spiritual force of God as a believer," Pinochet regarded himself as a soldier rather than a politician. With his stern visage and fondness for military uniforms and dark glasses, he seemed to personify implacable authority. He was both an opponent of communism and a critic of "orthodox democracy," which he said was "too easy to infiltrate and destroy."

"I would like to be remembered as a man who served his country, who served Chile throughout his entire life on this earth," he once told an interviewer. "And what he did was always done thinking about the welfare of Chile and never sacrificing my tradition to hand it to other countries."

Pinochet relinquished the presidency in 1990, but he retained the powerful position of head of the army until 1997, when he became a senator for life. He gave up that position in 2002, claiming mild dementia and physical infirmities -- ailments that helped him avoid trials in hundreds of court cases filed against him in recent years.

But legal actions against Pinochet had gathered momentum in the two years preceding his death, as courts locked several of his key subordinates behind bars and raised hopes among victims' families that Pinochet would meet a similar fate. He had been placed under house arrest in Santiago five times, most recently last month in connection with the murders of two of Allende's bodyguards.

Throughout his later years, Pinochet retained loyal supporters, who credited his government with instituting a fiscal discipline that helped make Chile's economy the region's strongest. But he lost many of those backers after multiple probes in recent years revealed financial corruption, including the discovery of millions of dollars in state funds held in numerous secret overseas accounts, among them several at the former Riggs Bank in Washington. As recently as October, Chilean investigators announced the discovery of 10 tons of gold, worth an estimated $160 million, in Pinochet's name in a Hong Kong bank.

Pinochet remained defiant in the face of the accusations, consistently refusing to apologize for his actions as president. But during his 91st birthday celebration last month, his wife read a statement that indicated the authoritarian took "political responsibility" for his government. The vague nature of the statement did little to appease the families of his victims.

"Today, near the end of my days, I want to say that I harbor no rancor against anybody, that I love my fatherland above all," Pinochet's statement read. "I take political responsibility for everything that was done."

Among the crimes attributed to Pinochet during his reign were several high-profile murders that stretched beyond Chile's borders, many carried out by the Directorate of National Intelligence, or DINA, a fear-inspiring secret police agency that Pinochet organized in 1974.

Prosecutors in Washington in 1999 began investigating Pinochet's possible role in the September 1976 car bombing on Embassy Row that killed Orlando Letelier, a former Chilean foreign minister, and his 25-year-old American assistant, Ronni Karpen Moffitt. Six people were imprisoned for the attack, but the case was reopened after Pinochet was arrested in London in 1998 and held for 17 months on a warrant seeking his extradition to Spain on charges of murdering and torturing Spanish citizens in Chile.

His arrest set off a chain of events that led to his return in 1999 to Chile, where the Supreme Court stripped him of immunity the following year. However, a court ruling in 2002 acknowledged that he had vascular dementia and prevented the cases from going to trial. Chile's courts reversed the ruling of dementia in 2004, deeming him fit to stand trial.

Court filings against Pinochet followed at a rapid pace, and various court rulings toggled back and forth on his legal status. He was stripped of immunity in the case of Gen. Carlos Prats, his predecessor as head of the army, who was assassinated along with his wife in a 1974 car bombing in Argentina.

Last year, another court ruling affirmed his immunity. However, several other cases of human rights abuses were progressing through the court system at the time of his death, including one that charged him with the mass kidnappings and tortures at the infamous Villa Grimaldi prison on the outskirts of Santiago.

To his supporters, Pinochet was a patriot who saved his country from political and economic chaos under the threat of communism, restored order and led it into a period of unprecedented prosperity. In their view, the harsh measures taken under his leadership were justified by the violence of the opposition and the threat of civil war. Finally, they credited Pinochet with restoring the country to civilian leadership under democratic and constitutional principles.

Christian LabbÃ©, a former army colonel and one of Pinochet's closest advisers, told The Washington Post last year that Pinochet had accepted the likelihood that he would die an outcast in his own country, with his achievements under attack by his opponents.

"He knows very well that these things happen to great men," LabbÃ© said. "The great men need to wait for history's judgment, not [current] justice."

The first widespread international backlash against Pinochet followed the Letelier car bombing in 1976. The United States suspended all military aid for several years. Chile was condemned in the United Nations and the European Union. Pinochet disbanded DINA but reorganized the secret police under another name. The Chilean government eventually agreed to pay compensation to the United States but never acknowledged official complicity.

In 1978, Michael Townley, a former CIA employee who worked for DINA, was convicted of placing the bomb on Letelier's car. He implicated Gen. Manuel Contreras, the DINA commander, and Col. Pedro Espinosa, the DINA director of operations. In 1987, army Capt. Armando Fernando Larios, a former DINA operative, surrendered to U.S. authorities and quoted Contreras as saying Pinochet personally had ordered the attack, but offered no direct evidence. In 1993, a Chilean court sentenced Contreras and Espinosa to prison.

In 1982, the movie "Missing" dramatized the fate of two Americans, Charles Horman, 31, and Frank Teruggi, 24, who were killed by Chilean officials in 1973. Those cases are still being litigated.

Though the abuses in Chile lessened considerably in the later years of Pinochet's government, periods of violence and repression occasionally flared throughout his rule. In 1986, for example, the Frente Patriotico Manuel RodrÃ-guez, or FPMR, an organization with links to the communists, announced it was abandoning "peaceful protest" in favor of violence and sabotage. Volodia Teitelboim, the Chilean communist leader, announced on Radio Moscow that it would be a year of "titanic battles."

On July 2, during a general strike, an army patrol seized Rodrigo Rojas, an 18-year-old photographer who lived in Washington, and Carmen Gloria Quintana, 19, and set them on fire. Rojas died four days later, but Quintana survived and was blessed by Pope John Paul II, who visited Chile in 1987. The army at first denied responsibility, but a judge in 1989 sentenced an army captain to 300 days in prison for the attack.

On Sept. 7, the FPMR attempted to assassinate Pinochet as he was driven to Santiago from his country retreat. He escaped unharmed when his driver sped from the scene in reverse. Five bodyguards were killed and 12 were wounded. In retaliation, security agents abducted four communists from their homes and killed them. More than 50 leftists were arrested. The government declared a state of siege.

In the 1980s, Pinochet's government promulgated a new constitution that provided for a plebiscite in 1988 on whether he should continue in office. He received 43 percent of the vote. He declined to be a candidate in a presidential election the following year, which was won by Patricio Aylwin, a Christian Democrat, who took office in 1990.

Chile's current president, Michelle Bachelet, was tortured alongside her mother by Pinochet's government in 1975; her father had been arrested and tortured, and he died of a heart attack in prison shortly after the coup. Bachelet's government announced Sunday that Pinochet would not receive a state funeral usually due former presidents. Pinochet's son Marco Antonio Pinochet said his body would be cremated because his father feared a tomb would be desecrated by his enemies.

Augusto Pinochet Ugarte was born into an upper-middle-class family in Valparaiso, Chile, on Nov. 25, 1915. After graduating from the Chilean military academy in 1936 and receiving a commission in the infantry, he studied law and social sciences at the University of Chile in Santiago.

He had several appointments as an instructor in military schools. He was the author of standard texts on Chile's geography and its history. In the 1950s, he was assigned as a military attache in Washington and Quito, Ecuador. He was promoted to brigadier general in 1968.

As Chile's 1970 presidential election approached, U.S. officials became increasingly concerned about the prospects of Allende, a Socialist, winning. President Richard M. Nixon directed the CIA to take steps to ensure that this did not happen. But when the ballots were counted, Allende had eked out a bare plurality of 36.3 percent of the vote against two other candidates.

In Nixon's memoirs, he said he quoted an informant who told him that Latin America could become "a red sandwich" with Cuba on one side and Chile on the other. He directed the CIA to "make the Chilean economy scream."

A key part of Allende's program was the nationalization of industry, including U.S.-owned copper companies, and the redistribution of land. By 1973, inflation was soaring and the economy was further crippled by CIA-supported strikes in the trucking industry. The government also was unable to control unofficial land expropriations by leftist groups operating on their own.

DOJ_NMG_0104555

In an effort to shore up his government, Allende sought support from the army, which had a long tradition of standing aside from politics in Latin America's longest continuous democracy. Among other things, he put Pinochet in command of the army.

Nineteen days later the coup began. Allende died in the Moneda Palace, the presidential residence and office. There were conflicting reports about whether he committed suicide or was killed by government troops.

Pinochet reportedly had a minor role in planning the coup, but he was a member of a four-man junta that took control immediately afterward. He became president and sole ruler of the country in 1974.

Pinochet ended the nationalizations and returned many businesses and much land to private ownership. Although not an economist, he embraced the free trade policies of Milton Friedman of the University of Chicago. He gave free rein to a group of young Chilean economists who had been trained by Friedman and who were known as "the Chicago boys."

Pinochet's survivors include his wife, Lucia Hiriart Pinochet, and five children.

Ex-Chilean Strongman Pinochet Dies At 91 (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella, Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

Augusto Pinochet, the embodiment of the brutal and intensely anti-communist South American military dictator, died Sunday, a military doctor said. He was 91 and had suffered a heart attack a week earlier.

Pinochet ruled this Andean nation for 17 years after seizing power in 1973 in a coup that toppled leftist President Salvador Allende. He gave up control in 1990, retiring to a presumed impunity, but he spent the last years of his life fighting charges of human rights abuses and corruption.

Pinochet's coup, which led to the deaths or disappearances of about 3,200 people and the torture of thousands more, is widely regarded as a watershed event in recent Latin American history. The military takeover, experts generally agree, was a dramatic example of how unwilling South American elites were to allow left-wing governments to come to power, even by election.

In an era when Latin America was a raging Cold War battleground and Fidel Castro's Cuba was seen as fomenting revolution, those elites gathered support from allies in Washington.

Thousands of once-classified U.S. documents released in recent years showed that the Nixon administration, through the CIA and other means, worked secretly to undermine Allende's elected government. Pinochet denied any foreign involvement in the coup, declaring: "I never had contact with any American. I swear by the memory of my parents."

But in 2003, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell acknowledged a U.S. role in destabilizing Allende's government. "It is not a part of our country's history that we are proud of," he said.

Other military governments in the region, such as the junta that ruled Argentina, were bloodier than the Chilean dictator's regime. But Pinochet's dominating public persona and his seeming contempt for Chile's venerable democratic traditions marked him as a central figure among Latin America's late-20th century despots.

Pinochet's regime pioneered the use of "disappearance" as a tool of repression, refusing to acknowledge the detention of executed prisoners.

The dictator's much-feared secret police also organized assassinations against dissidents abroad, including a car bombing in Washington on Sept. 21, 1976, that killed Orlando Letelier, Chile's former foreign minister, and an American colleague, Ronni Moffitt.

In recent years, the human rights and corruption charges, as well as his detention for nearly 17 months in Britain, had chipped away at the retired general's aura of steely invincibility.

Although still admired by those who credited him with jump-starting Chile's economic growth, the aging and frail strongman had become somewhat of an embarrassment for a nation that has long taken pride in being more economically advanced and committed to social justice than many of its neighbors.

Reports that Pinochet had stashed away as much as $28 million in secret offshore accounts during his rule alienated even his stalwart supporters. At the time of his final illness, Pinochet was facing fraud and tax evasion charges in connection with the money, which first came to light at U.S. congressional hearings in 2004.

No event marked the exorcising of Chile's authoritarian ghosts more than the election in January of President Michelle Bachelet, a lifelong socialist and former political prisoner exiled during the Pinochet regime.

Among the human rights cases that were pending here against Pinochet was one involving dozens of alleged abuses at Villa Grimaldi, a former torture center outside the capital where the young Bachelet and her mother were held before being allowed to leave Chile.

DOJ_NMG_0104556

Bachelet's father, Alberto Bachelet, an air force general deemed a traitor by the military because he aided the Allende government, was arrested and tortured by Pinochet's forces after the coup. He died of a heart attack while in custody, and his daughter blames his death on the abuse he endured.

As president, Bachelet has cultivated warm relations with the military and has been applauded for her attempts at national reconciliation.

On Nov. 25, Pinochet celebrated his 91st birthday with a statement accepting "political responsibility" for acts committed during his rule. But the long-unrepentant general did not explicitly accept legal responsibility, and declared that his aim had been to avert the "disintegration" of Chile, the latest version of an oft-repeated justification for his actions.

"Today, close to the end of my days, I want to make it clear that I hold no rancor toward anybody, that I love my fatherland above all else," Pinochet said in the statement.

Pinochet's death immediately sent thousands of supporters and critics into the streets of Santiago, the capital, some uncorking bottles of champagne in celebration of the general's demise.

But the country remained deeply divided about his legacy. Mourners outside the Santiago Military Hospital, where Pinochet died, shed tears as news of the general's death spread. Authorities planned a funeral Tuesday with full military honors, in accordance with Pinochet's position as a former commander in chief, but without the official protocol accorded a former head of state.

The White House on Sunday issued a statement saying that "Augusto Pinochet's dictatorship in Chile represented one of most difficult periods in that nation's history. Our thoughts today are with the victims of his reign and their families. We commend the people of Chile for building a society based on freedom, the rule of law, and respect for human rights."

Augusto Pinochet Ugarte was born in the port city of Valparaiso on Nov. 25, 1915. His father was a customs agent whose family had come from Brittany, in northwestern France. Augusto was the oldest of six children and the favorite of a strict and demanding mother.

The young Pinochet applied three times to the national military academy before he was accepted. He graduated in 1936 near the bottom of his class. After a year at infantry school, he became a second lieutenant and began an ascent through the ranks. As deputy director of Chile's war academy between 1949 and 1951, he published two books on military and historical topics.

Like most Latin American armies during the 1960s, the Chilean military worried about Marxist subversion as Castro's Cuban revolution electrified the region. For some, those fears intensified after 1970, when Chileans elected Allende, a socialist whose victory was seen by supporters as a regional model of the democratic road to socialism.

By 1973, workers were taking over factories and farms. Pro-government leftists and opposition rightists clashed in the streets. Rampant inflation caused chaos and shortages, with people waiting in long lines to buy sugar and toilet paper.

Despite a number of military conspiracies against the left-wing government, Allende promoted Pinochet to commander in chief in August 1973. Less than three weeks later, on Sept. 11, 1973, the newly minted top general staged his coup.

On the day of the takeover, Pinochet ordered fighter planes to attack La Moneda, the presidential palace where Allende had barricaded himself. Pinochet joked with an admiral about providing Allende safe passage on an aircraft, according to transcripts of taped military radio transmissions that surfaced in a 1998 book.

"The offer to remove him from the country stands, but the plane falls, old man, while it's flying," Pinochet said over the radio, eliciting a chuckle from the admiral, according to the transcript.

To this day, the grainy images of the aerial attack on La Moneda run regularly on Latin American news retrospectives. Allende died in the palace, probably a suicide.

Pinochet's troops declared a state of siege and seized thousands of Allende government officials and members of the socialist, communist and other leftist parties. Some were summarily executed or tortured to death. Others died in shootouts, though there was little resistance to the overwhelming force of the military.

The atrocities of the military regime, including kidnappings, executions, torture and rape in secret concentration camps, were carried out in part at the behest of the Directorate of National Intelligence, or DINA. Gen. Manuel Contreras, the DINA director, was the architect of an alliance among South American intelligence services, the so-called Operation Condor, that waged a "dirty war" on political enemies across the globe.

Contreras and Michael Townley, a U.S. citizen working for the Chilean secret police, were later convicted in Chile and the United States, respectively, for their roles in the car bombing in Washington that killed Letelier and Moffitt, still considered one of the most audacious foreign-organized assassinations on U.S. soil. Townley implicated Pinochet in the killing.

Chile's intelligence agents struck in other nations as well. In 1974, former Gen. Carlos Prats, Pinochet's predecessor as head of the army, was blown up along with his wife in the garage of the couple's Buenos Aires apartment building. Authorities in Argentina unsuccessfully sought Pinochet's extradition in the killings.

Other crimes against Pinochet's political opponents abroad, along with the influence of a diaspora of hundreds of thousands of Chileans, made the dictator something of a pariah.

But former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger remained a staunch supporter of Pinochet, despite public comments that attempted to distance the U.S. government from the dictator. Kissinger met with Pinochet in Santiago on June 8, 1976, and privately reassured the strongman of continued White House support despite increasing hostility in Congress.

"In the United States, as you know, we are sympathetic with what you are trying to do here," Kissinger told Pinochet, according to a declassified State Department memorandum obtained in 1999 by Lucy Komisar, a New York journalist. "I think that the previous government was headed toward communism. We wish your government well."

Kissinger added: "My evaluation is that you are a victim of all left-wing groups around the world, and that your greatest sin was that you overthrew a government which was going Communist."

Pinochet's relations with Washington soured under the Carter administration, with its emphasis on human rights, and the decline continued through the presidencies of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush. The Chilean leader blamed Marxist propaganda and criticized the United States for pressuring him to restore democracy.

A U.S. Senate investigative committee headed by the late Sen. Frank Church (D-Idaho) revealed that the CIA had secretly bankrolled the Chilean opposition for years. Former CIA chief Richard Helms pleaded no contest to lying to Congress about the Chile operation.

An avid reader of books about Roman emperors and Napoleon, the stiff-backed, shrill-voiced Pinochet cultivated an imperial mystique. He promoted himself to the exalted and antiquated rank of captain general.

He sported ornate uniforms — sometimes a white tunic trimmed in red and gold, other times a flowing cape draped over his shoulders as he reviewed goose-stepping troops.

His men revered him as a gruff patriarch who embodied the pride and Prussian-instilled tradition of the Chilean army, one of Latin America's most powerful militaries.

"Not a leaf moves in this country if I am not moving it," Pinochet boasted shortly after the coup.

In the later years of his rule, Pinochet claimed credit for an economy that had begun growing steadily after early struggles and miscues. Pinochet knew little about economics, but he gave carte blanche to technocrats who were known as the "Chicago boys" because they had studied economics at the University of Chicago.

The Chicago boys launched an ambitious and experimental set of free-market reforms. They reduced the size of government, privatized state industries and promoted free enterprise. Exports boomed. Chile became the economic showcase of Latin America.

Nations across the region began adopting similar reforms in the late 1980s, and innovations such as a privatized social security system have been copied elsewhere. Pinochet boasted that low-income home construction had set records and that the infant mortality rate had plummeted.

But debate persists over whether the credit for brisk economic growth and poverty reduction should go to the military regime or to the four civilian governments that followed it. Critics say Pinochet's wrenching policy shifts inflicted lingering damage on public health, education and other social services.

Despite the growing economy, a pro-democracy movement steadily gained strength in Chile during the 1980s. In 1988, Pinochet agreed to hold a referendum on his continued rule. Chileans said no to the dictatorship by a margin of 57% to 43% in a historic vote that helped pave the way for a return to democracy.

An opposition coalition led by Christian Democrats and that included socialists won a subsequent national election.

Pinochet handed the presidency to Patricio Aylwin on March 11, 1990. The center-left coalition agreed to let Pinochet retain command of the army and to respect the pro-military constitution and rules he had imposed, including a broad amnesty for military officers.

"The day they touch one of my men, the rule of law ends," Pinochet warned before ceding power.

Pinochet belittled the findings of an investigative panel known as the Rettig Commission, which in 1991 documented his regime's abuses. He dismissed the estimated 2,000 "disappeared" political prisoners in his characteristically hard-nosed and unpolished style: "They were nothing but bandits."

But his civilian successor said the general exercised a stabilizing influence. "If Pinochet had not been there during the transition," Aylwin said, "we would have had in Chile attempts at insurrection carried out by subordinates."

Pinochet retired as army chief in March 1998. He immediately became senator for life, a post he created for himself that shielded him from prosecution.

He aspired to a moderate image, making overtures to centrist Senate colleagues and hinting that he might not back a rightist presidential candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0104558

Then came a fateful trip to Britain, a nation he had visited often and admired. Pinochet and the Chilean government knew about an investigation by Spanish Judge Baltasar Garzon, a magistrate on a quixotic crusade to bring South American oppressors to justice. But the former dictator, who had decided to undergo back surgery in London, apparently thought his diplomatic passport would protect him.

On Oct. 16, 1998, British police officers walked into Pinochet's hospital room as he recovered from the operation and placed him under arrest. At that moment, Pinochet lost his battle to rehabilitate himself in the history books.

Just more than a month later, Britain's highest court ruled that the aging former dictator could be prosecuted on charges of murder, torture and hostage-taking, saying his official immunity offered no protection for crimes against humanity.

Pinochet remained under house arrest for nearly 17 months, fighting efforts to send him to Spain for trial on genocide charges under international law.

In March 2000, British officials ruled that a series of strokes had left Pinochet unable to stand trial. Physically and psychologically debilitated, he returned home, branded as a criminal abroad and rendered increasingly irrelevant in Chile, where even many rightist leaders distanced themselves.

Pinochet spent his final years living discreetly, but opulently, in the several homes owned by his family. He and his wife, Lucia Hiriart, had five children, who remained steadfastly loyal to their father as he fought a series of human rights prosecutions inspired by the detention in Britain. Even as his reputation plummeted, his children denounced the mounting charges as politically motivated persecution.

But the financial scandals that dogged Pinochet in his final years also swept up members of his family, who were accused of at least implicit knowledge of the long-secret overseas accounts. His wife and five children have faced charges of tax evasion or using false passports in connection with the offshore money. A daughter-in-law and the general's former secretary also have been charged. All denied wrongdoing and were freed after posting bonds as the cases worked their way through Chile's courts.

Pinochet's eldest daughter, Lucia Pinochet Hiriart, fled to the United States in January 2006 and sought political asylum after being charged in the tax evasion case. After U.S. officials looked askance at her application, she quickly withdrew it and returned to Chile.

Pinochet lived to see the public rehabilitation of Allende, a martyr of the Latin American left whose bronze likeness stands outside the presidential palace, emblazoned with some of his last words: "I have faith in Chile and its destiny."

Pinochet was deeply superstitious, former aides said. At times, he also seemed prophetic, all but predicting his misfortune in an interview with the New Yorker magazine shortly before his 1998 arrest.

"I've always been a very studious man, not an outstanding student, but I read a lot, especially history," Pinochet said. "And history teaches you that dictators never end up well."

Former Chilean Dictator Augusto Pinochet Dies (CHIT)

By Colin McMahon

Chicago Tribune, December 11, 2006

Former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, whose military regime killed thousands of political opponents in one of Latin America's bloodiest "dirty wars," died Sunday, weakened by ill health, pursued by government prosecutors and abandoned by all but his most loyal defenders. He was 91.

Shorn of his swagger and absent the menacing look he would flash from behind dark glasses, Pinochet at his death was a mere ghost of the emblematic military strongman who played a critical role in the Americas of the 1970s and 1980s.

Instead, Pinochet had adopted the grandfatherly image of a retired statesman. He had lobbied for a place in history that would reward him for opening Chile's economy. And he had defended his regime as just having done what was necessary to impose stability by seizing power in 1973.

Pinochet had saved Chile from communism, his supporters insisted: His only crime was being a patriot.

But the blood of the Pinochet era, most it shed by the regime itself, followed Pinochet around well after he left power in 1990.

It followed him to Europe, where human-rights lawyers lobbied for Pinochet's arrest on charges that he had ordered the torture, disappearance and death of political dissidents.

Then the blood followed Pinochet home. And by the time he suffered a serious heart attack that sent him to a Santiago hospital a week ago, Pinochet was under house arrest awaiting trial on charges ranging from abuse of power to stealing from the Chilean state.

"Pinochet was a very polarizing figure, and for some time after the end of the regime Chileans were still split about him," said Rebecca Evans, an associate professor of politics and international relations at Ursinus College in Pennsylvania. "But in the last several years, his image has steadily deteriorated."

Pinochet lost most of his remaining international support in the late 1990s, when evidence produced in European courts linked him to the deaths or disappearances of political opponents during the 1970s and 1980s.

A government commission estimated that more than 3,000 people died or disappeared at the hands of the Pinochet regime. Thousands more were politically persecuted, some detained and tortured, others exiled, and still more harassed by secret police.

Yet a sizable minority of Chileans would not condemn Pinochet. Sometimes his supporters denied crimes had occurred. Sometimes they said the oppression was needed to protect Chile from a leftist takeover funded and engineered by Cuba's Fidel Castro and the Soviet Union.

And sometimes, preposterously to Chileans who remembered Pinochet's remark that "not a leaf moves in this country unless I move it," his supporters argued that the supreme commander himself did not know about the abuses.

"The younger generation does not understand the full picture. We were on the verge of collapse," said Guillermo Garin, a retired general who remained loyal to Pinochet. "If human rights were violated, they were violated as part of the struggle to protect the human rights of the majority of the Chilean public."

To Garin and other Pinochet allies, the coup that brought down the democratically elected presidency of Salvador Allende was Chile's salvation. Pinochet not only kept civil war from breaking out, but he also helped stop communism from taking root in South America.

Later, Garin said, the economic policies that Pinochet imposed, the privatizing of state businesses and the opening of domestic and international markets, set the stage for Chile's long stretch of solid economic growth.

History, Garin said in a recent interview, would judge Pinochet kindly.

But the shadow of the rights abuses grew darker and longer over Pinochet as he approached death.

Secret accounts in foreign banks, some holding millions of dollars, turned up tied to Pinochet. Pinochet family members were accused of enriching themselves at public expense.

Supporters who had absolved Pinochet's "excesses" in fighting communism could not brook theft. His reputation as a hard case politically but a man of personal integrity crumbled. Even support within the army faded away.

"Some crazies still love him," Santiago political analyst David Altman said recently. "But more people are seeing the dictatorship for what it was."

The dictatorship was, at first, a four-man affair, with Pinochet representing the army on the military junta.

How involved Pinochet was in planning the coup, just as how involved the United States and the CIA were in supporting the coup, remains unclear. But once the socialist Allende was ousted, Pinochet quickly moved to consolidate control.

Yet Pinochet's rise to the top was 40 years in coming.

Augusto José Ramón Pinochet Ugarte was born on Nov. 25, 1915, in Valparaiso, to a middle-class merchant family. He went to Catholic school as a youngster, entered the military academy in 1933, against his mother's wishes, and then embarked on an army career that would see him rise steadily through the ranks.

Along the way, Pinochet married and had five children--three daughters and two sons.

He became commander in chief of the Chilean army in August 1973. Allende himself appointed Pinochet to the post, believing the fellow Masonic lodge brother to be loyal.

But with strikes paralyzing Santiago and Congress accusing Allende of violating the constitution, Pinochet and his fellow chiefs of staff moved against the president.

Allende was found dead before troops could seize him. Most experts believe he committed suicide.

Though many Chileans reacted with joy to the coup, the political violence that followed tore families apart.

Among the victims was the family of the current Chilean president, Michelle Bachelet. Her father was an Air Force officer who was arrested, tortured and killed shortly after the coup.

Bachelet herself, who was 22 at the time, and her mother were detained. They were held for a short time in a notorious detention center where women and girls were beaten, abused and raped. They then fled into exile.

Late last month, during his 91st birthday celebration, Pinochet issued a statement that for the first time indicated any acceptance of responsibility for the crimes committed under his regime.

"Today, near the end of my days, I want to say that I harbor no rancor against anybody, that I love my fatherland above all and that I take political responsibility for everything that was done which had no other goal than making Chile greater and avoiding its disintegration," Pinochet said in a statement read by his wife.

Meanwhile, a member of Allende's own re-constituted Socialist Party is president of Chile. Pinochet's ideological enemy, Castro, is passing authority over Cuba to his brother, Raul Castro. The socialist Hugo Chavez has been re-elected president of Venezuela. And left-leaning presidents run more than a half-dozen other nations in Latin America.

As for the Pinochet name, it is shorthand across the region for right-wing, military repression.

Former Chilean Dictator Pinochet Dies At 91 (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall, Jack Chang, Helen Hughes

McClatchy, December 11, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile - Hounded by human rights groups until the end and defended with equal zeal by the armed forces, Chile's controversial former dictator Augusto Pinochet Ugarte died Sunday from complications after suffering a heart attack last week. He was 91.

History likely will remember Pinochet as a figure with twin legacies: His bloody right-wing rule and defense against Soviet and Cuban communism changed the fate of not only Chile but also its neighbors in the southern cone of South America.

Decades later, attempts to prosecute Pinochet at home and abroad in the final years of his life set a precedent likely to be felt across the globe: that there is no statute of limitations on human rights abuses.

Thousands filled the streets of Santiago on Sunday after the announcement of his death, both weeping supporters and some critics, most peacefully marking his passing, though a few scuffles were reported.

Pinochet seized power on Sept. 11, 1973, in a bloody U.S.-backed coup that was aided in the planning stages by the CIA, according to U.S. documents released in 2000. Amid intense social strife, the military coup toppled elected socialist President Salvador Allende, and Pinochet emerged as the leader of the junta, recognized almost immediately by the Nixon administration. He ruled until 1990.

The Cold War is the context in which Pinochet will be remembered: He wore a scowl, dark sunglasses and in his ruthless fight against communism in South America once boasted, "Not a leaf moves in Chile without my knowing about it."

He executed socialist and communist leaders and interrogated and often tortured tens of thousands of Chileans and foreign nationals suspected of subversion. He also forged close ties with dictatorships in neighboring Paraguay, Uruguay, Brazil and Argentina to create Operation Condor, in which the countries' intelligence agencies traded information on leftists and detained each other's nationals for return, torture and often death.

Pinochet set the model for a take-no-prisoners approach to communism with widespread human rights abuses, but in his final days he suffered the consequences of his excesses, hit with prosecution attempts that brought relief to victims' families and angered supporters - who lovingly called him "my general."

"He did a great evil in this country," said attorney Hugo Gutierrez, who represented the relatives of dictatorship-era victims in cases against Pinochet. "The only legacy he will leave is that social conflicts must be solved in peaceful ways and not with the insanity that Pinochet brought to Chile."

Yet dozens of Pinochet's supporters appeared outside the Hospital Militar in the capital of Santiago after his heart attack last week to bid him an emotional farewell.

"He had the strength and courage to save us from a civil war and from becoming a second Cuba," said Santiago resident Silvia Perez De Arce outside the hospital. "What Chile is today is due to Pinochet."

One Pinochet legacy has a brighter side - he brought economic prosperity to Chile. Under him, Chile did away with most labor unions and revamped its economy with market-friendly advice from University of Chicago economists dubbed "The Chicago Boys."

He launched ambitious economic incentives that transformed the country into the region's most stable economy and brought him support from a large segment of Chilean society. Chile became an exporter of grapes, wine, salmon - three Chilean products always in U.S. supermarkets. Chile has in recent years signed free trade agreements with the United States, China and other countries.

"In a way he epitomizes Latin American dictators, except he was a very successful dictator, and I think that's what stands out," said Chilean historian Alfredo Jocelyn-Holt. "People who think highly of Pinochet insist he brought about (economic) revolution before Thatcher and Reagan. For the right wing, Pinochet is thought of as very significant."

But like much in Pinochet's 17-year rule, the transformation came with an asterisk attached. Many of Chile's gains came through undemocratic means. For example, Chile's maturation into an important timber and forestry exporter came at the expense of indigenous Mapuches, who under Pinochet saw land restoration programs reversed and who lost collective lands that were their ancestral tradition.

Pinochet died at the hospital, his family at his side.

He was at the time of his death the subject of six prosecutions, four for human rights violations and two for financial corruption.

Two weeks ago, at his 91st birthday party on Nov. 25, 2006, Pinochet's wife read a statement from the general in which he for the first time took "full political responsibility for what happened" during his government. The statement said he had acted with "no other goal than making Chile greater and avoiding its disintegration."

DOJ_NMG_0104561

Official estimates show Pinochet's government executed 3,197 people for political reasons, more than 1,000 of them people who disappeared.

Ironically, Pinochet died on Human Rights Day, the annual anniversary of the United Nations General Assembly's 1948 adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The former ruler was under house arrest at the time of his death after being indicted for the kidnappings and executions of two Allende security guards shortly after the 1973 coup.

In October, he was indicted for abuses at the Villa Grimaldi detention center in Santiago, where hundreds were held and tortured. The country's current socialist President Michelle Bachelet and her mother were among those sent to Villa Grimaldi.

Many of Pinochet's supporters, who remained loyal for years, abandoned the ex-dictator in 2004 after news broke that he had amassed some $28 million in foreign bank accounts. Pinochet's former spy chief Gen. Manuel Contreras said the money came from arms and drug trafficking, which Pinochet's family denied.

Pinochet managed to escape numerous prosecutions for health reasons, although human rights groups accused him of faking his illnesses. He suffered several strokes and was diagnosed with diabetes and, according to his doctors, mild dementia.

The Bachelet government decided to give him a funeral as a former head of the military and not as former head of state. According to the Chilean military, he will receive a funeral Mass 11 a.m. Tuesday at the country's military academy in Santiago, and his body will be cremated. There will also be memorial services Monday.

Born on Nov. 25, 1915, in Valparaiso, Pinochet seem destined for anything but fame when it took him three tries to win acceptance at Chile's prestigious national military academy Escuela Militar. He graduated four years later as a second lieutenant in the infantry, rising through the ranks to become a professor at his alma matter in 1951, teaching geopolitics. Pinochet's interest in geopolitical strategy would be shown later as he and archrival Cuban dictator Fidel Castro jockeyed for influence in the Americas.

Pinochet served in important posts throughout Chile and abroad in Ecuador, and was tapped by Allende as armed forces commander on Aug. 23, 1973, after months of coup rumors. He replaced Gen. Carlos Prats, who had resigned. Officials in neighboring Argentina have accused Pinochet of plotting the September 1974 car bombing in Buenos Aires that killed Prats and his wife Sofia Cuthbert.

Pinochet burst onto the international stage with the dramatic 1973 coup, which included the haunting Air Force bombing of the La Moneda presidential palace and the apparent suicide of Allende with an AK-47 assault rifle that was reportedly a present from Castro.

Pinochet's government was also believed responsible for the 1976 assassination of former Chilean Foreign Minister Orlando Letelier in Washington, D.C.

Pinochet's 1980 constitution formally installed him as president of the country. He survived a September 1986 assassination attempt by Marxists before losing a national referendum on his rule in October 1988. He agreed to return Chile to civilian rule with elections in 1989 and finally transferred power to Patricio Aylwin Azocar in March 1990.

However, the strongman continued to cast a long shadow over Chilean politics as commander of the armed forces, a post he held until 1998 when he stepped down and became a senator-for-life. He menaced elected leaders from the sidelines until his Oct. 16, 1998, arrest in London in response to a Spanish extradition request.

British Home Secretary Jack Straw set Pinochet free on March 2, 2000, and he returned to Chile to face criminal complaints that numbered more than 300 at the time of his death. After losing his immunity from prosecution as a senator-for-life on July 25, 2000, Pinochet faced prosecution efforts for the Caravan of Death - the name given to death squads that roamed Chile carrying out summary trials and executions in the first weeks of his rule.

In 2002, the country's Supreme Court declared Pinochet too infirm to face Caravan of Death prosecutions but reversed itself this July, clearing the way for Pinochet's indictment for the killings of Allende's security guards.

At the end of his life, the ex-dictator saw his sway over Chile diminish as the country entered its 17th year under the center-left Concertacion coalition. Yet Sunday's outpouring of support for him on the streets of Santiago and the worldwide impact of his death showed that his legacy remained enduring and complicated.

"He is a mythical figure and as such he will never die," Jocelyn-Holt said. "Neither demons nor gods die, they simply pass away until someone erects them."

Controversial Legacy Of Former Chilean Dictator Augusto Pinochet (CSM)

By Jen Ross

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

Gen. Augusto Pinochet, who overthrew Chile's democratically elected Communist government in a 1973 coup and ruled for 17 years, died Sunday without ever having been condemned for the human rights abuses committed during his rule.

The date - December 10, the UN's International Human Rights Day - could not have been more symbolic for the passing of a man who best symbolized the international struggle to end impunity for human rights abusers in Latin America.

"It's no consolation to anyone that Pinochet has been subjected to a long legal battle, given that it has never resulted in a condemnation. That's what his victims will lament most about his death," says Sergio Laurenti, executive director of the Chilean wing of Amnesty International.

In 1970, Chile became the first country in Latin America to elect a socialist leader. President Salvador Allende quickly moved to nationalize foreign-owned industries and rectify Chile's gross economic disparities. But by 1972, internal dissent, failing production, and covert international attempts to undermine Mr. Allende's government combined to create an atmosphere of high political tension that many Chileans feared would crescendo into class warfare or civil war.

On Sept. 11th, 1973, two weeks after being appointed commander-in-chief of Chile's Army, Pinochet led a military junta of four officers who sent war planes to bomb the presidential palace, La Moneda. Once Pinochet's treason and the forces against him became clear, Allende committed suicide.

Pinochet imposed a curfew and ordered mass arrests in an effort to root out opposition. Declaring himself president in 1974, he eliminated Congress, political parties, freedom of speech, habeas corpus, and trade unions. At least 27,000 people were tortured while in detention, and an estimated 3,200 Chileans were killed or disappeared during his 17-year-rule.

Political scientists say that, although many dictators elsewhere in Latin America were responsible for more deaths, Pinochet is the most notorious because of what he embodies.

"He overthrew Latin America's first democratically elected Marxist leader, who himself was a symbol," says Robert Funk, a political science professor at Santiago's Diego Portales University.

In 1998, Pinochet narrowly lost a referendum on his rule, giving way to a democratic government in 1990, led by center-left president Patricio Aylwin. Passions he stirs

Although it has been 33 years since the military coup staged by Augusto Pinochet, and more than 16 years since the end of his rule, he still stirs passions on both sides.

Car horns honked here in celebration on Sunday, while tens of thousands of his opponents gathered in plazas across the country to cheer and celebrate his passing.

Meanwhile, more than 1,000 supporters gathered to mourn the man and express their outrage at the international media. With photos of Pinochet taped to their bodies, and waving flags or hand-painted signs, they came to Chile's Military Hospital to express their gratitude for the deceased strongman.

Pinochet still boasts a decidedly committed following who remember him as a savior.

According to opinion polls, somewhere between 20 and 30 percent of the population was still professing their support for Pinochet and his military regime as recently as one year ago, says Claudio Fuentes, director of the Latin American Faculty of Social Sciences, an independent think tank based in Santiago.

Others say there's an element of nostalgia involved. "But more important, what there is in Chile, as there is in the rest of Latin America, is a fetish for authority," says Mr. Funk. "That respect that we see for Pinochet now is in many ways the support for someone who had a strong hand and made things run in a more orderly fashion." Credited with stimulating economic growth

Though condemned for its brutality, his regime is credited with stimulating economic growth.

"Pinochet, of course, became known for the economic reforms that he championed, which became perhaps the first case of neoliberal reform, not only in Latin America but in the world, and which were then copied by governments such as [US President Ronald Reagan and [British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher]," says Funk.

During his 17 years in power, Pinochet controlled inflation, united the country with highways, and helped Chile's economy grow steadily. He is credited for heralding an economic miracle for this developing nation, whose economy is now considered the most stable in the region.

"He led a series of social, economic, and political reforms that changed the face of our country," says supporter and history teacher Mauricio Schiapacasse. "When he took power, 40 percent of the population had sewers; when he left, 90 percent did. He created a private health-care system that focused on the poorest sectors. He took 150,000 families out of shantytowns and gave them property. And he achieved an economic growth rate of 10 percent. So many people are thankful for that and will never forget him."

Mr. Schiapacasse says Pinochet's legacy has been distorted outside of Chile by a deliberate campaign of disinformation financed by international leftists, including the more than 500,000 Chileans exiled during the dictatorship.

"We have to recognize that these human rights problems existed, but at some point they've come to eclipse the image of what he did for our country," says retired Gen. Luis Cortes Villa, Director of the nonprofit Pinochet Foundation, which is dedicated to giving out scholarships and preserving the positive side of his legacy. Symbol for human rights violations

But for most of the world, Pinochet's legacy is synonymous with human rights abuses. Pinochet had long been seen as an untouchable in Chile, but in 1998, Spanish judge Baltasar Garzón mounted an offensive, using international instruments barring crimes against humanity to argue for Pinochet's extradition from London.

The former dictator spent more than a year under house arrest until he was deemed too ill and returned to Chile for judgment. But as the world looked on, in 2002, Chilean courts finally declared Pinochet mentally unfit to stand trial.

Since then, Pinochet has been formally charged six times for various crimes, but was twice exonerated for dementia.

In late November, Pinochet was placed under house arrest on kidnapping charges stemming from the Caravan of Death case, in which Pinochet is accused of having sent soldiers to round up and kill opponents shortly after his military coup in 1973. The families of his victims had also filed more than three hundred civil suits against him.

While he has never been found guilty by the courts, some of his detractors have taken comfort in the fact that his popularity has suffered enormously in recent years as a result of these trials.

And Pinochet himself recently issued a sort of mea culpa. To mark his 91st birthday on Nov. 25, Pinochet issued a statement in which he took "political responsibility" for everything that took place under his rule, although he said he had believed it was in Chile's best interests. He also alluded to his failing health, saying: "Today, close to the end of my days, I want to make clear that I hold no rancor toward anyone."

The government has not yet said how it will remember Pinochet, and whether it will hold a funeral with full honors, as is the custom for former heads of state and military commanders.

For many Chileans, his death marks the end of an era and what they believe will herald a period of reconciliation for Chile's polarized political classes.

Chilean Dictator Pinochet Has Died (AP)

AP, December 10, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile -- Gen. Augusto Pinochet, who overthrew Chile's democratically elected Marxist president in a bloody coup and ruled this Andean nation for 17 years, died Sunday of complications following a heart attack. He was 91.

The brief announcement by the Santiago Military hospital said Gen. Pinochet's condition had worsened suddenly and doctors had rushed him back to the intensive care unit, from which he had been removed on Thursday while recovering from an acute heart attack he suffered one week ago. Dr. Juan Ignacio Vergara, spokesman for the medical team that had been treating Gen. Pinochet, said his family was with him when he died.

Gen. Pinochet's health had been deteriorating for years. Doctors implanted a heart pacemaker in 1993 and he suffered from diabetes and arthritis. He also was diagnosed with mild dementia caused by several strokes.

Hundreds of supporters of the former dictator, some weeping, gathered in front of the hospital chanting "Pinochet! Pinochet! Long Live Pinochet!" Anti-Pinochet motorists shouted insults at them and celebrations broke out in several parts of the Chilean capital.

Hugo Gutierrez, a human rights lawyer involved in several lawsuits against Mr. Pinochet, lamented that "this criminal has departed without ever being sentenced for all the acts he was responsible for during his dictatorship." Lorena Pizarro, president of an association of relatives of the dictatorship's victims, noted ironically that Mr. Pinochet had died "on Dec. 10, the international day of human rights."

But the office of former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who had been a close ally of Gen. Pinochet, said she was "greatly saddened" by his death.

President Michelle Bachelet, who was imprisoned and mistreated during the dictatorship, recently said it would be "a violation of my conscience" to attend a state funeral for him.

One of Gen. Pinochet's sons, Marco Antonio, has said that his father asked to be cremated to avoid desecration of his tomb by "people who always hated him." A military funeral was likely.

Gen. Pinochet took power on Sept. 11, 1973, demanding an unconditional surrender from President Salvador Allende the country's freely elected Marxist president, as warplanes bombed the presidential palace in downtown Santiago. Instead, Mr. Allende committed suicide with a submachine gun he had received as a gift from Fidel Castro.

Chile's government says at least 3,197 people were killed for political reasons during his rule, but after leaving the presidency in 1990 Gen. Pinochet escaped hundreds of criminal complaints because of his declining physical and mental health, with courts ruling out proceedings at least twice in recent years as victims of his rule pressed efforts to bring him to justice.

MORE ON PINOCHET

DOJ_NMG_0104564

Key dates in Pinochet's career1, from chief of the army to dictator.

As the mustachioed Gen. Pinochet crushed dissent during his 1973-90 rule, he left little doubt about who was in charge. "Not a leaf moves in this country if I'm not moving it," he once said.

But when it came to his regime's abuses, Gen. Pinochet refused for years to take responsibility, saying any murders of political prisoners were the work of subordinates. Then on his 91st birthday -- just last month -- he took "full political responsibility for everything that happened" during his long rule. The statement read by his wife, however, made no reference to the rights abuses.

Born Nov. 25, 1915, as the son of a customs official in the port of Valparaiso, Gen. Pinochet was commander of the army at the time of the 1973 coup, appointed 19 days earlier by the president he toppled.

The CIA tried for months to destabilize Mr. Allende's government, including financing a truckers strike that paralyzed the delivery of goods across Chile, but Washington denied having anything to do with the coup. In the days after Gen. Pinochet's seizure of power, soldiers carried out mass arrests of leftists. Tanks rumbled through the streets of the capital.

Many detainees, including Americans Charles Horman and Frank Teruggi, were herded into the National Stadium, which became a torture and detention center. The Americans were among those executed by the Chilean military, their deaths chronicled in the 1982 film "Missing." Other leftists were rounded up by a death squad known as the "Caravan of Death." Victims were buried in unmarked mass graves in the northern Atacama desert, in the coastal city of La Serena and in the southern city of Cauquenes.

Gen. Pinochet pledged to stay in power "only as long as circumstances demand it," but soon after seizing the presidency, he said he had "goals, not deadlines." He disbanded Congress, banned political activity and started a harsh anti-leftist repression. Within years, Chile and other South American countries with right-wing governments launched Operation Condor to eliminate leftist dissidents abroad.

In May 2005, some of the strongest evidence against Gen. Pinochet emerged, when Gen. Manuel Contreras, the imprisoned head of the former dictatorship's secret police, gave Chile's Supreme Court a list describing the fate of more than 500 dissidents who disappeared after being arrested by the secret police. Most were killed, their bodies flung into the sea.

Gen. Contreras, who is serving a 12-year sentence for the disappearance of a young dissident in 1975, said Gen. Pinochet was responsible. Gen. Pinochet blamed all the abuses on subordinates.

"Justice has been too generous with Pinochet," said Viviana Diaz, whose father was among the disappeared. She said the fact that the dictator was never punished "is the impotence that we have, and the reason for the fight we have waged all these years to eliminate impunity in our country."

Gen. Pinochet defended his authoritarian rule as a bulwark against communism -- and even claimed part of the credit for the collapse of communism. He repeatedly said he had nothing to ask forgiveness for. "I see myself as a good angel," he told a Miami Spanish-language television station in 2004.

With his raspy voice, he often spoke in a lower-class vernacular that comedians delighted in mimicking. But his off-the-cuff comments sometimes got him into trouble. Once, he embarrassed the government by saying that the German army was made up of "marijuana smokers, homosexuals, long-haired unionists." On another occasion, he drew criticism by saying the discovery of coffins that each contained the bodies of two victims of his regime's repression was a show of "a good cemetery space-saving measure."

Shrewd and firmly in command of his army, Gen. Pinochet saw himself as the leader of a crusade to build a society free of communism. Amid the upheaval in 1973, the economy was in near ruins, partly due to the CIA's covert destabilization efforts.

Gen. Pinochet launched a radical free-market economic program that, coupled with heavy foreign borrowing and an overvalued peso, triggered a financial collapse and unprecedented joblessness in the early 1980s. Eventually, the economy recovered, and since 1984 Chile has posted growth averaging 5% to 7% a year.

The dictator tried to remain in control of the nation of 15 million people, but Latin America was gravitating toward civilian rule. On Oct. 5, 1988, he lost a national referendum on a proposal to extend his rule until 1997. He was forced to call a presidential election, which was won by center-left coalition candidate Patricio Aylwin. Gen. Pinochet handed over power to Mr. Aylwin in March 1990 but remained army commander for eight more years and then was a senator-for-life, a position guaranteed under the constitution written by his regime.

In 1998, the former dictator traveled to London to undergo back surgery, but was placed under house arrest after a Spanish judge issued a warrant seeking to try him for human rights violations. British authorities decided he was too ill to stand trial and sent him home in March 2000.

Back in Chile, ghosts of the past dogged the retired general. More than 200 criminal complaints were filed against him, one involving the Caravan of Death. But on July 9, 2001, a court ruled that he could not face trial because of his poor physical and mental health after court-appointed doctors diagnosed him with a mild case of dementia. A 2004 case against him was also stopped because he was found unfit to stand trial.

Still, his foes and relatives of his regime's victims kept trying to bring him to trial, successfully having him indicted and held under house arrest several times. But chances of any case reaching trial always appeared dim.

In 2004, a U.S. Senate investigative committee found Gen. Pinochet kept multimillion-dollar secret accounts at the Riggs Bank in Washington. In all, investigators said he had up to $17 million in foreign accounts, and Chilean courts charged him with owing $9.8 million in back taxes. He was also indicted on tax evasion charges, along with his wife and three children.

While many of his military and civilian followers staunchly supported him throughout his legal battle against human rights accusations, he was isolated and almost abandoned as the money dealings became public. Many expressed frustration and disappointment. "We deserve an explanation for this," said retired Gen. Rafael Villarroel, once one of Gen. Pinochet's closest aides.

Since the mid-1990s, Gen. Pinochet led a mostly secluded life between his heavily guarded Santiago mansion and his countryside residence. He rarely appeared in public other than for checkups at the Santiago army hospital.

Associates said he lost interest in politics and rarely paid attention to news. During family gatherings he would remain mostly silent, looking frail and tired. His health declined steadily. In 1992 he received a pacemaker. He suffered from diabetes and arthritis and had at least three mild strokes beginning in 1998.

He is survived by his wife, Lucia, who headed a volunteer women's organization dedicated to helping the poor, and two sons and three daughters.

Thousands Celebrate In Streets Of Santiago On Learning Of Death (WP)

By Jonathan Franklin

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile, Dec. 10 -- Thousands of jubilant Chileans streamed into the streets of Santiago after hearing that their former president, Gen. Augusto Pinochet, had died Sunday. Many danced and popped open champagne, while caravans of cars with horns blaring toured the capital for hours.

"These people are not celebrating the death of anyone. It is to celebrate the end of a cycle of so much pain, so much dictatorship, so much torture," said Jorge Salinas, 50, as he threw confetti into traffic. "Pinochet signified many deaths, so much suffering for us. That's why you see such happiness in most of the people. That's why they are celebrating."

While Chileans celebrated downtown, a rowdy and bitter crowd of about 700 Pinochet supporters gathered outside the military hospital where he died Sunday afternoon.

"He leaves us today, but I remain proud to support him," said Ivan Moreira, a member of the lower house of Chile's Congress who was with the Pinochet family during a private Mass at the hospital Sunday. Moreira, of the Independent Democratic Union party, said, "I express what so many silent Chileans want to express: loyalty to his government."

Emotions at the hospital turned violent as the pro-Pinochet crowd brawled with police and attacked reporters with a hail of bottles and rocks.

In upper-middle-class neighborhoods where Pinochet was once revered, many residents left their homes to celebrate the former dictator's death. Pinochet's reputation had disintegrated in the past several years with ongoing investigations into financial crimes.

In poorer neighborhoods, barricades were set up and tires burned as crowds gathered to sing and celebrate. Police patrolled the streets of Santiago in an effort to control clashes between Pinochet supporters and foes.

In the city center, police shut down the main avenues to accommodate a crowd that had swelled to 7,000 people by late afternoon.

"Today is an anniversary for human rights," said Hugo Guttierrez, a leading Chilean human rights lawyer who noted that Pinochet's death came on International Human Rights Day. "And without a doubt, this is a very sweet treat."

Victims of human rights abuses also gathered downtown at a statue of Salvador Allende, the Chilean president who died in the 1973 coup led by Pinochet. Human rights activists called on the government to avoid giving any special honors to Pinochet at his funeral.

Chilean President Michelle Bachelet, who was detained and tortured in 1975 by Pinochet's security forces, has not said whether she would attend his funeral Mass.

Joy, And Violence, At Death Of Pinochet (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0104566

SANTIAGO, Chile, Dec. 10 — Thousands of demonstrators took to the streets in celebration here on Sunday almost immediately after news circulated of the death of the former dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet. But within hours the revelry was marred by violence, with confrontations breaking out and the police using tear gas and water cannons against a large group marching toward the presidential palace.

Gen. Jorge Acuna, of the capital police force, said that six police officers had been wounded in the scuffles and that seven demonstrators had been arrested in the capital, while dozens of others were detained in police vehicles and more arrests were expected.

The government called for calm on Sunday night. "We call on the detractors and supporters, if they're going to demonstrate to do it peacefully. And for this, we've deployed a major security force," said Felipe Harboe, the under secretary of the interior.

After General Pinochet's death, at 2:15 p.m., President Michelle Bachelet met briefly with cabinet ministers and then released a terse announcement through her spokesman, Ricardo Lagos Weber, covering only funeral and memorial considerations with no other comment. Mr. Lagos said that General Pinochet would not receive a state funeral, but would receive military honors. The president authorized flags to fly at half-mast at military installations, but did not decree a period of national mourning.

A spokesman for the White House, Tony Fratto, said: "Augusto Pinochet's dictatorship in Chile represented one of most difficult periods in that nation's history. Our thoughts today are with the victims of his reign and their families."

On Sunday night, General Pinochet's remains were taken from the Military Hospital of Santiago, where he died, to the Army Academy in Santiago, where religious services were to be held throughout the day Monday. Funeral services will take place at the Army Academy on Tuesday at 11 a.m., and Defense Minister Vivianne Blanlot will attend to represent the government. The general's remains will be cremated and given to his family, Mr. Lagos said.

A few hundred mourners gathered in front of the hospital Sunday afternoon, with some weeping or chanting, "Viva Pinochet!"

"Pinochet rescued and transformed Chile into the country we all feel proud of," Hernán Guillof, president of the Pinochet Foundation, said to a group outside the hospital. "Once passions subdue, he will be given his place in history as architect of our nation."

But many more focused instead on the brutality and terror of General Pinochet's 17-year rule, in which more than 3,200 people disappeared or were killed and tens of thousands were detained, tortured or exiled.

Some rights advocates said they had mixed feelings about General Pinochet's death. Hiram Villagra, the prosecuting attorney in dozens of human rights cases against the general, said he would have preferred that he lived long enough to be sentenced in the trials he was facing.

"The air will feel lighter tomorrow, we will feel a sense of liberation," Mr. Villagra said. "But I lament that Pinochet has died without having been sentenced. However, in all serious charges against him, he has had his immunity lifted and has been indicted. Pinochet does not die an innocent man."

José Miguel Vivanco, Americas director at Human Rights Watch, said, "Pinochet spent his last years fending off an ever-tightening web of prosecutions in Chile and died a profoundly discredited figure in the land he once ruled."

Even his final illness proved to be divisive. He was admitted to the hospital in critical condition on Dec. 3 after he had a heart attack. He underwent angioplasty, and doctors said he was recovering well — so well that human-rights groups here began charging that the health crisis may have been staged, and they requested a judicial investigation.

But his condition took a sharp downturn on Sunday morning, his doctors said, and his family was gathered around him in the intensive care unit at the military hospital when he died.

Demonstrators began pouring onto the main avenue in the center of Santiago immediately after the news of General Pinochet's death, chanting human rights slogans and denunciations of him. The gathering quickly took on the air of a street party, with drinking and dancing, and the crowd began marching toward La Moneda, the presidential palace.

The size of the main demonstration grew quickly and steadily, reaching about 6,000 by 6 p.m. Around then, demonstrators began trying to cross over barriers guarding the presidential palace, and police officers in riot gear broke out tear gas and water cannons to turn them back.

The violence spread, with demonstrators throwing rocks, uprooting stoplights and burning at least four barricades and two cars. One person was reported injured by a thrown bottle. A radio reporter said there was "massive destruction" in a 10-block stretch in downtown Santiago.

The Dextrous Dictator (NYT)

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104567

The central puzzle of the dictator Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, who died yesterday at the age of 91, was that until recently he retained admirers in Chile and abroad, especially among people emerging from Communism. He masked his corruption and brutality by tailoring his level of repression to just what he needed to retain power and prestige.

General Pinochet was head of the army in 1973 when he led a coup against the socialist Salvador Allende, whose chaotic presidency had been further destabilized by the Nixon administration. In the first three years, General Pinochet's regime killed almost 3,000 people. Thousands more were tortured. The vast majority of the victims were nonviolent.

At first, Chileans, exhausted by politics, bought the government's stories that the victims were terrorists killed in confrontations with police. Then General Pinochet made the repression more subtle. Killings were selective — but that was enough to take care of the few brave dissidents. He distracted the rest of Chile with an artificially strong peso that made imports cheap and allowed even the middle class to buy color televisions and cars. The protests did not begin until 1983, after the peso crashed.

General Pinochet also exploited Chileans' need for legality. In 1980, he passed a Constitution providing for a plebiscite in 1988 on whether to hold free elections — robbing the coming protests of their power. When the plebiscite arrived, the government tried to rig it. But even members of the junta objected, and General Pinochet was forced to hold elections in 1989. The opposition won.

Out of office, General Pinochet's reputation slowly disintegrated. Although his second wave of economic policy worked, the center-left governments that followed deepened reforms and brought their benefits to average people, refuting the argument that a Pinochet was necessary for economic discipline. Chileans who argued that the human rights abuses were exaggerated were shown irrefutable proof.

Investigators also discovered at least $28 million that General Pinochet held in more than 100 secret bank accounts, most of them in the United States. At the time of his death, he was under indictment for kidnapping, torture and murder, as well as corruption-related charges of tax evasion and possession of false passports. Time has revealed that the once-admired General Pinochet was accomplished only at holding power.

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

IT'S A COINCIDENCE that Jeane Kirkpatrick, the astringent U.S. envoy to the United Nations in the 1980s, and former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet died only a few days apart. But in death as in life, the two are associated with a political theory that defined the early days of the neoconservative movement in the United States. Unfortunately for Kirkpatrick, its author, the theory proved to be dead wrong.

The idea was that right-wing authoritarian governments were much better bets for conversion to democracy than left-wing totalitarian ones. This is how Kirkpatrick put it in "Dictatorships and Double Standards," the influential 1979 essay in Commentary magazine that brought her to the attention of Ronald Reagan.

"Although there is no instance of a revolutionary socialist or communist society being democratized, right-wing autocracies do sometimes evolve into democracies — given time, propitious economic, social and political circumstances, talented leaders and a strong indigenous demand for representative government." Kirkpatrick's article, which focused on the Carter administration's policy toward Iran under the shah and Nicaragua under Anastasio Somoza, made some valid points about the differences between Marxist and traditional authoritarian societies. But the article — and Kirkpatrick — are remembered most for the suggestion that dictatorships of the right (especially those friendly to the United States) offered more fertile ground for democratization than dictatorships of the left.

Chile, where the murderous Pinochet eventually relinquished much of his power after a 1988 referendum, seemed to vindicate the Kirkpatrick doctrine. But then came the collapse of the Soviet Union and the creation of more democratic governments not only in the formerly captive states of Hungary and Czechoslovakia but also in Russia. And as China has shown, spectacularly, Marxist states can turn capitalist in a hurry, though political freedoms may still lag.

Like other reductionist theories, the Kirkpatrick doctrine ran up against the wisdom of H.L. Mencken's observation that "for every problem, there is a solution that is simple, clean and wrong."

Death Saves A Tyrant (USAT)

USA Today, December 11, 2006

Saddam Hussein and Chile's Augusto Pinochet have long been members of the club of tyrants who killed thousands of their citizens. The difference between them emerged Sunday when Pinochet died after suffering a heart attack at age 91. Numerous attempts to bring him to justice failed. Saddam, sitting in a Baghdad jail cell after a court sentenced him to death, must surely be envious.

DOJ_NMG_0104568

Thankfully, though, the difference in their fates is not so stark as, say, between Saddam and Uganda's murderous former dictator Idi Amin, who died as brutal tyrants could once reasonably expect to if ousted from power: in gilded exile. International attitudes to mass murder by brutal leaders are changing. The challenge is to continue the trend and make sure Pinochet is one of the last exceptions.

Already, because of the changing international consensus, Pinochet, whose military junta ruled the South American nation from 1973 to 1990, spent his old age fighting numerous attempts to bring him to justice. Several almost succeeded. Most notably, in 1998, he was detained in London for more than a year after an extradition request from Spain, where a judge had ordered his trial. The British decided he was not well enough. But a flood of efforts to get him to stand trial followed. Since 2000, he has frequently been under house arrest, facing charges of human rights and financial abuses, and barely avoiding trial because he was old and sick.

Bringing a dictator to justice is about more than revenge. It is needed for a society to face up to past crimes and to deter brutal dictators elsewhere. Chile is deeply divided over Pinochet's legacy. His many supporters argue that he saved the country from communism when he overthrew left-leaning Salvador Allende.

But that cannot justify what Pinochet is accused of: knowing about the 3,197 Chileans documented as dying and the 28,000 tortured under his rule.

Tyrants who have been brought to justice include Serbia's Slobodan Milosevic (he died during his trial in the Netherlands) and Liberia's Charles Taylor, facing an international court. Those now involved in crimes against humanity — the leaders of Sudan, abetting genocide in the country's western Darfur province spring to mind — must expect to end up like Saddam, not Pinochet.

Sic Semper Tyrannis (LAT)

By Marc Cooper

The Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2006

NOT WITH LITTLE irony did the gods choose to reclaim former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Sunday, which was International Human Rights Day.

The heart attack he suffered a week ago had initially seemed quite convenient. By landing him in a military hospital, it short-circuited an imminent court hearing into two killings he was accused of ordering more than 30 years ago. Indeed, his house arrest, decreed just last month, was lifted so he could be hospitalized. Nor was this the first time his failing health had worked to his advantage: Twice before over the last five years, Pinochet was spared trial on charges of murder, kidnapping and torture because he claimed he was too ill to face the courts.

But if human justice failed on previous occasions to fully snare Pinochet, the greater forces of nature and biology this time imposed the maximum sentence — and on the most appropriate day of the calendar.

By the time of his death at age 91, Pinochet's name had come to symbolize all that can go horribly wrong when dictatorship supplants democracy. Once celebrated as a prophet of free-market economic policies, he died disgraced and reviled, saddled with criminal accusations ranging from human rights violations to money-laundering and tax evasion.

Whatever his accomplishments or failures in the economic realm (which are destined to be debated for decades to come) there is no longer any possibility of denying the level of soul-less brutality and inhumanity that Pinochet imposed at bayonet point on Chile. It wasn't just the thousands of dead, tortured and jailed. It was rather the en masse humiliation of an entire population, forced to kowtow to a snarling dictator who had overnight reversed 100 years of civil democratic tradition.

Chileans have a saying: "The color of blood is never forgotten." Pinochet's brutality unleashed the sort of ghosts that never rest. Numerous commissions have published reports detailing the mind-numbing practices of electric-shock torture, "water-boarding," disembowelment and outright disappearance employed by Pinochet's military and police.

Pinochet's swagger, his unbridled arrogance, his flaunted impunity won him no respite. In spite of the national trauma generated by his dictatorship (and overcoming two decades of fear), a small group of relentless human rights crusaders were able to finally pierce the dictator's once invulnerable shield of impunity.

While the civilian government that succeeded Pinochet was too cowardly to prosecute him, enterprising magistrates in Spain went after him for the murder of some prominent Spanish citizens in the first years of his dictatorship. In 1998, still riding high as a self-appointed senator-for-life, Pinochet made the mistake of visiting London. The Spanish judges had him served with an international arrest warrant, and overnight Pinochet slid from having tea with Margaret Thatcher to sharing encyclopedia entries with Idi Amin and Benito Mussolini.

After 500 days in British custody, Pinochet was kicked out and sent home, and a tenuous and still-recovering Chilean civil society was finally ready to confront him. A cascade of accusations and indictments washed away any of his remaining legacy. His very presence in Chile, right up until his death, served as an electrifying stimulant to an ongoing national catharsis of restoring collective memory and providing justice. Pinochet had been indicted on multiple charges and was still facing more than 200 other criminal allegations.

Pinochet died with much of that business unfinished. A number of high-ranking military officers have been indicted for the abuses during the Pinochet period. Almost 30,000 Chileans have been officially recognized as victims of torture and have been granted monetary compensation.

But much about the Pinochet period remains unknown and unresolved. And while the civilian government now in power has shown little if no appetite to pursue these matters, Chile will never right itself until the full truth is known. No one knows for sure, just to cite one example, the origin of the millions that Pinochet stashed in secret foreign accounts. Illicit arms sales? Or drugs? Or both? And who else was involved with Pinochet in these scandals?

Likewise, there are still literally hundreds of unsolved political murders and disappearances. And an equal or greater number of former associates and beneficiaries of the Pinochet regime, guilty of a long list of human rights and criminal violations, remain unaccountable.

The death of any individual diminishes us all. There can be no celebration of Pinochet's demise, nor any mourning. The only appropriate response is to redouble efforts to uncover, review and sort out all the dirty work of his dictatorship — and then bury it forever with its execrable author.

Congresswoman Denies Urging Killing Of Castro (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

MIAMI, Dec. 10 (AP) — A congresswoman says a video showing her calling for Fidel Castro's assassination is fake, a charge denied Sunday by the film's director.

The congresswoman, Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Republican of Florida, appears in the 28-second clip made available on the Internet by the makers of a new British documentary, "638 Ways to Kill Castro."

In it, she says: "I welcome the opportunity of having anyone assassinate Fidel Castro and any leader who is oppressing the people."

But Ms. Ros-Lehtinen, a Havana-born lawmaker recently selected to become the top Republican on the House International Relations Committee, says the filmmakers spliced clips together to make the sound bite.

"It's twisted in a way that gives the viewer a totally wrong impression," she told The Miami Herald. "I've said the community has moved on, that those strategies are not being used today, but apparently the filmmakers think we're still in a '60s mentality."

Still, Ms. Ros-Lehtinen said it was possible she had, at some point, mentioned Mr. Castro's potential assassination.

"If someone were to do it, I wouldn't be crying," she said.

The film's director, Dollan Cannell, stood by the authenticity of the video.

"I can assure you categorically and completely that there has been no distortion of what she said," Mr. Cannell told The Associated Press on Sunday.

Ms. Ros-Lehtinen said that she had seen the documentary and that the final cut did not include that video clip. However, the documentary's Web site has a link to the clip.

The congresswoman said she was not shy about wanting Mr. Castro dead.

"No one advocates assassination," she said. "What we are advocating for is free elections, freedom for political prisoners, free expression of ideas and respect for human rights. That's how you get change in Cuba. Not assassination."

After An American Dies, The Case Against His Killers Is Mired In Mexican Justice (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr. And Colin Moynihan

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 10 — A month ago, the death of Bradley Roland Will seemed cut and dried. Mr. Will, an independent New York City journalist was shot in the chest while videotaping a lopsided confrontation between gunmen who supported the beleaguered governor of Oaxaca and protesters demanding his ouster.

Pictures of some of the gunmen, with their names, had appeared on the front pages of all the major papers. The two fatal bullets had come from a 9-millimeter pistol like those issued to the police. The case seemed a prosecutor's dream.

That is, until Dec. 1, when a judge freed two of the men photographed shooting at the protesters, citing a lack of evidence. The ruling provoked accusations from leftists of a cover-up. Indeed, the state's investigation into the killing of Mr. Will, as well as the deaths of a dozen protesters in the conflict, has drawn so much criticism that federal police raided the state police headquarters on Friday and seized weapons to determine if any had been used in shootings during demonstrations.

Besides underscoring how infrequently killings of journalists and antigovernment protesters are solved in Mexico, the case has drawn widespread attention because it reveals the sad clash of left-wing idealism, personified in Mr. Will, a bearded 36-year-old originally from Illinois, with the murky realities of Mexican politics.

Politics often warps investigations here, and Mr. Will's death in late October has quickly become a contentious issue in the very struggle he had come to document.

The protesters with whom Mr. Will was sympathetic said he was killed by government-backed paramilitary thugs who had already killed a dozen others since the conflict here began in May. They charge that his death is still more proof that the state government remains repressive, its prosecutors willing to cover up crimes by government officials.

They also assert that Mr. Will's death was part of an orchestrated attack on protesters intended to shed enough blood to provoke the federal police to intervene. Mr. Will and three others died in the violence that day. The killings prompted Vicente Fox, who was president at the time and had resisted getting involved in the conflict, to send in federal police officers and clear the streets.

State prosecutors, meanwhile, have built a case that suggests it was the protesters, not the police, who murdered Mr. Will to call attention to their cause.

The state attorney, who was appointed by the governor and owes him political allegiance, said the videotape Mr. Will recorded just before two bullets hit him on Oct. 27 suggested that someone at his side shot him, not the gunmen down the street. "The person who shot him was at a distance of no more than two and a half meters," said the prosecutor, Lizbeth Caña Cadez. "He was close."

The lack of progress in the case has angered Mr. Will's parents and friends. They complain that Ms. Caña is trying to steer blame away from police officers and public officials loyal to the governor. Mr. Will's family, as well as several human rights organizations, has urged the federal government to take over the investigation.

"It's very frightening what is going on down there," Mr. Will's mother, Kathy Will, said in an interview. "They are totally manipulating the case. They are trying to shift the blame off of their people, the paramilitaries."

Whoever is right, the authorities here have resolved only one of the 13 killings related to the protests in Oaxaca, and it involved off-duty soldiers rather than the local police or officials.

Nationwide, when it comes to journalists, the picture is bleaker. At least 38 have been killed in Mexico since April 2005, most of them assassinated after reporting on drug dealers. None of those cases have been solved, despite the appointment of a special federal prosecutor to pursue the killers.

"The justice system in Mexico is highly dysfunctional," said Daniel Wilkinson of Human Rights Watch. "Criminal investigations into cases like this are rarely successful."

It was into this world that Mr. Will arrived with a digital video camera in early October to document an inside story of what he saw as powerless people rebelling against a repressive government. He was working for the New York chapter of the Independent Media Center, a left-leaning media collective.

Friends said Mr. Will contended that the news media had ignored the conflict in Oaxaca, which began with a teachers' strike in May and snowballed into a larger movement, involving dozens of left-wing and Indian groups united in a desire to see governor Ulises Ruiz resign.

For Mr. Will, friends said, the conflict was a pure uprising, poor people taking direct actions to force out a despotic, corrupt government and install a true democracy. His reports made it plain that his sympathies lay with the protesters. Still, several journalists said he never participated in the protests himself.

"He wasn't one of these revolutionary tourists, making Molotov cocktails," said Diego Osorno, a reporter for the Mexican newspaper Milenio, who was nearby when Mr. Will was shot.

The motivations of the protesters themselves, many Mexican analysts say, were less clear-cut, and, in some cases, perhaps less noble. The myriad groups who made up the Oaxaca People's Popular Assembly had differing agendas.

They included teachers seeking a large salary increase, out-of-favor politicians hoping to forge a new party and Marxists who wanted to incite a violent, leftist revolution. What's more, many of the groups involved were angry because Mr. Ruiz had cut off the flow of state patronage to their organizations.

In late November, after yet another clash in which protesters burned several public buildings, the federal police arrested more than 130 people and imposed a ban on marches. On Tuesday, the new administration of President Felipe Calderón arrested a top leader of the movement, Flavio Sosa Villavicencio, and threw him in a maximum security prison on criminal charges. An uneasy calm exists in Oaxaca, where the federal police have banned demonstrations.

The day Mr. Will died was a critical turning point in the five-month-old conflict. That week, the teachers' union, the largest group in the movement, had finally reached an agreement with federal negotiators to return to work.

On Friday, Oct. 27, the rest of the organizations in the protest decided to show they were still powerful by shutting down the city for a day. They erected dozens of barricades, and by afternoon the city was paralyzed.

Groups loyal to the governor struck back, attacking protesters at barricades in four Oaxaca suburbs. Local residents, fed up with months of unrest, took part in the attacks, but officials from Mr. Ruiz's party and police officers in civilian clothes led them, witnesses said. Some of the plainclothes officers fired at the protesters.

Mr. Will was among the reporters who responded when residents and local officials confronted protesters in Santa Lucía, a suburb west of Oaxaca, where at least 200 protesters, some of them armed, took part in street battles.

A witness, who asked not to be identified because he feared for his safety, said he saw five city officials, including two police captains, huddled nearby during the gunfight, firing large-caliber weapons at the protesters. Mr. Osorno, of Milenio, said he saw at least one gunman behind a truck, about 30 yards from where Mr. Will was in a half-crouch. Mr. Will was hit and fell to the ground, groaning "Help me" in Spanish, his last videotape reveals, though it does not show who fired the shot. Several protesters were in front of him, most of them young men in masks, with stones, bottle rockets and clubs.

Prosecutors say that just before Mr. Will fell, a voice can be heard on the tape yelling, "Didn't I tell you, man, not to take photos!"

Víctor Alonzo Altamirano, the chief of the homicide division in the state attorney's office, said the sound of a gun being cocked could be heard at the same time. Then comes the loud report of a pistol close by. "I cannot close my eyes to what we are seeing on the tape," he said.

One protester, who was less than a yard from Mr. Will when he was shot, maintained that no one around Mr. Will had a gun at that moment, though he acknowledged, as did two news photographers at the scene, that some protesters were telling photographers not to take photos for fear of being identified.

The protester, who requested anonymity, said Mr. Will was crouched down just behind him facing up the street, eye to the camera on his shoulder, when the bullet crashed into his chest.

"I felt a bullet whizzing over my shoulder," the protester said. "I turned and saw him twist and fall backward to his right. Then Brad raised up his shirt and said, 'They hit me.' He lost color rapidly."

Dr. Luis Mendoza Canseco, Oaxaca's medical examiner, who performed an autopsy, said Mr. Will had two wounds. Investigators said they were from the same 9-millimeter gun.

The two released suspects — Avel Santiago Zárate and Orlando Manuel Aguilar Cuello, both municipal officials — were found with .38-caliber pistols, prosecutors said.

Three other gunmen, who were also photographed firing at the protesters, have not been arrested or questioned, prosecutors say. Neither have investigators detained five men, including two police captains, who a witness reported had been shooting at the protesters.

Advocates for press freedom say investigations into the killings of journalists in Mexico have been generally shoddy. "Under the current climate in Oaxaca it's difficult for state officials to conduct an impartial investigation," said Carlos Lauria of the Committee to Protect Journalists.

Darfur Crisis Crosses Borders (CSM)

By Rich Schapiro

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

GOZ BEIDA, CHAD

For the past three years, Arab militiamen have helped Sudan's government quell a rebellion in Darfur by slaughtering the region's mostly black African population and leaving behind a trail of rape, murder, and destruction. The result: more than 200,000 dead and 2 million displaced in what the United Nations calls the world's worst humanitarian emergency.

At the very least, however, the violence in western Sudan was mostly confined to its borders.

No more.

The crisis in Darfur has exploded in recent weeks, and now threatens to drag fragile neighboring countries into a regional war.

Both Chad and the Central African Republic (CAR) have become engulfed in fighting that involves a toxic mix of rebel groups, government forces, armed militias, and civilians.

"It's not a steady deterioration," Jan Egeland, the outgoing UN humanitarian chief, told reporters last week. "It's a free fall, and it includes Darfur, eastern Chad, and northern Central African Republic."

In the past month alone, nearly 60,000 Darfurians have been forced from their homes to escape massacre at the hands of Arab militias known as the janjaweed. Aid workers, UN personnel, and independent observers say the janjaweed are backed by Sudan's government, but Khartoum has repeatedly denied this charge.

DOJ_NMG_0104572

In eastern Chad, hundreds of aid workers have been evacuated due to increased hostilities between military forces and anti-government rebel groups, while Arab militiamen have ventured deeper into the country to conduct assaults, resulting in the displacement of nearly 100,000 Chadians.

And atrocities committed by a variety of rebel groups and armed bandits over the past few months have forced tens of thousands of people from the CAR to cross the border into Chad.

"The internal conflicts in Darfur, Chad, and the CAR are now linked by the regional presence and movement of armed groups, arms, and civilians across the three borders," said Georgette Gagnon, deputy director of the Africa division of Human Rights Watch. "And of course, the regional governments are using these insurgencies to carry out a proxy war against each other."

Indeed, leaders in Khartoum, Sudan's capital, and N'Djamena, its Chadian counterpart, have traded accusations as to who is responsible for stoking the bloodshed that has plagued Darfur since 2003. Both countries blame the other for supporting rebel groups.

In the past two weeks, the fighting has become so severe that hundreds of aid workers have been pulled from the region, leaving behind the displaced Sudanese, whose plight is now especially grim.

"For sure, if this situation lasts it will have a greater direct effect on the refugees' lives," said Hélène Caux, a spokeswoman for the United Nations High Commissioner of Refugees (UNHCR).

Since the last week of November, nearly 500 aid workers have been relocated from Abéché, the eastern city that serves as the hub for relief agencies in the region, to N'Djamena, while more than 100 are still awaiting evacuation from Guereda, a town farther north, according to the UNHCR.

Aid officials concede that, with only the skeleton crews now left behind in camps across the east, the refugees' situation has become particularly precarious.

"We haven't seen any downfall or deaths as a result of the reduction in personnel," says Joseph Aguettant, of the International Rescue Committee (IRC), which has trimmed its international staff in Bahai, a city along Chad's northern border, by 80 percent. "But we know this is something that can happen."

The area around the Goz Amir refugee camp, about 60 miles from the border, has become so rife with attacks that the Sudanese refugees and Chadians living nearby are stricken by fear of being set upon by the Arab militias.

Men head into the bush carrying bows and arrows, while young boys walk around with spears that are often taller than they are. When asked why they have the weapons, the response is unanimous: "defense."

The janjaweed - joined at times by Chadian Arabs - have been laying siege to villages east of Goz Beida, a Chadian town 100 miles from the Sudan-Chad border. The locals who survive are forced to trek miles to the closest villages, which often are plundered days later. They are then forced to flee yet again, and often end up setting up makeshift camps on wide swaths of parched land that offer little more than dust and thorn trees.

Hawaye Ismail arrived at just such a place, an open field 25 miles east of Goz Beida, last week with about 600 others. "We don't have anything to eat, and look, there's death all around us," she says.

Ms. Ismail's village was torched by Kalashnikov-carrying Arabs on horseback and camels in early November in an ambush that left 14 men dead. She made it to a nearby village, but was left homeless days later after the raiders rampaged again.

"The young attackers abused the young girls and the women," Ismail says, gesturing to the half-dozen women in tattered clothes gathered around her. "Today, with our situation, only God knows what we've been through."

Convoy Ambush In Darfur Kills About 30 Civilians; Investigators Taken Hostage (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Dec. 10 -- Militiamen on horseback ambushed a refugee convoy in western Darfur, killing about 30 civilians, and African Union peacekeepers investigating the attack were taken hostage by rioters, the A.U. and the United Nations said Sunday.

The armed men ambushed a civilian truck transporting medicine and relief items between the towns of El Geneina and Sirba, according to the United Nations. The exact number of civilians killed could not be confirmed but was estimated at about 30 people, said Radhia Achouri, spokeswoman for the U.N. mission in Sudan.

"Some of the passengers were shot by the attackers, and others were burnt to death during the attack," the United Nations said in a separate statement.

An international aid worker said that the assailants were government-backed Janjaweed, members of an Arab tribal militia, and that they attacked the convoy with rocket-propelled grenades, then killed survivors. He spoke on condition of anonymity because of restrictions the Sudanese government has placed on aid workers.

DOJ_NMG_0104573

An African Union spokesman, Noureddine Mezni, said rioters angry over the deaths were holding captive a helicopter crew and eight peacekeepers sent to investigate. The A.U. base in El Geneina was also being attacked, Mezni said, although the identity of the attackers was unclear.

Sudanese police transported the bodies of the victims to a refugee camp on the outskirts of El Geneina, and demonstrations erupted in the town, the aid worker said. A U.N. official in Darfur said rioting and sporadic shooting took place in the town Sunday.

The increased violence underscored the worsening situation in Darfur, where as many as 450,000 people have died from disease and violence and 2.5 million have been driven from their homes since fighting erupted in early 2003.

The government is accused of unleashing the Janjaweed to help counter ethnic African rebels, and the militia is blamed for the worst atrocities against civilians during the conflict. The government denies backing the Janjaweed but agreed to disarm the militia as part of a peace agreement it signed with one Darfur rebel group in May.

Halliburton-linked Workers Attacked In Algeria (HC/AP)

Houston Chronicle, December 11, 2006

ALGIERS, Algeria — Assailants hurled a bomb and fired at two vehicles carrying employees of an affiliate of Houston-based Halliburton co. near Algiers today, killing one Algerian driver, witnesses said.

The full extent of the casualties in the attack was not immediately clear.

Nine American employees of BRC, or Brown & Root-Condor, were heading from their offices to a Sheraton Hotel where they are housed in Bouchaoui, 9 miles west of Algiers, when they were attacked. BRC is a joint venture of the Halliburton subsidiary KBR Inc., formerly known as Kellogg, Brown & Root, and Condor Engineering SPA. It has contracts in Algeria's oil and defense industries.

The Americans were in a bus behind a security vehicle carrying two Algerians. The assailants hurled a bomb at the first vehicle, immediately killing the driver and injuring the passenger, the witnesses said.

Attackers then opened fire on the second bus, which quickly turned around and headed back to the BRC offices before the gunmen dispersed. Witnesses said it appeared there were no casualties in the Americans' bus.

Algerian security officials immediately blocked off roads in the area, adjacent to a forest on the Mediterranean coast.

Algeria is trying to pull itself out of an Islamic insurgency that started 14 years ago and has killed an estimated 150,000 people — Islamists, civilians and military.

Large-scale fighting died down in the late 1990s, and Algeria is enjoying the fruits of the oil boom and increased foreign investment, but sporadic violence continues to rattle the nation.

BRC offices could not be reached for comment. KBR Inc. is an independent, publicly traded subsidiary of Houston-based oil services contractor Halliburton Co.

In Tsunami's Wake, A Peaceful Aceh Holds First Election (CSM)

By Simon Montlake

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

BANDA ACEH, INDONESIA

Voters in the battle-scarred Indonesian province of Aceh go to the polls Monday, nearly two years after a devastating tsunami scoured its coastline and released an outpouring of international aid for the stricken survivors.

The ballot is the first since the signing in August 2005 of a landmark peace accord between the Indonesian government and armed rebels, who agreed to lay down their weapons in return for political autonomy for Aceh. Former rebels are competing in electoral races for the governorship and 19 district mayors and regents.

The presence of such figures on the ballot, and their public campaign to get elected, is a remarkable turnaround for Aceh, where the struggle for power has long been equated with fear, intimidation, and bloodshed. A trouble-free vote, and the acceptance of the outcome, would be an important step forward in the peace process after three decades of conflict and false starts.

"If we have the right leader, the peace will continue, I'm sure of that. Aceh can be prosperous and peaceful," says Ramli bin Buhari, a businessman from Pidie.

A high turnout is expected among the 2.6 million eligible voters, including hundreds of thousands of left homeless after the tsunami. Thousands of election monitors, including a European Union team, will be deployed at polling booths, which close mid-afternoon. Early results from poll samples are expected by early evening.

Under the peace accord, the rebel Free Aceh Movement, known by the Indonesian acronym GAM, agreed to disarm and demobilize 3,000 combatants, in exchange for a withdrawal of around 25,000 Indonesian soldiers and paramilitary police who were widely accused of human-rights abuses. The accord also called for local elections to be held in 2006, setting the stage for GAM to enter the political process.

But a major rift between exiled GAM leaders and a new generation of fighters and activists has prevented the movement from fielding a united candidate. Instead, two competing tickets for governor are claiming to represent GAM, which has opted to remain neutral after initially endorsing one candidate. By splitting their support base, say observers, the result could be that neither wins the governorship.

Tensions between the two camps spilled over on the eve of the two-week campaign when a gang of thugs assaulted Humam Hamid, one of the gubernatorial candidates, in a stronghold of Irwandi Yusuf, a young fighter and ex-political prisoner who heads the rival pro-GAM ticket. But conciliatory rhetoric from senior leaders in the movement, who insisted on neutrality between the two camps, helped to tamp down tensions, and the campaign has been smooth, with only minor reports of intimidation.

Analysts say this internal friction will complicate GAM's goal of dissolving its military command and transforming into a political party capable of ruling Aceh via the ballot box. "GAM never had a strong political wing. It was overwhelmingly a military operation," says Sidney Jones of the International Crisis Group in Jakarta.

Sharia law, which Aceh implemented in 2000, has also emerged as a backdrop to the elections as enforcement has been stepped up in recent years, including patrols by special "morality police" that report directly to the governor's office. While candidates have made almost no mention of the traditional Islamic law, the new policing force is a bone of contention among ordinary Achenese.

Under Indonesian election law, the winning candidate must garner over 25 percent of the vote, or face a run off against the second-placed ticket. With eight candidates in the gubernatorial race, including the two pro-GAM tickets, a second round appears likely. GAM's big election gamble

On a broiling afternoon last week, around 2,000 of Mr. Yusuf's supporters sat in a park in Banda Aceh facing a rickety wooden stage where stocky bodyguards formed a cordon behind the candidate. His speech was punctuated with references to his role in the peace accord and the promise of economic rewards in future for Aceh, which is among the poorest provinces in Indonesia despite its abundant oil and gas reserves.

Yusuf, who is running as an independent with a former political prisoner as his running mate, urged voters not to be seduced by candidates from large political parties with more money to splurge on the campaign trail. "When you run to them in the future and ask about their promises for more housing, they would answer, 'We already gave you clothing and food,' " he admonished.

Yusuf characterizes the rift within GAM as a generational divide between senior political leaders in Europe, who formed a government in exile in the 1970s, and younger combatants and activists who resisted harsh military crackdowns. But he insists that whoever wins the vote, the peace process will continue, provided Indonesia keeps its promises.

"There is an expectation from the people (of Aceh) that a candidate from GAM will win the election. If they don't win after a fair election, people must accept this. GAM will accept anyone who wins because of a fair election," he says.

Analysts say defeat for Aceh's former rebels at the ballot box would be a wake-up call for GAM and could spur its transformation ahead of the next political contest in three years time when the local legislature is up for grabs. "This is a dry run for 2009. That's the real prize. When you control the local parliament, you have budgetary power and can shape the laws of an autonomous region," says Ms. Jones. Guerrilla to groom

As the campaign wrapped up last week - candidates are forbidden to stump during the final three days - Herry Nurmansyah, a former GAM fighter, had more important matters on his mind. One year after leaving his jungle camp and going back to his village outside Banda Aceh, the former GAM fighter was to marry his high-school sweetheart, Julisa.

On Saturday, he sat stiffly in a traditional black tunic and crown on a bubblegum-pink throne with his new wife, whose hands and feet were painted in henna swirls. She dabbed tears from her heavily lacquered face as relatives crowded around the couple.

Among the visitors crammed into the room inside the bride's house were Mr. Nurmansyah's former comrades in arms, including his unit commander, Tuengku Hamzah, who had come to bless the newly-weds. Hamzah had spent the previous weeks canvassing votes for Yusuf, and was confident that the political spoils would be coming his way - just desserts for toughing it out in the jungle.

Nurmansyah, who recently found a job building houses for tsunami survivors, had more modest aims. "I just hope this election will bring change and benefit for all of us. We don't want to have to take up weapons again," he says.

In Tsunami's Wake, Old Foes In War Now Wage Politics (NYT)

By Seth Mydans

DOJ_NMG_0104575

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

BANDA ACEH, Indonesia, Dec. 10 — When tsunami waves hit Aceh two years ago this month, Irwandi Yusuf saved himself by climbing onto the roof of the jail where he was being held as a political prisoner.

Now he is a candidate for governor of the province, and in the election being held here on Monday, one of his eight opponents is a former commander of the Indonesian forces he faced as a separatist rebel.

"He is so friendly to me," Mr. Irwandi said of his former enemy. "We can cut off the line from the past to now. We just talk about funny things."

The tsunami that killed 170,000 people and left half a million homeless here in Aceh Province seems to have taken the fire out of a 29-year conflict. A hard-won peace agreement that made the election possible appears to be holding. There are still obstacles ahead, but if the process continues to move forward, an armed insurgency group will perform the rare feat of transforming itself into a political party within the government it opposed.

"It's a very difficult process," Muthiah Alagappa, director of the Washington office of the East-West Center, said in a telephone interview. "There are very few cases like it."

Even as post-tsunami reconstruction has bogged down in bureaucratic confusion and corruption, the dismantling of the war has proceeded quickly with what appears to be a genuine commitment from both sides. Only 43,400 permanent homes have been built in the two years since the tsunami, but 128,000 are needed, according to the United Nations. Twelve thousand families remain in temporary accommodations.

The Indonesian Army has withdrawn half the 50,000 soldiers it had in Aceh, though, and the rebels have laid down their arms and joined this special election that is part of what is called a memorandum of understanding with the government.

It is a delicate and difficult process, but the turn away from war seems irreversible, most political analysts and rebel leaders say. "No, no, we never think of using arms any more," Mr. Irwandi said in an interview.

Even before the tsunami's apocalyptic destruction shocked the combatants on both sides here, tentative moves were under way to find an exit from an unwinnable war.

"We were tired and they were tired," Mr. Irwandi said. "We could not achieve the mission militarily, and the military thought it could defeat us in five months or eight months or eight years, but found themselves trapped in a very protracted war."

In Sri Lanka, by contrast, the tsunami didn't halt a Tamil separatist insurgency that was not yet ready to look for a way to end the conflict.

As it moves from war to peace, the Acehnese insurgency is facing what analysts say is a predictable complication — a rift in the insurgency, called the Free Aceh Movement, between an old guard that lived in exile and younger former combatants.

In addition to his former combat enemy, among the opponents Mr. Irwandi, 46, faces in the election Monday is a fellow former insurgent who has been backed by the rebel group's leadership from its exile headquarters in Sweden.

"The fault lines are completely normal," said Sidney Jones, the Southeast Asia coordinator for International Crisis Group, an international monitoring group. "We've seen this in East Timor and in almost every civil conflict that exists. But it does make it difficult to pull together a coherent party structure.

"Right now, the fissures are so deep that it's going to make it all the more difficult to get the party up and running."

There is no shortage of difficulties for any new government in a province recovering from the twin devastations of war and natural disaster.

For years, Aceh has effectively been under the administration of the Indonesian military and police. Many of the province's skilled workers and civil servants died in the tsunami. Whatever the results of the election, Aceh must build a functioning government amid both physical and political ruins.

As foreign aid groups begin to pull out, taking with them jobs, skills and economic support, the challenges will become harsher. Among these will be the integration, with international assistance, of thousands of guerrillas and political prisoners into the mainstream.

As with other former insurgencies like those in Northern Ireland and the southern Philippines, there are concerns that a violent splinter group could emerge if not all of the combatants are satisfied.

A devastated province in which tens of thousands of people are without homes or jobs is not the most welcoming environment for former rebels hoping to start a new life.

The rebels and the victims of the insurgency, which took 15,000 lives, will compete for resources and financial assistance with surviving victims of the tsunami.

Many fighters have spent years in the mountains and have few skills or resources to support themselves. Many have not yet received the aid that has been promised, and there are reports that some are turning to banditry and other crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0104576

The election is unlikely to bring order to the political scene. Analysts here do not expect any of the eight candidates for governor to win the 25 percent of the vote required for outright victory, and a runoff is expected early next year. Former rebels are also running for some of the 20 other local executive positions in the election.

But leaders of the rebel group say they are prepared to lose in this first attempt at electoral politics. They say they see it as a trial run as they try to form a party, or parties, for a provincial parliamentary election in 2009.

The election is about power, not policy, and it is not clear what changes the former rebels will make if they win office. They now concede that the independence for which they fought is unattainable. The peace agreement has given them a measure of local autonomy and the right to form a local political party, and they have been promised two-thirds of the revenues from rich oil and natural gas reserves in Aceh.

"If the economy here is O.K. and the Indonesian government doesn't play around with us, what do we need separatism for?" said Muhammad Zainal Abidin, 52, a former rebel who spent 16 months in prison before being released, with other political prisoners, in August 2005. Like many other former rebels and others here, he said he had little interest in the strict Islamic Shariah law that had led to canings for adultery and gambling over the past year in Aceh.

"We don't like that at all," he said as he sat cross-legged on the floor above his small grocery store. "We want democracy in Aceh. We don't want the Shariah police here."

Most of all, the people of Aceh want a chance to live quiet, ordinary lives. "What I am afraid of is that we could end up with dissatisfied groups and that could lead to conflict again," said Azwar Hasan, who runs a local aid group. "Oh, God, no one wants to live in conflict again."

Bangladesh Sends Army Amid Unrest (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

NEW DELHI, Dec. 10 — The interim government in Bangladesh, faced with mounting opposition party protests, has deployed the army in what appears to be an attempt to check pre-election violence.

The order by the president, Iajuddin Ahmed, who leads a caretaker government, was issued Saturday night, on the eve of opposition party threats to surround the presidential palace. Political agitation has already debilitated the country nearly six weeks before the vote. [A news wire] reported that soldiers had been posted at the presidential compound, known as Bangabhaban, and at other potential political flash points.

Political violence has become routine in Bangladesh, and troops have been called out in the past to ensure peaceful elections. But it remains unclear to what extent the president enjoys the full backing of the interim government in his decision to pull out the army. Nor has the army provided any hints as to whether it intends to step in and rule.

The latest developments could further polarize opposition Awami League cadres, who have demanded Mr. Ahmed's ouster. The opposition contends that the voter list is inaccurate and that members of the election commission favor the Bangladesh Nationalist Party, whose five-year rule ended two months ago when the caretaker government was appointed.

So turbulent are politics in Bangladesh that its Constitution mandates that a neutral caretaker government manage the elections.

Yunus Claims Nobel Peace Prize (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 11, 2006

STOCKHOLM (AP) — Bangladeshi economist Muhammad Yunus accepted the Nobel Peace Prize on Sunday, saying he hoped the award would inspire "bold initiatives" to fight poverty and eradicate the root causes of terrorism.

Yunus, 66, shared the award with his Grameen Bank for helping people rise above poverty by giving them microcredit — small, usually unsecured loans.

"I firmly believe that we can create a poverty free world if we collectively believe in it," Yunus said after accepting the prize at City Hall in Oslo. "The only place you would be able to see poverty is in a poverty museum."

The Nobel Prizes, announced in October, are always presented in Oslo and Stockholm, Sweden, on Dec. 10 to mark the anniversary of the 1896 death of their creator, Alfred Nobel, a Swedish industrialist who invented dynamite and stipulated the dual ceremonies in his will.

The winners for literature, medicine, physics and economics will receive their awards later Sunday at a royal ceremony in Stockholm's blue-hued concert hall. Each award carries a purse of $1.4 million, a diploma and a gold medal. The first prizes were handed out in 1901.

This year's laureates include a novelist who explored Turkey's clash of cultures and American scientists who helped cement the big-bang theory of the universe and broke new ground in genetic research.

DOJ_NMG_0104577

Yunus said ending poverty was the best way to fight terrorism.

"We must address the root causes of terrorism to end it for all time," he said. "I believe putting resources into improving the lives of poor people is a better strategy than spending it on guns."

Grameen Bank, set up in 1983, was the first lender to provide microcredit, giving very small loans to poor Bangladeshis who did not qualify for loans from conventional banks. No collateral is needed, and repayment is based on an honor system, with a nearly 100% repayment rate.

Yunus said the idea has spread around the world, with similar programs in almost every country.

Clad in a traditional Bangladeshi sleeveless jacket, Yunus accepted his half of the $1.4 million prize from awards committee chairman Ole Danbolt Mjoes.

Board member Mosammat Taslima Begum, wearing a traditional dress in red with a green shawl, accepted the other half of the award on behalf of Grameen bank, saying she dedicated it to all Bangladeshis.

Mjoes said the award was an outstretched hand to the Islamic world in an era where Muslims are often demonized because of terrorism.

"The peace prize to Yunus and Grameen Bank is also support for the Muslim country of Bangladesh, and for the Muslim environments in the world that are working for dialogue and collaboration," Mjoes said

Turkish writer Orhan Pamuk won the literature prize for a body of work that illustrates the struggle to find a balance between East and West.

U.S. researchers have long dominated the science awards, and swept them all this year for the first time since 1983.

The Nobel Prize in medicine went to Andrew Z. Fire and Craig C. Mello for discovering a powerful way to turn off the effect of specific genes. John C. Mather and George F. Smoot won the physics prize for work that helped cement the big-bang theory of how the universe was created.

Roger D. Kornberg won the prize in chemistry for his studies of how cells take information from genes to produce proteins, a process that could provide insight into defeating cancer and advancing stem cell research.

Economics winner Edmund S. Phelps was cited for research into the relationship between inflation and unemployment, giving governments better tools to formulate economic policy. The economics award is not an original Nobel Prize, but was created by the Bank of Sweden in 1968.

Pamuk, whose trial last year for "insulting Turkishness" made headlines worldwide, was honored for exploring "new symbols for the clash and interlacing of cultures." His novels include "Snow" and "My Name Is Red." The charges against Pamuk were eventually dropped.

Intrigue Over Spy's Death Spreads To Germany (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And Mark Landler

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 10 —The German authorities announced Sunday that they had begun a criminal investigation of a Russian businessman after finding traces of polonium 210 around Hamburg beginning on Oct. 28 — four days before he met in London with the former Russian spy who died after ingesting the radioactive substance.

The British police have so far found no evidence of polonium contamination in London earlier than the date of that meeting, Nov. 1. The Sunday announcement raised the possibility that the polonium was carried from Moscow to London by way of Germany.

It has also added to suspicions that the case is somehow connected to the shadowy world of agents and businessmen, defectors, spies and exiles let loose by the dissolution of the K.G.B., and still entwined with successor agencies.

The former Russian spy, Alexander V. Litvinenko, long a critic of Russia's president, Vladimir V. Putin, made deathbed accusations that Mr. Putin was complicit in the poisoning — an accusation the Kremlin has derisively dismissed. The case has strained relations between Russia and Britain, and has now entangled Germany.

The man the Germans have put at the center of scrutiny is Dmitri V. Kovtun, a 41-year-old Russian who was a student in the 1980s at the Supreme Soviet Higher Military Command School, where many students went on to serve in the K.G.B. He has been in a Moscow hospital since Dec. 7, suffering from exposure to polonium. There are conflicting reports about his health; Interfax, the Russian news agency, reported he was in critical condition, but his lawyer later disputed that.

At a news conference in Hamburg on Sunday, the city's chief prosecutor, Martin Köhnke, told reporters, "He may not just be a victim but could also be a perpetrator." He said that Mr. Kovtun was accused of illegally handling the polonium.

A spokeswoman for the German police, Ulrike Sweden, expressed frustration that Russian authorities had not responded to German requests to speak to Mr. Kovtun.

DOJ_NMG_0104578

The German authorities said that Mr. Kovtun, who has been living in Germany, began spreading traces of polonium 210 in Hamburg soon after he arrived on an Aeroflot jet from Moscow on Oct. 28. Traces were found in the BMW that picked him up at the airport; on a couch and a pillow in at the apartment of his former wife, where he spent the night; at the house of his former wife's mother; and on a document he signed in a meeting at the immigration office in Hamburg two days later, the police said.

"If you're sitting in the passenger seat of a car, you're not likely to be sweating enough to leave traces of it that way," Ms. Sweden said at the Hamburg news conference on Sunday. "It's possible he got poisoned by handling the stuff."

On Nov. 1, Mr. Kovtun flew to London. An inspection of the plane he flew on, which belonged to the airline Germanwings, turned up no evidence of contamination.

In London, Mr. Kovtun met with two former K.G.B. agents, Andrei K. Lugovoi and Vyacheslav G. Sokolenko, whom he had known as students at the Soviet military school in the 1980s and who had both gone into private security work after the K.G.B. dissolved along with the Soviet Union.

Then he and Mr. Lugovoi, who had known Mr. Litvinenko for 10 years, met with him at a bar in the Millennium Mayfair Hotel, ostensibly to pursue a business deal. Alex Goldfarb, a friend of the Litvinenko family, said that Mr. Sokolenko also met Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1, possibly at the same hotel.

Within hours, Mr. Litvinenko became seriously ill. Three weeks later, he was dead, and medical experts determined that the cause was exposure to polonium 210. The association of so many men linked to the former K.G.B. in the case reflects the shadowy tangle of relations that emerged from Russia's post-Soviet chaos, where some covert agents became free agents but kept ties to the government, billions were made overnight, and the new billionaires who made them needed protection.

Mr. Litvinenko and Mr. Lugovoi, in particular, held close ties to Boris A. Berezovsky, the former Russian oligarch who became a rival to Mr. Putin, and whom Russia accused of defrauding the state of about $18 million in 1994 and 1995. He has been living in political asylum in Britain since 2003.

Mr. Kovtun, Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Sokolenko have all publicly denied any involvement in Mr. Litvinenko's case, but their shared background in the Soviet and then Russian secret services and the private security industry that evolved since has — fairly or not — heightened suspicions of Russia's, and Mr. Putin's, possible involvement.

Igor A. Goloshchapov, a former K.G.B. counterintelligence officer who now heads the League of Security Structures, a lobby for the private security firms that have proliferated here in Russia, said there were 4,200 licensed private security agencies in Moscow alone, as well as others operating less openly and available for hire for illicit purposes. "The security and detective business is a regular part of life in any society," he said in a telephone interview. "The peculiarity of Russia's security business is that in our country our whole way of life was changing."

"Where this kind of business starts," he added, "the truth ends."

Oleg A. Gordiyesky, a former K.G.B. colonel who defected to Britain in the 1980s, said the private Russian security companies often had close ties to Russian authorities. "Most of them are immediately recruited as secret collaborators, that is, members of the public who have promised to help," he said. "And they help very seriously. They do their job protecting the companies and they report everything back" to the Federal Security Service, the K.G.B.'s successor.

According to a lengthy interview with Mr. Kovtun, Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Sokolenko on Ekho Moskvy, an independent Russian radio station, on the day after Mr. Litvinenko died, the three met in the 1980s at Soviet military command school, where students were known as Kremlin Cadets.

Mr. Kovtun said he had served in Czechoslovakia and Germany after leaving the academy, a résumé that suggested he could have served in some military or intelligence capacity. He did not say with which service or unit he served. He settled down in Germany and married a German woman. He describes himself now as a business consultant.

"I help Western companies in entering the Russian market," he said.

Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Sokolenko went on to become members of the Ninth Department of the K.G.B., or the Kremlin Regiment, which provided security for high-ranking Communist Party officials. Mr. Lugovoi began in 1987, Mr. Sokolenko in 1990.

When the Soviet Union collapsed, the regiment became part of the Federal Security Service, known as the F.S.B. and ultimately as an independent force providing Kremlin security, not unlike the United States Secret Service.

Mr. Sokolenko, like Mr. Lugovoi, retired and became involved in private security. Many of these companies boasted of their associations with their former employers. Mr. Sokolenko's company is called the Ninth Wave, an allusion not only to the former K.G.B. department but also to a maritime expression for the worst wave in any storm, an apt metaphor for what unfolded in the 1990s.

Mr. Lugovoi left the secret service in 1996 and became head of security at ORT, the state television network that until Mr. Putin's presidency was largely controlled by Mr. Berezovsky. In 2001, Mr. Lugovoi was arrested and spent more than 12 months in prison, accused of plotting the escape of a Berezovsky associate from a Moscow hospital where he had been in police custody, accused of embezzling millions of dollars from Aeroflot and of wiring the money to accounts in Switzerland belonging to Mr. Berezovsky. (He was convicted in 2004, but released for time served; he has since left Russia.)

The authorities had summoned Mr. Berezovsky for questioning in that case, but by then he had fled Russia for London, saying that an array of criminal charges against him, many still pending, had been politically motivated. Mr. Lugovoi was released in September 2002 and the charges against him were dropped, with little explanation.

Mr. Lugovoi declined repeated requests for an interview. In the public statements he has made, he said he had continued to work in security-related matters. Along with Mr. Kovtun, he met with Mr. Litvinenko at least three times in the month leading up to the Nov. 1 meeting. One of those involved a meeting with a British company, Enrys; another involved a meeting with Mr. Berezovsky, who also became a patron of Mr. Litvinenko's.

Mr. Lugovoi said he had known Mr. Litvinenko for at least a decade — to the time Mr. Litvinenko worked for the F.S.B. and formed his relationship with Mr. Berezovsky after the latter narrowly survived an assassination attempt.

Mr. Lugovoi said that a year ago, at Mr. Litvinenko's request, they began discussing business deals involving British companies interested in investing in Russia. This year Mr. Lugovoi expanded his business dealings to include a company based near Moscow that makes mead and kvas, a bread-based, mildly alcoholic drink.

He has repeatedly promised to meet with British investigators, but in the week since British detectives arrived in Moscow an interview has not yet taken place.

Mr. Sokolenko, in a telephone interview, said he had joined Mr. Lugovoi and his family on the trip to London beginning Oct. 31 to see a soccer game, but he did not meet Mr. Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel the next day.

He declined to discuss his relationship with Mr. Lugovoi except to say they were old friends. He added that he and his colleagues had been unfairly tainted by the swirling accusations simply because of their K.G.B. backgrounds. "My name is from now on associated with this story," he said. "It is not very pleasant. We have never concealed the truth about how it all happened."

Hamburg Checked for Radiation

FRANKFURT, Dec. 10 — The investigation of Dmitri V. Kovtun's four days of spreading polonium has rattled Hamburg, with officials in space-age radiation protection suits swooping into shops and restaurants throughout the weekend.

The German police and federal authorities established a special unit to investigate the case, dubbed "The Third Man" — a reference to the cold-war film starring Orson Welles, and an officer from Scotland Yard is to travel to Hamburg on Monday to coordinate the German and British investigations.

Gerald Kirchner, an official from the Federal Office of Radiation Protection, said at a news conference in Hamburg on Sunday that polonium could have spread to Mr. Kovtun's hands if he mishandled a container of the substance. It is lethal, but is dangerous only when swallowed, breathed in, or absorbed through an open wound. "If it did come out of a container, it was very carelessly done," Mr. Kirchner said.

Not one of the people Mr. Kovtun came into contact with while in Hamburg was contaminated, said a police spokeswoman, Ulrike Sweden. The night before he left, Mr. Kovtun slept on the couch in the apartment of his German former wife, Marina, in Ottensen, a gritty Hamburg neighborhood that is being gentrified.

Also on Sunday, the British police confirmed that 2 of the 26 officers working on the case had tested positive for low levels of radioactive contamination. A police spokeswoman, who spoke in return for anonymity under police rules, said the traces were "relatively small" and "below defined safety limits."

Probe Of Poisoning Shifts To Germany (WSJ)

By David Crawford, Alan Cullison And Carrick Mollenkamp

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

The investigation into the death of ex-Russian agent Alexander Litvinenko has spread to Germany as it focuses on the travels of two Russian men, one of whom left a radioactive trail through Hamburg during his stopover there from Moscow en route to London, where Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned.

The two Russians -- Andrei Lugovoi and Dmitri Kovtun -- met with Mr. Litvinenko Nov. 1 at the bar of the Millennium Hotel in London's Mayfair neighborhood hours before Mr. Litvinenko fell ill. Mr. Litvinenko, an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin who had immigrated to Britain claiming asylum, died Nov. 23 after being poisoned with a little-known radioactive substance, polonium 210. A person familiar with the British inquiry into the alleged killing said the two men are a central focus of the investigation, adding that investigators haven't ruled out that others could have been involved and somehow set up Messrs. Lugovoi and Kovtun.

Messrs. Lugovoi and Kovtun are longtime acquaintances, having graduated from an elite military school in Moscow and having both worked in the Russian security services.

Scotland Yard, Russian police and about 300 German police and other officials are involved in the investigation of Mr. Litvinenko's death, raising diplomatic tensions between Russia and the West. Yesterday, investigators in Hamburg complained that Russian authorities aren't cooperating and haven't responded to their request for access to the Aeroflot plane that transported Mr. Kovtun to Hamburg from Moscow, said Thomas Menzel, head of Hamburg's special investigation squad for the case.

German police have code-named their investigation "Third Man" because of the trio's meeting at the hotel bar. (Police said it isn't a reference to the 1949 movie "The Third Man," a thriller set in post-World War II Vienna.)

Yesterday, investigators laid out Mr. Kovtun's steps through Hamburg, where he stayed from Oct. 28 to Nov. 1. Traces of polonium 210 were found on the passenger seat of a BMW car that picked up Mr. Kovtun at the Hamburg airport, in the home of Mr. Kovtun's former mother-in-law outside Hamburg, and on a couch he slept on at the apartment of ex-wife Marina, German officials said yesterday. Police also found traces of polonium 210 at a Hamburg city registry office on a piece of paper that Mr. Kovtun signed Oct. 30, Mr. Menzel said.

Four people have informed police they met with Mr. Kovtun, and 13 other leads are also being followed, Mr. Menzel said. The discovery in Germany came after police there ran a standard check for Mr. Kovtun's name after London's Metropolitan Police Service, as Scotland Yard is formally known, disclosed it as part of its investigation, Mr. Menzel said.

Investigators have had trouble talking with Mr. Kovtun and his associate Mr. Lugovoi in recent days. Last week, officials from Scotland Yard flew to Moscow to meet with them, but the meetings have been held up amid conflicting reports both men had been hospitalized for reactions to traces of polonium 210. One Russian news service said Mr. Kovtun had been in a coma, a report officials later denied. State news services in Moscow reported yesterday that Mr. Lugovoi was being interviewed by Russian authorities in the presence of Scotland Yard's team.

Mr. Litvinenko had said he was investigating the Oct. 7 killing of 48-year-old Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, although authorities haven't officially established any connections between the two killings.

Messrs. Lugovoi and Kovtun, in a recent appearance on a Moscow radio program, said they were innocent in Mr. Litvinenko's death. On the show, Mr. Lugovoi, an ex-Soviet security-service agent, said he introduced Mr. Kovtun to Mr. Litvinenko because of their common business interests.

Mr. Kovtun, also on the radio program, said he previously worked for the Soviet government in Czechoslovakia and was in Germany when the Soviet Union collapsed. He married a German woman and remained in the country for 12 years. He recently divorced and moved back to work as a business consultant in Moscow, where he sought to help British companies enter the Russian market. He said his first meeting with Mr. Litvinenko was Oct. 16 in London.

Germans Investigate Russian In Poisoning (WP)

By Shannon Smiley And Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 11, 2006

HAMBURG, Dec. 10 -- German prosecutors said Sunday that they are investigating a Russian businessman for the illegal handling of a radioactive substance in the days after he flew to Germany from Russia and before he left to meet a former Russian internal security agent in London. The development is the strongest indication so far that the plot to poison Alexander Litvinenko in London originated in Moscow.

At a news conference in this port city, German officials said Dmitry Kovtun, who reportedly lies sick in a Moscow hospital, flew to Hamburg from Moscow on Oct. 28 before heading to London on Nov. 1, the day he met Litvinenko at a bar at the Millennium Hotel.

Hamburg's chief prosecutor, Martin Koehnke, said traces of radioactivity found in and around Hamburg and linked to Kovtun's movements before Nov. 1 suggested that he carried the substance to Germany. Koehnke said it was still possible that Kovtun was merely present when polonium-210 was "packaged in Moscow," but German investigators are convinced that he was in contact with the deadly isotope before he met Litvinenko.

"There is probable cause for the initial suspicion that he might have brought the substance with him outside his body to Hamburg, and that he may not only be a victim but could also be a perpetrator," Koehnke said at the news conference in Hamburg police headquarters.

Bolstering that assertion, Thomas Menzel, a police officer leading the investigation, said there is no evidence that Kovtun had returned to Germany after the London meeting with Litvinenko, all but ruling out the possibility, as Kovtun has claimed, that he first came into contact with a radioactive substance at the meeting with Litvinenko.

"We cannot be absolutely sure at the moment, but there has been no evidence to suggest that he returned to Hamburg," Menzel said.

"He is considered to be a suspect," German police said in a statement.

German radiation experts said Sunday that they had confirmed the presence of polonium-210, the substance that killed Litvinenko, at two locations in Germany and were 95 percent certain that traces found at other locations had come from that radioactive isotope. Final tests were needed to confirm its presence at some locations, German officials said. Officials did not specify exactly where the polonium-210 had been found.

Menzel said Kovtun, a Soviet army veteran and business consultant who had lived in Germany for 12 years, flew to Hamburg from Moscow on an Aeroflot flight.

"Aeroflot is not available to us. It is probable that he was already contaminated when he flew on the plane," Menzel said. "We have not received any answers to our questions so far" from Russian authorities.

The Germans have dubbed their investigation "The Third Man," though officials did not explain the reference to the Graham Greene mystery. More than 170 police officers are working on the case, along with members of the federal border police, the federal criminal police and radiation protection officers.

The killing of Litvinenko, which Scotland Yard has classified a murder case, had already led to some deterioration in relations between Britain and Russia, but it now has the potential to impact the wider relationship between the European Union and Russia. Critics of President Vladimir Putin have accused the Kremlin of complicity in the killing, allegations that the Kremlin rejected as absurd amid repeated assertions that the polonium almost certainly did not originate in Russia.

The German allegations, however, will throw a fresh spotlight on the Russian investigation of the case. The Russian prosecutor general's office has opened its own inquiry into Litvinenko's death and said it was investigating Kovtun's poisoning as attempted murder.

Attempts to reach Russian officials at the Kremlin and the prosecutor general's office Sunday night were unsuccessful.

The German disclosures indicate that Kovtun was "with the murder weapon before Nov. 1," said Alex Goldfarb, who has been acting as a spokesman for the Litvinenko family in London. But he said Kovtun "had no motive to kill" Litvinenko, so the question remains, "Who hired him and equipped him?"

"It is clear all the tracks lead to Moscow," he said.

Kovtun, 41, first met Litvinenko on Oct. 16 in London, where the two were introduced by another Russian, Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB agent who attended a military academy with Kovtun in the 1980s. The three discussed possible business deals involving British companies interested in investing in the Russian market, according to a joint interview with Kovtun and Lugovoy on Echo Moskva radio in late November.

Both Litvinenko and Lugovoy at various times had close ties to exiled Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky, a declared enemy of Putin. Lugovoy was head of security for a television channel in Moscow owned by Berezovsky before he fled Russia in 2000 after clashing with Putin. And Litvinenko became a part of Berezovsky's circle in London when he fled Russia after accusing former colleagues in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, of corruption. His allegations had led Russian authorities to press criminal charges against him.

The three Russians met on Nov. 1 at the Millennium Hotel bar in central London. Seven hotel workers have tested positive for exposure to a radioactive substance. An Italian who met separately with Litvinenko the same day has also tested positive for radiation exposure, as has Litvinenko's wife.

Both Kovtun and Lugovoy have denied any involvement in Litvinenko's death.

Laying out a chronology of some of Kovtun's movements, German officials said he landed in Hamburg after flying from Moscow on Oct. 28. He was picked up in a BMW, which has tested positive for radiation, German investigators said.

On Oct. 29, Kovtun spent the night in Haselau, about 16 miles north of Hamburg, at the home of his former mother-in-law. The BMW was found at that location, German officials said, and initial tests detected radiation in the house.

On Oct. 30, Kovtun went to an administrative office for foreigners in Hamburg. Radiation has been detected on his file card, which he signed, German officials said. Neither the employee in the room nor the room itself tested positive. Kovtun has a German residence permit. He was still registered as a Hamburg resident, but police said he had not lived permanently at his listed address in an apartment building on Erzbergerstrasse for a couple of years.

Kovtun told Echo Moskva that he had started working as a business consultant in Moscow and that an enterprise had led to his discussions with Litvinenko.

Kovtun's former wife lives in the same building on Erzbergerstrasse where he was registered. On Oct. 31, Kovtun spent the night on her couch. Police said they found traces of radiation on the couch.

At 6:40 a.m. on Nov. 1, Kovtun took a Germanwings flight from Hamburg to London. The plane was examined yesterday at the Cologne-Bonn airport, but no contamination was detected. Police, explaining that apparent anomaly, said that had Kovtun showered, he might have washed away any trace. They also noted that the plane had been thoroughly cleaned since Kovtun traveled on it.

Traces Of Radiation Linked To Associate Of Poisoned Ex-spy (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 11, 2006

HAMBURG, Germany (AP) — Traces of the rare radioactive substance polonium-210 were found at a German apartment visited by a contact of fatally poisoned ex-spy Alexander Litvinenko — before the two men met in London, authorities said Sunday.

The polonium traces were found on a couch where Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun is believed to have slept at his ex-wife's Hamburg apartment the night before he headed to London for a meeting with Litvinenko last month, German investigators said.

Tests on traces of radiation at the apartment "clearly show that it is polonium-210," Gerald Kirchner of the Federal Radiation Protection agency said at a news conference.

Investigators said Kovtun flew to Hamburg from Moscow with Aeroflot on Oct. 28 and departed for London on Nov. 1. That is the day when Kovtun and at least one other Russian met with Litvinenko at London's Millennium Hotel — and when Litvinenko is believed to have fallen ill.

Traces of radiation also were found in the passenger seat of a car that picked Kovtun up from the Hamburg airport, on a document Kovtun brought to Hamburg immigration authorities and at the home of Kovtun's ex-mother-in-law outside Hamburg — all from before the Nov. 1 meeting.

German prosecutors did not say whether they suspect Kovtun might have been involved in Litvinenko's death. But they said they were investigating him on suspicion he may have improperly handled radioactive material.

"At this stage of the investigation, we have sufficient initial cause to believe that he brought the polonium traces to Hamburg outside his body, or that these traces are the result of contact with polonium-210," prosecutor Martin Koehnke said.

Officials said that any connection between Kovtun and Litvinenko's death would have to be investigated by British police. British police are treating his death as a murder.

"We still believe that both variants are possible: that he may be a victim, but also that he may have been involved, at least in procuring the polonium," Koehnke said.

Litvinenko, an ex-Russian agent who was a fierce Kremlin critic, died Nov. 23 after blaming Russian President Vladimir Putin for the poisoning. The Kremlin has vehemently denied involvement.

Kovtun reportedly is being treated in Moscow for radiation poisoning. Russian authorities have opened a criminal investigation into his poisoning, calling it attempted murder.

Kirchner, the radiation agency official, said it was possible Kovtun could already have been poisoned when he arrived in Hamburg and left behind traces through body fluids such as sweat.

On Saturday, the German plane aboard which Kovtun flew from Hamburg to London tested negative for traces of polonium-210. Investigators raised the possibility that may be because the plane had been cleaned thoroughly.

A security officer for Moscow's Sheremetyevo airport said all Aeroflot planes, including the one which flew to Hamburg on Oct. 28, had been checked for radiation and tested negative. The officer spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to speak to the media.

Litvinenko met at the Millennium Hotel in London's Mayfair neighborhood with Kovtun and former Soviet agent Andrei Lugovoi. Another man, security firm head Vyacheslav Sokolenko, has said he was at the hotel but did not participate in the meeting.

Lugovoi has denied that the men were involved in the ex-spy's death.

Meanwhile, Litvinenko's widow said in interviews published Sunday that her late husband's criticism of the Kremlin had antagonized his former secret service colleagues, and contended that Putin had created an atmosphere that "makes it possible to kill a British person on British soil."

In her first interviews, Marina Litvinenko said she believed Russian authorities were behind the poisoning of her husband, who sought asylum in Britain in 2000 and obtained citizenship this year. Marina Litvinenko told Sky News in an English-language interview that her husband "openly went out from system and accused the system of killing people, of kidnap."

Marina Litvinenko has placed her faith in British investigators but said she does not intend to cooperate with Russian authorities, who plan to come to London to probe her husband's death.

"In Russia, it doesn't matter how many people are killed," she said, adding that the life of "only one person can still be very important in England."

Also on Sunday, Litvinenko's friend Alex Goldfarb accused Russian authorities of trying to obstruct the British probe by preventing Kovtun and Lugovoi from being questioned.

DOJ_NMG_0104583

Lugovoi was supposed to testify after a team of Scotland Yard officers arrived in Moscow on Tuesday. But the interrogation has been postponed several times, although Lugovoi himself has said he is eager to answer questions.

"It's a clumsy effort to cover up the trace, to prevent British investigators from meeting with two key witnesses," Goldfarb told The Associated Press.

He added that Lugovoi and Kovtun could be in danger as the authorities "could try to remove them later."

"Another crime is unfolding before our eyes — the removal of two key witnesses: Lugovoi and Kovtun," he told the AP.

Lugovoi, who is being checked in Russia for radioactive poisoning, said Sunday his condition was "stable" and results of his medical checks would be available by the end of the week.

Lugovoi said Kovtun also was in a "satisfactory" condition. "He's not in a coma," Lugovoi told the RIA Novosti, denying a report by the Interfax news agency on Thursday.

The Spy Who Knew Too Much (TIME)

By J.f.o Mcallister

Time, December 11, 2006

Alexander Litvinenko was buried as he had lived, in a storm. There was rain, hail and a tornado near Highgate Cemetery in north London on the day his lead-lined coffin was lowered into a plot a few yards from that of another dissident who had sought refuge in Britain, Karl Marx. Before the burial, there was a memorial service at a mosque. Several close friends said Litvinenko had converted to Islam a few days before he died, in a kind of atonement for atrocities Russia (and perhaps Litvinenko himself) had committed in Chechnya, although another doubted any conversion had taken place. Litvinenko's widow Marina had requested a nondenominational service at the graveside, but an imam interrupted the proceedings to perform Islamic rites. Litvinenko, a former Moscow anticorruption detective turned furious critic of the Russian government, had a talent for controversy.

The dead man in the Highgate Cemetery started feeling ill on Nov. 1. The London doctors who attended Litvinenko's bedside quickly suspected that some kind of radioactive agent was causing his decline. His hair was falling out, his athlete's body was shriveling, his bone marrow was failing, just as if he had been one of the firemen called to the burning reactor at Chernobyl. But gamma spectrometers found nothing unusual in his blood or urine. As doctors ruled out a slew of increasingly obscure toxins and bugs, the patient's condition worsened. In desperation, the police sent his urine to Britain's Atomic Weapons Establishment, which has equipment beyond the reach of any hospital. There, experts discovered Litvinenko's urine was teeming with radiation--not the gamma rays they had been looking for, which are the usual culprits in radiation poisoning because they can penetrate steel and concrete, but alpha particles, which can be blocked by a single sheet of paper or a layer of human skin. If they get into your bloodstream, though, alpha particles will destroy everything they touch. The Chernobyl occurs inside. This is not a nice way to die.

It was Litvinenko's fate. On Nov. 23, a few hours after the scientists isolated what was causing his body to disintegrate, he succumbed. His was not the quiet, inexplicable demise that a poisoner usually seeks. Instead, those alpha particles, which were shown to come from the rare isotope polonium 210, opened a box of mysteries that have grabbed the world's attention for weeks and turned a gruesome death into the center of a global manhunt and a potential row between Russia and the rest of the world.

The victim had no doubt where the search for his killer would lead: on his deathbed, he said his death had been ordered by Vladimir Putin, the President of Russia. Russian officials have denied that as a malicious provocation. Not surprisingly, Britain is being punctilious about amassing sufficient evidence before it points a finger in any direction. But if some shadowy figures close to the Kremlin turn out to be responsible for Litvinenko's death, it would be the most astonishing indictment of just how ruthless the modern Russian state can be.

All that, as yet, remains unproved. Meanwhile, a slew of whodunit theories are jostling for prominence. Following an autopsy that spurred the police to treat Litvinenko's death as a murder, Scotland Yard antiterrorism officers have been combing sites all over London, while colleagues traveled to Moscow. "This continues to be an extremely complex investigation, and detectives are pursuing many lines of inquiry," said a police spokeswoman. Litvinenko's excruciating and sinister death and the swirl of international politics around it make this a case worthy of John le CarrÃ©, but as the police insist, the classic questions of any murder inquiry still apply: Scotland Yard, in short, is looking for motive, means and opportunity.

Who had a motive?

WHY WOULD ANYONE WANT ALEXANDER Litvinenko dead? To answer that question, investigators are having to immerse themselves in the intrigues of postcommunist Russia and their echoes in London, the favored home away from home for Russian exiles, where Litvinenko sought asylum in 2001. (He became a British citizen two months ago.)

Litvinenko had spent the 1990s as an officer in the Ã©lite organized crime unit of the Federal Security Service (FSB), which was tasked with penetrating organized-crime gangs in the murky post-Soviet world of big money and official corruption. Like anyone else who touched that cesspit, he had collected some powerful enemies--and at least one ally. That was Boris Berezovsky, one of Russia's first billionaires, who made his money in cars and oil partly by using his excellent connections with Boris Yeltsin to buy state assets for much less than they turned out to be worth. In 1994, as his Mercedes was pulling out of his headquarters, a huge car bomb decapitated Berezovsky's chauffeur but left Berezovsky unharmed. Litvinenko was assigned to the case, and over time the two men became friendly. In 1995 hit men gunned down Vladislav Listyev, a popular TV personality who also ran Berezovsky's ORT-TV network. Officers from a rival organized-crime squad came to Berezovsky's headquarters to arrest him and search for documents. But in the doorway, with his pistol drawn, Litvinenko held off eight of them armed with Kalashnikovs, while Berezovsky furiously phoned allies at the Kremlin. Berezovsky said he and Litvinenko became "like brothers" that night.

Litvinenko claimed to have saved Berezovsky's life a second time. In 1998 he said he had refused an order "to kill the Jew who has stolen half of this country"--by which his superiors meant Berezovsky. As a result, Litvinenko believed, an unsuccessful attempt was made on his life. Those claims were made at a surreal press conference at which Litvinenko appeared with six other disgruntled FSB officers. Some wore ski masks, but Litvinenko, his face uncovered, calmly stated that bosses at the FSB were using the organization "for their private ends to liquidate those who bothered them" and line their own pockets.

Was Litvinenko telling the truth, and if so, was that his sole motivation for grabbing the limelight? Later, two of the officers in the episode claimed the stunt was bought and paid for by Berezovsky, which probably only heightened the rage of the man who had become the FSB's chief--Vladimir Putin. To Putin, a former KGB officer, what Litvinenko had done "was a major act of treason," says former KGB Major General Oleg Kalugin, now an exile in the U.S. after having written about Russia's tilt toward authoritarianism. In his book The Lubyanka Gang, Litvinenko, for his part, said he had gone to Putin before the press conference with proof showing which top FSB officers and high state officials were corrupt. Putin, he wrote, promised to take action--but had Litvinenko tailed instead and hired some of those accused of corruption to work for him. FSB officers arrested Litvinenko on corruption charges in 1999, and he was jailed for eight months. At trial, he was acquitted, then rearrested and jailed for an additional seven months on the same charges (which were quashed), then arrested again. He was eventually released on the condition that he did not leave Moscow.

Litvinenko broke that promise. With Putin having succeeded Yeltsin as President, Litvinenko and his family fled to London in October 2000--shortly after Berezovsky, who was later charged in Russia with fraud, had left for Britain. Litvinenko went to work for the billionaire and lived in a house owned by him. Both agitated against Putin, Berezovsky by financing human-rights and opposition groups and Litvinenko by producing two books furiously critical of the new President. Litvinenko, it is fair to say, didn't like Putin. Last summer he claimed in a letter posted on the Internet that the President was a habitual pedophile. Litvinenko also contended that Putin had been on the take from Mafia groups for years and that to advance his presidential ambitions, he had directed FSB officers to blow up apartment buildings in Moscow in 1999, killing more than 300 people--then pinning the outrage on Chechen rebels. (Putin has vehemently denied any involvement; Russian courts found a group of Chechens guilty of the crimes.) Litvinenko helped make a French film about the apartment bombings and was contributing to a documentary being made in London when he was murdered. This fall Litvinenko had been on the trail of the murderer of Anna Politkovskaya, a persistent critic of Putin's war in Chechnya and human-rights abuses in Russia. Politkovskaya was killed in the doorway of her Moscow apartment in October. Litvinenko was sure the order had come from the Kremlin.

Putin, says Alexei Kondaurov, a former KGB general who is now a maverick Duma deputy, is known for keeping score and for a long memory. So the idea that he would want an infuriating gadfly like Litvinenko to disappear is not beyond reason. But the President's defenders scoff at the idea that he might have been involved in Litvinenko's death. Putin, they say, had no need to get rid of Litvinenko; the exile was an irrelevant crank. Milton Bearden, a former CIA spy in Moscow, as well as other experienced intelligence hands, agrees it would be nuts for Putin--who has had good relations with British Prime Minister Tony Blair--to order an assassination on British soil of a British citizen who was no more than a pest. Says Bearden: "Take a deep breath and take a look at Putin and say, 'Is he stupid or insane?'"

If not Putin, who might want Litvinenko dead? Plenty. Russian Mafia bosses whose networks he was still prying into, for example, or rogue FSB officers who had been paid to rub him out by those who wanted to hurt Berezovsky. Perhaps the culprit was someone who wanted to frame Putin, or a member of the many factions maneuvering to succeed him when his term expires in 2008. One particularly dark theory making the rounds in Moscow was that Litvinenko organized his own death in a bizarre politically motivated suicide. Julia Svetlichnaja, a Russian postgraduate student who met with Litvinenko several times over the past year, last week described an erratic man who said he was going to blackmail at least one famous Russian oligarch with the many secrets he was collecting--or sell them to newspapers. Yegor Gaidar, a Prime Minister in the early 1990s and now an occasional critic of Putin's, came to the President's assistance last week when describing how he had fallen violently ill from an apparent poisoning in Dublin on the day Litvinenko died. Writing in the Financial Times, Gaidar concluded "that some obvious or hidden adversaries of the Russian authorities stand behind the scenes of this event, those who are interested in further radical deterioration of relations between Russia and the West." His implication was that those same or similar adversaries killed Litvinenko.

Who had the means?

THE POLICE ARE TAKING ALL SUCH CLAIMS with a grain of salt--and turning their attention, rather, to the grains of polonium 210 that are at the center of the case. This is no garden-variety poison: polonium needs a nuclear reactor to cook it up and extremely careful handling. At first, the discovery of the element seemed to hang responsibility on the Kremlin. Russia is a big producer of polonium (although its annual output, less than a hundred grams a year, shows just how rare it is). The element is hard to procure. In the U.S., it takes a government license to buy more than minute quantities, and according to the website of United Nuclear, which sells isotopes for use in research labs, it would take about $1 million, 15,000 purchases of the largest unlicensed amount and some fancy lab work to scrape together a lethal dose. (The British Health Protection Agency says the dose that killed Litvinenko was at least 10 times as high as that needed to kill.)

Polonium 210 has some prosaic applications; it is used, for example, in antistatic devices found in photo shops and fabric mills. It would be very difficult, but for less than $1,000, just a few such gizmos could theoretically be disassembled and the contents reworked in a laboratory to produce a lethal dose. To be usable as a poison, Michael Clark, a spokesman for Britain's Health Protection Agency, said last week, the polonium would then have to be mixed in solution, probably with a gelling agent. "If it was some sort of liquid, it could have been--as in James Bond--a little magic capsule," Clark said. All this implies considerable sophistication and resources. A rich, ambitious criminal syndicate might have been able to pull it off; nevertheless, normally it is governments that work on this scale. And obscure poisons have long been a specialty of Russia's secret police, going back to a "toxicological office" that reported to Lenin personally. In the past, the Russians were known to have developed a gun delivering a burst of cyanide gas causing death easy to misidentify as a heart attack, and tiny pellets smeared with the poison ricin, which has no antidote.

In retrospect, it would have been a lot less trouble for someone to push Litvinenko under a bus than to feed him polonium. But it's likely his poisoners did not anticipate the brouhaha his death would cause. "I believe this was a botched operation," says Litvinenko's friend Alexander Goldfarb, who helped him escape from Russia and runs the Berezovsky-funded International Foundation for Civil Liberties in New York City. Without the intervention of Britain's nuclear-bomb lab, the cause of death would have remained shrouded. Boris Zhuykov, chief of the radioisotope laboratory at the Nuclear Research Institute of the Russian Academy of Sciences, says the discovery that polonium was the cause was "an act of scientific heroism. The murderers obviously did not expect that the polonium would be found. They failed because of the excellence of the English gamma spectrometer and the persistence of the research." (Zhuykov says that when he was making these points to Moscow's pro-government NTV network last week, the interview was terminated.)

Who had the opportunity?

SCOTLAND YARD HAS HAD ONE BIG BREAK IN the case: polonium, once released, is like a persistent, invisible dye that marks whatever it touches. Someone who ingests even small amounts will leave an unmistakable trail through sweat and even fingerprints. London's gumshoes have spent the past two weeks following such spores all over town--and beyond.

Litvinenko got sick the evening of Nov. 1, when alpha particles were destroying the lining of his gut. As he began to suspect poison, he focused on two meetings he had earlier that day. One was at a sushi bar in central London with Mario Scaramella, 36, an Italian lawyer and, like Litvinenko, a man drawn to the world of secret information and conspiracy theories. The second meeting was in the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel, near the U.S. embassy, with a group of Russian businessmen with whom Litvinenko was apparently hatching business ventures in Britain. "Alexander said both [meetings] were suspicious, and one was probably innocent," says Goldfarb.

For a time, attention focused on Scaramella, but by the end of last week his level of poisoning and other evidence exculpated him of any suspicion. Instead, the trail of polonium was entangling the group of Russians at the Pine Bar. All seven bartenders on duty that day tested positive for the substance, at levels approaching those found in members of Litvinenko's family, implying they had inhaled it soon after its release--possibly from the vapor given off by a drink into which it had been slipped. The Russians who met Litvinenko in the bar included Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB bodyguard who had met Litvinenko in the 1990s when serving as Berezovsky's security chief at ORT; Dmitry Kovtun, a former Soviet army officer who has lived in Germany for many years and has known Lugovoy since they were 12; and Vyacheslav Sokolenko, a graduate of the same military school as Lugovoy and Kovtun. Sokolenko says he had never met Litvinenko before their brief encounter in London, and that his only interest that day was to attend a soccer match and do some sightseeing. Both Lugovoy and Kovtun have polonium in their bodies, and so far the main focus is on them; both men (and Sokolenko) deny any wrongdoing.

When Lugovoy learned that British authorities were investigating Litvinenko's poisoning, he volunteered for an interview at the British embassy in Moscow. Polonium was later found in the embassy room, and in lots of other places Lugovoy had visited: on planes he had flown between Moscow and London in October; in five rooms at the Sheraton Park Lane hotel, where he had stayed; and in a fourth-floor room at the Millennium Hotel he is said to have used on the day Litvinenko was poisoned. Finding polonium in a hotel Lugovoy had used on a previous trip to London prompted British authorities to wonder if there might have been an earlier, failed murder attempt. A senior British security official thought the sprawl of radioactive markers throughout London and beyond implied an amateur operation, not up to the FSB's usual standard. But another official disagreed. "This is such an extraordinary material to be using as a weapon," he said, "I'm not sure if any standard operating procedures would exist for handling it." Lugovoy's explanation for the traces that seem to track his progress around London was straightforward. "Someone is trying to set me up," he said to the Moskovsky Komsomolets newspaper. "But I can't understand who. Or why."

Nine Scotland Yard detectives were in Moscow last week, trying to talk to Lugovoy. But the interview kept getting postponed for "technical reasons." Cooperation between the Londoners and the Russian authorities has been frosty. Russian prosecutors insisted that they conduct all the interviews, with the British merely suggesting questions. Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika said no Russian citizens would ever be extradited to Britain in connection with the case, while his office suggested that Russia would open its own criminal investigation in London. Lugovoy and Kovtun were said to be in the hospital with radiation poisoning, but there was no independent confirmation of that. After his interview with the British detectives, Kovtun was reported by the usually reliable Interfax news agency to have lapsed into a coma, but his lawyer quickly denied it. Hamburg police found alpha radiation in the apartment of Kovtun's ex-wife and in the home of his ex-mother-in-law, but were not able to say whether the source was polonium 210. For their part, British officials were hoping further tests might let them pinpoint the origins of the polonium, since reactors usually leave signatures in their output. The forensic trail so far points decisively to Russia. But Scotland Yard knows that pursuing Litvinenko's murder back to those who set it in motion, whether official, private or some combination of the two, may never be possible unless someone confesses.

Meanwhile, there is the light--uncomfortably glaring--that the case sheds on modern Russia. Vladimir Ryzhkov, one of the few independent liberals left in the Duma, says, "The point is not whether Putin is responsible for these concrete murders. The point is that he is responsible for having created a system that is ruled by fear and violence." Ryzhkov claims that the armed forces, Interior Ministry, FSB and those who have retired from them to join private security services "are running this country, own its economy and use violence and murder as habitual management techniques." A U.S. businessman in Moscow seconds the argument. "While you in the press are obsessed by Politkovskaya and Litvinenko, you've missed that half a dozen major oil executives and another half-dozen major bankers have been murdered in the last few months." Unlike Litvinenko's sickness, Russia's may not be fatal. But like his, it starts from inside. From his lead-lined coffin, a shadowy figure has illuminated that much.

EU Looks Likely To Partially Halt Talks With Turkey (WSJ)

By William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

European foreign ministers will meet today in Brussels to consider a last-ditch Turkish proposal to end a deadlock over Cyprus that threatens Turkey's membership talks with the European Union.

EU ambassadors couldn't reach a decision last week, and diplomats in Turkey's capital, Ankara, expect foreign ministers to fail, pushing the issue to EU heads of state who meet Dec. 15 and 16 in Brussels.

After an anguishing debate, diplomats expect the EU to decide to suspend parts of Turkey's membership negotiations. Pessimists fear the partial pause will evolve into a more permanent freeze, turning Turkey toward nationalism and away from the West. Optimists cling to the hope that the rupture won't be complete and European leaders will leave the door open to resume talks later.

The stakes may be high in either cementing a major Islamic country into the West or seeing failure exacerbate the clash of civilizations.

The proximate cause of the conflict is the divided island of Cyprus. After Greek Cypriots took control in 1974, the Turkish army invaded and occupied the northern half, where they have stayed ever since. Greek Cypriots rejected a United Nations-brokered deal to unify the island in 2004, while Turkish Cypriots approved it. The Greek part of the island entered the EU anyhow.

As part of their entry negotiations, the EU gave the Turks until this year's end to open their ports and airports to traffic from Cyprus. The Turks refused, saying the EU should at the same time end the commercial isolation of northern Cyprus, a prospect vetoed by Greek Cypriots. Turkey last week offered to unilaterally allow Cyprus traffic into one port and one airport for a year in return for the "expectation" the EU would reciprocate later on northern Cyprus.

The last-minute Turkish offer remains insufficient, EU officials say, and Turkish diplomats themselves are resigned to its rejection. Cyprus has vetoed the proposal outright and is pushing for a hard punishment. Given the island's small importance -- its total population is less than one million -- the Turks suspect ulterior motives. Greece, France, Germany, the Netherlands and Austria -- who are wary of the prospect of allowing 70 million Muslim Turks into what has been a Christian club -- are likely to "hide behind Cyprus," said Murat Mercan, head of the Turkish Parliament's EU Committee.

The European Commission is proposing freezing eight of the 35 "chapters" in Turkey's membership talks and saying no new chapters could be closed until the Cyprus issue is settled. A final decision to freeze fewer chapters would be "psychologically" important, helping the Turkish government sell further concessions to its citizens and continue the adoption of EU-inspired changes such as press and religious freedoms, says Kaya Turkmen, director general for European Union Affairs in the Turkish Foreign Ministry.

Another crucial issue is the possibility of a "rendezvous" clause calling for a review in 18 months or so. So far, the clause remains in the package being considered by foreign ministers. This deadline, if missed, could lead to a "complete break in talks," Mr. Turkmen said.

With Or Without EU, Turkey Is Rising (CSM)

By Yigal Schleifer

The Christian Science Monitor, December 11, 2006

ISTANBUL, TURKEY

Like a game of high-stakes chicken set on the global stage, Turkey and the European Union have been locked in a tense standoff ahead of this week's deadline for Turkey to open its ports to Cypriot vessels or face consequences.

In a last-minute bid Thursday, the Muslim country looking to join the EU offered to provisionally open one port and one airport. But Brussels has deemed the concession insufficient and EU leaders appear likely to decide at a summit later this week to partially suspend talks on Turkey's membership.

As EU foreign ministers meet Monday to discuss the issue, some observers - particularly in Europe - see Turkey's stance as self-defeating obstinancy. But others say it is in fact fueled by a greater sense of self-confidence, the result of a surging economy and an increased sense of its own growing strategic importance, which may dampen the effects of any rupture with the EU.

"For the first time in my career I am seeing a Turkey that is quite calm and confident of itself," says Kemal Kirisci, director of the European Studies Institute at Istanbul's Bogazici University. "There is an element of confidence that is beginning to permeate the Turkish economy, and a bit of politics as well, and I see this confidence starting to permeate the Turkish foreign ministry. This is very healthy for Turkey and for the European Union."

Economically, Turkey has never been more part of Europe. Some of Europe's most venerable brands, from Bosch to Fiat and Renault, are today being manufactured in Turkey, which has grown to become the largest exporter of televisions to Europe.

But the continent's interests in Turkey may lie beyond the marketplace, experts say. With its strategic location between Europe and Asia, Turkey can act as a key conduit for delivering important goods to Europe, from Central Asian oil and natural gas to greater political influence in the Middle East. In addition, Turkey's young population could ultimately boost the productivity of a graying European population.

Mired in a deep financial crisis only a few years ago, Turkey's economy has been growing at a rate of some 7 percent for the last three years, while its formerly triple-digit inflation has been tamed to a manageable 10 percent. If it were to join the EU right now, Turkey would be the sixth-largest economy in the 25-member organization.

"Both in finance and trade, Turkey is already a big part of Europe," says Murat Yucer, an economic analyst in Istanbul. "Turkey is a big market. Ultimately, it's a solid growth story."

All of this has been attracting an increasing number of European investors, despite tensions between EU countries and Turkey.

Analysts point out that during a recent political crisis between Turkey and France over the French lower house of parliament's approval of a bill that would make it a crime to deny that the mass killings of Armenians by the Ottomans were a genocide, French businessmen worked hard to distance themselves from the legislators' actions.

"[European business leaders] see Turkey as a very interesting and growing market that has a lot of opportunities," says Felix Howald, Europe director for the World Economic Forum (WEF), a Geneva-based organization that brings together leaders from business and politics.

A WEF report issued ahead of a recent high-level summit in Istanbul stated: "Turkey is perceived by many as a source of risk to Europe; it may be just the opposite, a potential source of major risk mitigation."

"Europe needs to look at Turkey in the context of the wider global risks facing it in the future."

DOJ_NMG_0104588

Reacting to the possibility of the EU negotiations being partially frozen and of Turkey being forced to abandon the negotiating table, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said Europe would be making a "dreadful mistake."

"Europe, not Turkey, would stand to lose," he said this week, adding that Turkey would still continue to pursue its membership goal, although it has a Plan B and C.

Mr. Erdogan didn't specify what those other plans are, but observers in Turkey believe Ankara can't afford to cast aside its engagement with Europe, no matter how rocky the relations.

Hugh Pope, an independent analyst based in Istanbul, says that even Turkey's growing involvement in the Middle East - often seen as laying the groundwork for an EU alternative - is predicated on the perception that predominantly Muslim Turkey is on the path to joining the European big leagues.

"The relationship is really important for Turkey's power. Even if it's not going anywhere, it needs to be seen as going somewhere," says Mr. Pope. "Turkey has always got to maintain the illusion that the European process is in motion. It will never repudiate Europe."

But Bahar Rumelili, an expert on Turkey-EU relations at Istanbul's Koc University, says the negotiations are as important for Brussels' image.

"For the EU, a healthy relationship with Turkey conveys the image of the EU as an inclusive organization and an international actor that is able to promote change and reform," she says. "There is a growing realization from the European side that to alienate Turkey would be a big mistake. It would damage a major part of the EU's image as an international actor."

The forces of public opinion and political expediency might still get in the way, however, with European politicians certainly giving the impression that they are happy to alienate Turkey.

French conservative presidential hopeful Nicholas Sarkozy kicked off his candidacy by declaring that "Turkey's place is not in the EU." German chancellor Angela Merkel has also made clear her desire to deny Turkey full membership. In that sense, some say a cooling-off period between Turkey and the EU might be a positive thing, particularly with public opinion in some European countries decidedly against Turkey's membership.

"I think a pause is absolutely vital at this moment because the European public is up in arms," says Pope.

"I think that Europe has to catch up with itself."

Complete The Mission (WSJ)

By Miomir Zuzul

The Wall Street Journal, December 11, 2006

ZAGREB, Croatia -- The search for peace and democratic reform in the Middle East is NATO's most important challenge, as last month's Riga summit affirmed. But this focus on security and reform outside Europe threatens to sideline NATO's core responsibility to act within Europe. Along with deterring the Soviet Union until its collapse, the Alliance contributed to the economic growth and democratization of postwar Western Europe. This record of success makes it imperative that NATO's doors remain open to new European members hoping to make a similar journey from the days of dictatorship, discord and privation to democracy, peace and prosperity.

These potential new members can be found in Southeast Europe, a region that only too recently has been plagued by war and ethnic tensions. Some steps toward bringing these countries in were taken at the Riga Summit. Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Serbia were invited to join the Partnership for Peace (PFP) program, which the Alliance has successfully used to groom prospective members. U.S. President George W. Bush affirmed that a key foreign-policy goal is to bring Croatia, Albania and Macedonia into NATO in 2008. The Riga Summit Declaration reaffirmed the Alliance's intent at the next summit in 2008 "to extend further (membership) invitations to those countries that meet NATO's performance based standards and are able to contribute to Euro-Atlantic security and stability."

While these are steps in the right direction, NATO must bring the process promptly to its logical conclusion by offering these countries full membership. Decisive and bold leadership, both by the U.S. and key European countries, is more necessary than ever since, unfortunately, some NATO members are experiencing expansion fatigue. They are threatening to stop or pause the process of integrating Southeast Europe into the Alliance's unique security architecture.

This cannot be allowed to happen. NATO was established with the goal of stabilizing Europe. Yet, a key portion of the European geopolitical space -- the Balkans -- remains unsettled. Radicals in Serbia are once again threatening to erode the budding democracy in Belgrade; Kosovo remains unresolved; and even 10 years after the Dayton accords, Bosnia and Herzegovina remain unable to function without international assistance. The best, the only, way to stabilize what otherwise might become Europe's ghetto is the region's gradual integration into NATO. This is exactly the same bold strategy that led to the transformation of postwar Western Europe and post-Cold War Eastern Europe.

The optimal way to begin this transition is through Croatia's membership in NATO. Croatia is the region's leader in terms of economic and democratic stability and is well on its way to meeting the criteria for European Union membership. President Bush also acknowledged that Croatia is presently the only truly stable pro-NATO democratic ally in the region. Croatia's membership in the Alliance would serve as the bridge to the rest of the region and encourage democratic reforms throughout the Balkans.

While NATO must certainly continue to look outward and give due importance to its tasks in the Middle East, it must not forget its founding mission of stabilizing Europe. Today, this mission remains incomplete. As in Central Europe in the 1990s, when those countries marked their return to the European family by joining the Alliance well ahead of the EU, NATO has another opportunity to move faster and exhibit greater vision than the Union in the Balkans.

Mr. Zuzul was Croatia's foreign minister between 2003 and 2005. He is currently a member of parliament in Croatia.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Ashcroft Claims Enemy Combatant Held Since 2001 Was Tied To 9/11 Attackers. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, A1, Serrano, 850K) reports, "Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri is the last enemy combatant imprisoned in this country. Yet four years after his arrest, government officials still cannot agree on what threat he posed. In a new allegation, former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft says Al-Marri was sent to the United States a day before the Sept. 11 attacks to plan strikes on West Coast targets, including the tallest building in Los Angeles. Ashcroft's claim — made in a new book — is the first time any U.S. official has directly linked Al-Marri to the West Coast attacks that Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden allegedly hoped would follow the deaths of nearly 3,000 people in New York, the Pentagon and Pennsylvania. Citing Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who was captured and interrogated, Ashcroft wrote: 'I believe KSM had planned to use Al-Marri to help facilitate this next wave of attacks focused on Los Angeles.' But three federal law enforcement officials asked about the allegation said they were mystified by Ashcroft's assertions."

Plans To Build Guantanamo Legal Compound Are Halted. The Miami Herald (12/10, Rosenberg, 286K) reports, "In an abrupt about-face, the Pentagon has scrapped plans to invoke emergency authority to fast-track construction of a controversial $100 million legal compound at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Instead, Defense Department officials will seek permission from Congress for any new major buildings in which to stage the first war-crimes trials since World War II." The retreat was "a setback in Bush administration war-on-terrorism policy, just as the Republican-led Congress finished business Saturday -- to be replaced by a Democratic majority."

Lithwick Says Congress Effectively Legalized Torture. In the New York Times Magazine (12/10), journalist Dahlia Lithwick writes, "There were always two narratives offered about the change in American torture policy after 9/11. The first story — told by the Bush administration — was that the Geneva Conventions mandating humane treatment of war prisoners could be unilaterally suspended by the president for the duration of the war on terror. But ... only a few renegade bad apples abused detainees. The alternate version of the story went this way: from the outset of the war, human rights groups said, Bush-administration attorneys devoted considerable energy to secretly redefining torture." The competing versions "collided this summer with the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld." Lithwick concludes disapprovingly, "Congress passed legislation decreasing Congressional and judicial oversight of detainees. When Bush admitted, in short, that the second narrative — America tortures people in secret — was true, Congress effectively made it legal."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Coast Guard Live Fire Practice Perturbs Great Lakes Area. The Washington Post (12/10, A18, Slevin, 690K) reports, "U.S. Coast Guard vessels staging machine-gun target practice in the peaceable Great Lakes? ... In the name of defending the United States against terrorists, the Coast Guard proposes live-fire zones in all five Great Lakes, where gunners could perfect their skills on M-240B machine guns to be mounted on lake vessels. The weapons can fire hundreds of 7.62mm rounds a minute and send lead 2.3 miles downrange." The Bush Administration "sought to assure the Canadians that the [machine guns] would not violate the spirit of an 1817 agreement limiting armaments on the lakes, home to 21 percent of the fresh water on the Earth's surface." However, "opposition to the proposal is formidable and growing."

WAR NEWS:

White House Seeking Alternatives To Key ISG Proposals. Coverage by both television networks and print media of the White House stance on Iraq casts President Bush as standing his ground regarding the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, but suggests Bush is open to change. ABC World News (12/9, story 2, 1:30, Weir, 8.78M) reported Bush "has promised to announce his plan for a new direction in Iraq before the end of the year; though the bipartisan Iraq Study Group has weighed in, the President says he wants to hear more." ABC (Morrell): "The White House says the President is still digesting the Iraq Study Group report but at the same time he is seeking lots more advice. ... Now, all this is a clear indication that while the President appreciates the hard work of the Iraq Study Group, he certainly does not believe they have all the answers."

NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 2, 2:35, Court, 9.87M) reported Bush "struck a conciliatory tone in his weekly radio address," but "didn't address two of the study group's key recommendations: that the US begin direct talks with Iran and Syria and begin pulling out troops by early 2008. Still the President faces heavy pressure to change course." On the CBS Evening News (12/9, story 3, 2:30, Assuras, 7.66M), ISG adviser Steven Cook said, "Certainly the report is a rebuke of the Administration's foreign policy."

CNN (12/9, Quijano) reported, "On the heels of that sobering report by the Iraq Study Group, President Bush today, in his weekly radio address, praised the bipartisan panel for its work, but continued to remain vague about its recommendations. ... As he's done since the report was released on Wednesday, the President was careful not to weigh in in any specific fashion on the 79 recommendations."

The New York Times (12/10, A18, Rutenberg, Sanger, 1.16M) reports Bush Administration officials "say their preliminary review of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's recommendations has concluded that many of its key proposals are impractical or unrealistic, and a small group inside the National Security Council is now racing to come up with alternatives to the panel's ideas. ... President Bush and his top aides were described as deeply reluctant to follow the core strategy advocated by the study group: to pressure Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to rein in sectarian violence faced with reduced United States military and economic support." The AP (12/10, Loven) also says "President Bush's national security team is debating whether additional troops are needed to secure Baghdad."

Implying a presidential effort to put the best light on things, the Los Angeles Times (12/10, Richter, 850K) reports that "although the bipartisan commission on Iraq endorsed actions that the White House firmly opposed, President Bush said Saturday that the panel's report shared his chief goal for the country. ... The release of the report Wednesday has amplified criticism of the administration's policies and lent new momentum to calls for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq. Bush is now scrambling to develop an alternate course."

ISG Report Shows "Divide Within GOP." The New York Times (12/10, A1, Broder, Toner, 1.16M) reports, "The release of the [ISG report] this week exposed deep fissures among Republicans over how to manage a war that many fear will haunt their party — and the nation — for years to come. A document that many in Washington had hoped would pave the way for a bipartisan compromise on Iraq instead drew sharp condemnation from the right." White House officials "who conducted a preliminary review of the report said they had concluded that many of the proposals were impractical or unrealistic." On the other hand, GOP "moderates clung to the report, mindful of the drubbing the party received in last month's midterm elections largely because of Iraq." The disagreements "could make it more difficult for Republicans to coalesce on national security policy and avoid a bitter intraparty fight going into the 2008 campaign." President Bush "has not yet tipped his hand on what course he intends to pursue," but "has already signaled that he intends to make some adjustments, most notably by dismissing Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld immediately after the midterm elections."

The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Levey, 850K) reports President Bush, "weakened by an unpopular war and the loss of Republican control in Congress, is now confronting disaffection within his own party that could complicate his attempt to set an agenda for his final two years in office." Republicans "are advertising attacks on Bush's foreign policy that they once kept largely private. Last week…Sen. Gordon Smith gave a speech calling the current war strategy 'absurd' and sent out a news release with his remarks. Some longtime Bush allies, such as Texas Sen. John Cornyn, are even adopting Democratic rhetoric to criticize the Iraq war. And on other issues that will confront the new Congress in January -- including trade and judicial appointments -- Republican lawmakers have signaled an unwillingness to follow the White House."

Hawks "Rage" Over ISG Plan. The Washington Post (12/10, A3, Abramowitz, Kessler, 690K) reports, "Steady condemnation from conservatives for the Iraq Study Group report may be providing some cover to the Bush administration as it completes its own review of strategy in Iraq, apparently with little enthusiasm for the panel's prescription of U.S. troop withdrawal and dialogue with Syria and Iran. ... Comments from the hawkish right, meanwhile, have often been an accurate gauge of the beliefs of key figures inside the Bush administration, especially Vice President Cheney." Sen. John McCain is described as "notably fueling the skepticism."

Bush Seen By Some As "Rejecting Lifeline." The San Francisco Chronicle (12/10, A1, Lochhead, 384K) reports, "Much of Washington is looking at President Bush as a man standing on quicksand in Iraq, refusing the branch offered by his father's friend to save his presidency and the country from a historic blunder." Bush "is in full flower of what he calls resolve and others call obduracy. The Baker-Hamilton report has left Bush isolated even within his own party. ... It remains to be seen whether Bush is clinging to Cold War metaphors that he hopes history will vindicate or saving face before delivering a speech expected by Christmas. During it he would call for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq based on reviews he has ordered from his State Department, Pentagon and National Security Council." The Chronicle notes doubt that James Baker "was sent as an envoy from father to son. ... he is no longer playing family messenger."

WPost, NYTimes Examine ISG. The Washington Post (12/10, B6, 690K) editorializes that the ISG's "recommendations for shifting U.S. military tactics in the war are specific, focused and aimed at incremental improvement over the next few months; they are also close to what the Pentagon and Iraqi government already were hoping to achieve. By contrast, the group's diplomatic strategy is sweeping -- and untethered to reality. ... Start with the supposition that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is somehow central to ending the chaos in Iraq. In fact, even if the two-state solution sought by the Bush administration were achieved, it's difficult to imagine how or why that would cause Sunnis and Shiites to cease their sectarian war in Baghdad or the Baathist-al Qaeda insurgency to stand down." In addition,

"Bashar al-Assad is very different from his father, Hafez, with whom Mr. Baker negotiated."

The New York Times (12/10, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes that the ISG report's recommendations 46, 72, and 78 "share one basic idea: Government officials should not lie to the public or each other, especially in matters of war. ... the fact that it had to be said, and so often, in the report goes a long way toward explaining how Mr. Bush got the country into the Iraq mess and why it is proving so hard to dig out of it." Recommendation 46 "calls on the new secretary of defense to create 'an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice' to civilian leaders"; recommendation 72 "says that "costs for the war in Iraq should be included in the president's annual budget request," and recommendation 78 "calls on the Pentagon and the intelligence community to 'institute immediate changes' in how they collect data on violence in Iraq 'to provide a more accurate picture of events on the ground.'"

Rumsfeld Makes Surprise Trip To Iraq. There was extensive television coverage of outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's surprise trip to Iraq, but little made its way into major newspapers. ABC World News (12/9, lead story, 2:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The Pentagon has always asked the media to keep Secretary Rumsfeld's prior visits under wraps until he arrives on the ground here in Iraq. But this time, they still haven't officially announced the visit. They're giving out very little information and no pictures. ... Iraqis we spoke with today about Rumsfeld's visit told us they blame him for the chaos so prevalent here." CNN (12/9, Robertson) had a similar report, saying that "it appears that even some very senior officials here don't even know Rumsfeld's whereabouts, and weren't aware that he had been in country. So that is an indication of the secretive nature of the mission. And obviously, security is a very, very big part of that. … But, perhaps here, the Secretary of Defense wanting to keep this mission a very low-profile one, keep it very private. Certainly the indications seem to be that it is a personal visit for him to thank personally the generals here, commanding the operations, to show his appreciation to the troops. Of course, it has been his decisions that have put so many lives on the line here and still on the line."

NBC Nightly News (12/9, lead story, 4:04, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) opened with "late word from the Pentagon" that Rumsfeld "is in Iraq as he prepares to leave office he made the trip to say goodbye to American troops. ... In a secret visit [outgoing] Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld is in Baghdad to say goodbye to the troops. None of his previous 12 trips, all of them unannounced, has ever seen security this tight." The CBS Evening News (12/9, story 3, 2:30, Assuras, 7.66M) said it "has confirmed that outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld today made a surprise visit to Iraq to say farewell and thank you to US troops."

The AP (12/10, Yost) reports Rumsfeld "made a surprise trip to Iraq Saturday, just days after a bipartisan commission called the situation there 'grave and deteriorating' and said the administration's policy wasn't working." Some of his remarks to "more than 1,200 soldiers and Marines at Al-Assad, a sprawling air base in Anbar province, the large area of western Iraq that is an insurgent stronghold," are quoted. His "15th trip to Iraq" comes after "an emotional farewell at the Pentagon." AFP (12/10) says "the outspoken defense secretary's visit coincided with more sectarian bloodshed in Iraq. A suspected Sunni suicide bomber on Saturday detonated his car near a revered Shiite shrine in the central city of Karbala, killing six civilians and wounding 47 more "

The New York Times (12/10, A30, Burns, 1.16M) reports in an article about ethnic cleansing in Baghdad that Rumsfeld "arrived in Baghdad on Saturday for what American military officials said was a farewell visit to the troops." The Washington Post (12/10, A24, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) reports in an article on the same ethnic cleansing episode that Rumsfeld "visited Iraq 'to express his appreciation to the troops,' said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman."

Shiites Rout Sunnis From Mixed Baghdad Neighborhood. The New York Times (12/10, A30, Burns, 1.16M) reports, "Bands of armed Shiite militiamen stormed through a neighborhood in north-central Baghdad on Saturday, driving hundreds of Sunni Arabs from their homes in what a Sunni colonel in the Iraqi Army described as one of the most flagrant episodes of sectarian warfare yet unleashed in the capital." The officer "said that more than 100 Sunni families, many with very young children, had left the Hurriya neighborhood aboard a convoy of trucks and cars under cover of the nightly curfew. Government officials tried to urge the families to return by promising army protection, but could not persuade them." The Times adds, "The role of American troops in the turmoil was unclear. The Sunni cleric, Sayed Muhammad, said appeals for assistance from the First Cavalry Division, its headquarters about three miles southwest of Hurriya, had gone unanswered. But Colonel Jabouri said Iraqi commanders had told the Americans there was no need for their help." Furthermore, "One of the striking features of the violence Saturday was that it occurred in an area that lies less than three miles northwest of the heavily guarded Green Zone compound."

The Washington Post (12/10, A24, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) reports, "By evening, dozens of Sunni Arab families had fled their homes, carrying their belongings and furniture in trucks in one of the worst known incidents of sectarian cleansing to grip the capital in recent weeks." The Post ironically notes that the neighborhood's name, Hurriyah, "means freedom." An anonymous Iraqi commander said that "the attack was apparently in retaliation for an attack on Shiite residents by Sunni gunmen."

More Violence Roils Iraq. NBC Nightly News (12/9, lead story, 4:04, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reports, "Sectarian violence crossed another red line today in Karbala, Iraq's second holiest Shiite city, south of Baghdad. A suicide car bomb struck a crowded market near a religious shrine. The blast killed at least five and left dozens dazed and wounded and set cars ablaze. While to the north, in Saladin province, Sunnis grieved the deaths of 18 of their own by a US airstrike Friday on their town." Maceda: "At the emotional funeral, locals shouted, 'Death to the occupiers' and reporters saw the wrapped bodies of at least seven children. But in a statement, the US military claimed the strike in fact killed 20 insurgents." Retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey, NBC military analyst: "We are fighting in urban areas. This is a disaster for the innocent population."

Iraqi Sunni Vice President Warns Of "Chaos" If US Leaves. NBC Nightly News (12/9, lead story, 4:04, Maceda, 9.87M), reported, "Meanwhile, despite mixed reviews in Baghdad, the highest ranking Sunni in the Iraqi government called the Iraq Study Group's recommendations practical and workable but warned against any rapid pullout of US combat troops." Tariq al-Hashimi, Iraqi vice president: "I think immediate withdrawal means Iraq is going to slide into chaos." Maceda: "With yet another mortar attack killing several and dozens of Sunni executions daily many Iraqis say the slide into chaos already happened. It is this kind of turmoil that in Iraq, at least, that has come to define Rumsfeld's tenure of Secretary of Defense. We understand he will be away, uncharacteristically, from any cameras, marking the end of his tour."

Saddam's Nephew Escapes From Prison. The AP (12/10, Wagner) reports Ayman Sabawi, a nephew of Saddam Hussein who is "serving a life sentence for financing insurgents and possessing bombs escaped from prison Saturday in northern Iraq with the help of a police officer." His escape "underlined one of the problems facing the U.S. military as it tries to train enough Iraqi security personnel so U.S. troops can go home: the ability of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militiamen to infiltrate Iraqi police forces." Sabawi's father, who remains in Iraqi custody, had led Saddam's intelligence services. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) also reports the escape, saying it "might have been an inside job" rather than stating so outright: "Authorities are investigating whether night-shift guards helped him escape."

Iran Willing To Discuss Stabilizing Iraq If US Promises Troop Withdrawal. The New York Times (12/10, A18, Fattah, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "Just days after the Iraq Study Group recommended opening a dialogue with Tehran, Iran's foreign minister said his country would enter discussions on stabilizing Iraq only if the United States commits to a troop withdrawal." Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said publicly that Tehran "was open to dialogue as long as the United States 'changes its attitude,' and he asserted that the Americans were '50 percent to blame' for Iraq's violence." He is quoted saying, "The United States should help itself before anyone else. The first step is they have to say that they will be ready to leave Iraq." The Times adds, "American officials at the meeting [where Mottaki spoke] doubted that Iran could improve the situation in Iraq, dismissing Mr. Mottaki's speech as posturing to put Iran's Arab neighbors at ease about the chances of a confrontation between Iran and the United States." In his remarks, Mottaki also "insisted that the United States stop campaigning against Iran's nuclear program."

The AP (12/10, Krane) says Mottaki "delivered a blunt challenge to the United States on Saturday, saying Tehran is willing to help U.S. troops withdraw from neighboring Iraq but only if Washington makes some tough policy changes." He "claimed U.S. troops were responsible for at least half the violence tearing apart Iraq and that their departure would pay security dividends for the entire region." The AP calls the "forceful" speech "a challenge to U.S. interests in the Gulf and a strong display of the country's rising assertiveness in the face of U.S failures in the region."

Syrian Ambassador To US Explains Nation's Motivations In Iraq. In an op-ed contribution to the Washington Post (12/10, 690K), Syrian ambassador to the US Imad Moustapha writes, "Let us be clear: Syria is not looking for a 'deal' with the U.S. administration on any issue. ... . A rigorous and comprehensive approach is required. This approach should include a reconsideration of U.S. policy in Iraq, starting with the recognition of the necessity to include all parties involved: neighboring countries and all factions of the Iraqi political and social spectrum. ... A solution should also include U.S. acknowledgment that the majority of Iraqis regard the occupation as only exacerbating the situation and causing further violence and instability. A U.S. plan for withdrawal should be on the table."

Training Iraqis Could Endanger US Forces. The Washington Post (12/10, A19, Pincus, 690K) reports that the current concept of "embedding 11- to 15-member U.S. transition teams in Iraqi battalions" is believed so dangerous "that a group of potential replacements stand ready at Fort Riley, the U.S. Army base directing the program, for immediate shipment to Iraq if members of a deployed team are killed or wounded, Maj. Gen. Carter F. Ham, who runs the training program, told House members last week." The "high-risk" teams, "made up of highly qualified senior commissioned and noncommissioned officers, have specialties that include combat operations, intelligence, communications and logistics." The Post quotes the ISG's criticism of "hesitant" early training efforts by the US, resulting in "Iraqi army units [that] are questionable loyalty to the Baghdad government." Furthermore, "police units cannot control crime, and some, according to the report, 'routinely engage in sectarian violence.' The facilities protection service is 'incompetent, dysfunctional or subversive.'"

Combat Troops' Pullout Would Leave Most US Forces In Iraq. The New York Times (12/10, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "On any given day, according to military officers in Baghdad, only about 11 percent of the Army and Marine Corps personnel in Iraq are carrying out purely offensive operations. ... an analysis of the current numbers and tasks of American forces suggests that it will prove difficult to drop far below 100,000 by early 2008, and that 70,000 or more troops might have to stay for a considerable time." The New York Times (12/10, 1.16M) includes a graphic showing only 229 combat troops out "of every 1,000 [personnel] deployed."

Prices For Black-Market Weapons Surge Amidst "Iraq Chaos." The New York Times (12/10, A1, Chivers, 1.16M) reports in a pessimistic article on the Iraqi black market, "Weapon prices are soaring along with an expanding sectarian war, as more buyers push prices several times higher than those that existed at the time of the American-led invasion nearly four years ago. Rising prices, in turn, have encouraged an insidious form of Iraqi corruption -- the migration of army and police weapons from Iraqi state armories to black-market sales." A change since the US-led invasion is that "three types of American-issued weapons are now readily visible in shops and bazaars here as well: Glock and Walther 9-millimeter pistols, and pristine, unused Kalashnikovs from post-Soviet Eastern European countries."

Bereaved Military Families Divided On Iraq. ABC World News (12/9, story 7, 2:55, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "This split is deeply personal. It is the divide among parents whose children went to fight in Iraq and died there." ABC (Hendren): "Each day in Iraq, on average, two Americans are killed, most by roadside bombs. While the families of the fallen are joined in grief; they are deeply divided over calls to pull troops out of Iraq. ... Matthew Holley's father fears that if an American pullout leads to an all-out civil war, the death of his son only son will have served no purpose." Celeste Zappala: "The longer we stay, the more dead Americans there are." The Washington Post (12/10, A3, Davenport, Partlow, 690K) reports in an article hinting at falling support for the war, "As the country debates what's next for Iraq, many family members who have lost loved ones in the war are torn about what should happen and how the legacy of those who have died there will be affected. ... When the war began nearly four years ago, there was virtually unanimous support for it among military families. But as the country's belief in it has deteriorated, cracks have also begun to show among those who were its staunchest backers." Bereaved mothers are quoted expressing both points of view on the war.

NBC Profiles Marine, Remembers Fallen Soldier. NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 8, 2:04, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "We have an extraordinary look at what if is really like how one man is reacting to what he has seen and done there. He went to Iraq armed with a rifle and video camera. His story in his own words." Matthew Orth, former Marine:

"My name is Matthew Orth. I am 22 years old and until recently I was a highly trained weapon of the United States Marine Corps. They called me a Scout Sniper. ... I felt very alone and scared because people don't understand what we go through over there. They expect to us come back the same people we were and we are not."

NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 12, 2:22, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) also reported, "We remember a soldier that made the ultimate sacrifice in Iraq. Donovan Watts spent more than half his life serving his country and changed the lives of countless young soldiers along the way. Today they gathered to honor him." NBC (Martin Savage): "You expect good things to be said about a soldier that dies for his country, but in this case of Command Sgt. Maj. Donovan Watts, it was how many that wanted to say them." Siegenthaler: "Just one of the more than 2,900 American stories that have ended in Iraq. We honor them all."

Commentators Turn Focus To Iraq. Today's op-ed pages are filled with reaction to the ISG report and the Bush Administration's Iraq policy. In a scathing New York Times (12/10, WK12, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich writes, "Its recommendations are bogus because the few that have any teeth are completely unattainable. Of course, it would be fantastic if additional Iraqi troops would stand up en masse after an infusion of new American military advisers. ... It would also be nice if we could all break the bank in Vegas. ... the Iraq Study Group isn't plotting a way forward but delaying the recognition of our defeat. Its real aim is to enact a charade of progress to pacify the public while Washington waits, no doubt in vain, for Mr. Bush to return to the real world." Rich warns that the lesson of Vietnam is that "As bad as things may seem now, they can yet become worse, and not just in Iraq. The longer we pretend that we have not lost there, the more we risk losing other wars we still may salvage, starting with Afghanistan."

In his Washington Post (12/10, 690K) column, David Broder writes that the ISG differs from President Bush and Prime Minister Blair on Iraq's problems: "Bush wants to step up the training and assistance for the nascent Iraqi army. The Iraq Study Group would offer more help -- economic, military and diplomatic -- only if the government in Baghdad began soon to repair its factional fights. ... one thing is clear. As Baker and Hamilton say, there is no other bipartisan blueprint for the future. Bush will reject it at his peril."

In his Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait likens President Bush to a boy in a "Twilight Zone" episode who "has fantastical powers. ... the adults around him can do nothing but cheerfully praise his decisions while they try to nudge him in a less destructive direction."

In his New York Times (12/10, WK12, 1.16M) column, David Brooks imagines the Middle East in 2007 after the US begins withdrawals from Iraq: "The essence of all this disorder was that the Arab nation-states lost control. Subnational groups — like Hezbollah and the Mahdi Army — and supranational groups — like loosely connected terror networks, the new Sunni and Shiite Leagues and the satellite television networks — went from strength to strength while central national governments toppled and fell. The collapse of national governments led to a power vacuum that the more authentic and deeply rooted social groups sought to fill. ... The spreading disorder vindicated an observation that the historian Michael Oren had once made: that there are really only three nations in the Muslim Middle East: Iran, Turkey and Egypt. The other nations are make-believe."

In his Washington Post (12/10, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland writes, "President Bush has finally heard some realistic, even brutal, ideas about finding a path out of Iraq. But few of them came from the politically interesting but strategically flawed Iraq Study Group's report. ... The most important event was the least conspicuous one," namely, "a visit to the White House on Monday by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the single most powerful Shiite political leader in Iraq. ... on Iraq, the study group repeats the fundamental error that this administration has made since overthrowing Saddam Hussein. That is to refuse to anticipate and then accept the logical -- in fact, inescapable -- consequences of U.S. actions."

In his column for the Washington Post (12/10, B7, 690K), Robert Kagan writes of the "very old debate" in America between an "expansive, idealistic, interventionist approach to the world" and "opposition to this grand vision." Kagan concludes, "The problem for those who have tried to steer the United States away from its long history of expansiveness, then and now, is that Americans' belief in the possibility of global transformation -- the 'messianic' impulse -- is and always has been the more dominant strain in the nation's character. It is rooted in the nation's founding principles and is the hearty offspring of the marriage between Americans' driving ambitions and their overpowering sense of righteousness."

In the New York Times (12/10, WK1, 1.16M) "Week In Review" section, the Times' Roger Cohen states, "It's hard to escape the conclusion that the [ISG] report treats Iraq as an existing country needing a quick fix in the name of resurgent American realism, rather than a still-to-be-born country that needs to be ushered into being in the name of American idealism." Despite the lack of national identity demonstrated by Shiite-dominated Iraqi forces, Cohen warns, "Iraq has to survive, not because it's lovely, or within sight of peace, but because it's the least bad solution. Its breakup would entail unfathomable horror:"

In the Washington Post (12/10, B1, 690K), scholar David Rothkopf writes, "The best we can hope for is an end to only this latest chapter of U.S. military involvement in the region. There is no getting out of the Middle East. Even if we leave now, we'll be back." Calling the Iraq war "Gulf War II," Rothkopf adds, "The Vietnam War offers an important lesson, as well as an important distinction. The lesson is that leaving a country is often much more complicated than entering it." Rothkopf warns of possible causes of a Gulf War III: "Clearly, the confrontation with Iran -- over its regional policies, support of terrorists and desire to acquire nuclear weapons -- tops the list. ... What if Jordan, Pakistan or Saudi Arabia fell into fundamentalist hands?"

In the New York Times Magazine (12/10)'s "The Way We Live Now" department, contributing writer James Traub observes, "Scholars and diplomats who have closely studied civil wars describe them almost as forces of nature, grinding on until the parties exhaust themselves, shredding bonds that cannot be stitched back together even long years after the killing stops. ... And you generally can't stop it either, as we are now learning in Iraq."

On a single page in today's "Week In Review" section, the New York Times (12/10, WK13, 1.16M) runs 12 brief op-eds on the Iraq Study Group report, each between 150 and 250 words in length.

Richard Perle of the American Enterprise Institute says "not a shred of evidence" is offered to support the ISG's claims that "Iran and Syria have an 'interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq,'" and that the report lacks "any serious reflection on the president's goal of encouraging the development of representative government in the despotic Arab world." And author and professor Fouad Ajami says "James Baker and Lee Hamilton would take us back to the past, for they are men of the past. … A 'wise man' who proposes to fix Iraq by returning the Golan Heights to Syria has missed the meaning of Iraq. This report describes a long-vanished Arab world: Its poverty is given away in its banal language, in that familiar assertion that all of history yields to the fixer's touch." Josef Joffe of Germany's Die Zeit says the "suggestion to 'engage' Iran and Syria to extricate the United States from the current Iraqi morass reflects a grievous misreading of those nations' ambitions and America's options." However, ex-British Special Representative to Iraq Jeremy Greenstock says "we cannot turn things around in Iraq without involving the entire region. Iran would be foolish to risk the emergence of a new autocracy in Iraq. Syria, only a secondary player in Iraq, has other priorities: the return of the Golan Heights within a decade."

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright says that "in the spirit" of the ISG recommendations, the Bush Administration "should make clear to Muslims throughout the Middle East that America will not take sides in the millennium-old Sunni-Shiite split." Council on Foreign Relations President Emeritus Leslie Gelb says the report, "for all its deftness and honesty…flees the hardest choices and leaves us without a credible strategy." Rory Stewart, a former British Foreign Service officer in Iraq, says the report "is refreshingly honest in its description of Iraq. But its recommendations are less reliable and in some cases dangerous," especially in saying a less successful Iraqi government should receive less outside support.

Ex-Assistant Secretary of Defense Bing West says that the ISG's calls for an "infusion of 20,000 advisers" may help "hold the country together," but Iraq's "police are in wretched shape, intimidated and poorly led," and Iraqi soldiers "trust American advisers more than their own government." But Andrew Exum, who led an Army Rangers platoon in Iraq, says "to increase the number of advisers while simultaneously decreasing the number of combat brigades is a recipe for disaster. The adviser teams embedded with Iraqi units will become increasingly vulnerable, and a smaller force left behind in Iraq will find itself called upon to fight the inevitable worsening of violence with far fewer troops." University of Chicago political scientist Robert Pape says a "large fraction of all American forces" should be moved "into staging areas outside Baghdad so that, within hours, tremendous air and ground power could suppress any major escalation in attacks against civilians. Over the next year, American ground troops should gradually pull back and their mission should evolve into a longer term, off-shore balancing strategy using naval and air forces and allies."

The Hoover Institution's Larry Diamond says "if we press all the components of the study group's approach to 'national reconciliation' -- like amnesty, a rollback of de-Baathification and a new bargain on oil and federalism -- while renouncing permanent military bases and clearly signaling our intent to withdraw militarily from Iraq over the next few years, it is possible that a deal can be had with a critical mass of the insurgency." However, Nathaniel Fick, a Marine infantry officer in Iraq and Afghanistan, says amnesty "must be offered only after United States forces have shifted their priority from conventional operations to an advisory role. It cannot occur with 141,000 potential targets in Iraq." It must also "forgive only past attacks, and cannot appear to sanction or legitimize future ones," and apply "only to Iraqis. Foreign fighters, with no legal standing in Iraq, cannot be eligible."

Taliban Establishes Rules Targeting Teachers. The AP (12/9, Straziuso) reports that Taliban rules stipulate: "Teachers receive a warning, then a beating, and if they continue to teach must be killed. ... The new list of 30 rules, decided on during a high Taliban meeting in September or October and since circulated over the Internet, span from the organizational ... to the health conscious." Rule no. 25 "says teachers who ignore Taliban warnings will be killed."

Senate Confirms Paulose As Minnesota US Attorney. The AP (12/10) reports, "The U.S. Senate unanimously confirmed Rachel Paulose as the U.S. Attorney for Minnesota early Saturday." The AP continues, "The 33-year-old Paulose, of Eagan, had been acting U.S. attorney for about nine months. President Bush nominated her for the permanent job about four months ago." The AP adds, "Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said in a news release that he urged the Senate Judiciary Committee to allow full a Senate vote on Paulose before the Senate adjourned early Saturday. … Paulose met Wednesday with outgoing Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minn., and got his support. However, it appeared that the Senate session would end before it took up her confirmation. … 'It would have been a shame to see such a capable, experienced nominee fail to get a chance for confirmation, and I am very excited we were able to get her nomination through the Senate before adjournment,' Coleman said a news release." The AP notes, "Paulose was a federal prosecutor in Minnesota from 1999 to 2002 and then worked in private practice for the Dorsey & Whitney law firm in Minneapolis. … Before 1999, she worked in the Justice Department as an attorney general's honors program trial attorney for the Civil Rights Division."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Rent-Way Head Comes Clean With SEC About Accounting Scandal. The New York Times (12/10, Duhigg) reports, "Near midnight on a Friday in 2000, William E. Morgenstern, the chief executive of Rent-Way, one of the nation's largest rent-to-own retailers, was preparing for bed when a woman called to warn him that the company he had built from scratch was about to fall apart." The Times continues, "In the days before that call, Mr. Morgenstern had been scrambling to reconcile discrepancies he had discovered in Rent-Way's books. He had much at stake. Since its founding in 1981 in Erie, Pa., Rent-Way had grown into a national powerhouse by renting furniture and electronics to low-income consumers through more than 1,100 stores. .. .The stock price had tripled since its initial offering in 1993, making Mr. Morgenstern a Wall Street darling and propelling dozens of Erie families who had invested in the company to sudden wealth." The Times adds, "When he discovered the accounting problems, Mr. Morgenstern initially hoped for a quick explanation. But interviews with executives led to more questions. Then came the midnight phone call: a weeping employee told him that for three years Mr. Morgenstern's top deputies had forced her to cook Rent-Way's books. .. .Mr. Morgenstern then called the company's lawyer in a panic. What, he asked, should they do? … Over the following years, similar dilemmas would arise at Enron, WorldCom, Tyco and dozens of other companies. Today, hundreds of executives are anxiously discussing how hard they should look for evidence of options backdating or other accounting problems." The Times notes, "At companies where far lesser frauds or malfeasance emerge, executives face an even more ticklish quandary: Should they reveal everything, and then confront the hazards of bad publicity and outside investigations, or clean things up and hope that the problems will evaporate unnoticed? Rent-Way's own journey, which came to a head last month, offers a chilling lesson: Even the most virtuous decisions have unforeseen, often damaging, consequences, and full disclosure may create as many problems as it solves. …

DOJ_NMG_0104601

Rent-Way's board made a decision within days of detecting the fraud — Mr. Morgenstern called the Securities and Exchange Commission and revealed everything. The company would turn over documents typically protected by attorney-client privilege, he said. He then invited the S.E.C. to set up an office at Rent-Way's headquarters to conduct an on-site investigation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Releases 2005 Statistics On Death Row Population And Executions. The AP (12/9) reports, "Fewer prison inmates were moved to death row in 2005, according to a federal study that shows one more person was executed than in the year before. Four states — California, Texas, Florida and Pennsylvania — held half of the 3,254 inmates awaiting execution at the end of 2005, the study by the Bureau of Justice Statistics showed. There were 37 death row inmates in federal prisons at that time. Sixteen states executed 60 prisoners last year, one more inmate than in 2004. Overall, however, the number of inmates on death row on Dec. 31, 2005, or the number of inmates moved there during the year dipped."

Virginia Enlists Volunteers To Witness Executions. The Washington Post (12/10, A1, Rondeaux, 690K) reports, "It's been 70 years since executions in the United States were open to the public. But in Virginia, there is always someone watching, turning what is for most people a distinctly private moment into a very public end. One of more than a dozen death penalty states that require ordinary citizens to witness executions, Virginia has enlisted hundreds of volunteers for the task. … For nearly 100 years, broad public support for capital punishment has helped the Virginia Department of Corrections maintain a rotating list of about 20 to 30 volunteers, although only six are required to witness each execution."

Alaskan Tribes Worried That DNA Research Could Threaten Land Rights, Beliefs. The New York Times (12/10, Harmon) reports from South Naknek, Alaska, "The National Geographic Society's multimillion-dollar research project to collect DNA from indigenous groups around the world in the hopes of reconstructing humanity's ancient migrations has come to a standstill on its home turf in North America." The Times continues, "Billed as the 'moon shot of anthropology,' the Genographic Project intends to collect 100,000 indigenous DNA samples. But for four months, the project has been on hold here as it scrambles to address questions raised by a group that oversees research involving Alaska natives." The Times adds, "At issue is whether scientists who need DNA from aboriginal populations to fashion a window on the past are underselling the risks to present-day donors. Geographic origin stories told by DNA can clash with long-held beliefs, threatening a world view some indigenous leaders see as vital to preserving their culture. … They argue that genetic ancestry information could also jeopardize land rights and other benefits that are based on the notion that their people have lived in a place since the beginning of time." The Times notes, "Such situations have not come up, and officials with the Genographic Project discount them as unlikely. Spencer Wells, the population geneticist who directs the project, says it is paternalistic to imply that indigenous groups need to be kept from the knowledge that genetics might offer. … But indigenous leaders point to centuries of broken promises to explain why they believe their fears are not far-fetched. Scientific evidence that American Indians or other aboriginal groups came from elsewhere, they say, could undermine their moral basis for sovereignty and chip away at their collective legal claims."

Alaska Corruption Probe Widens. The Anchorage Daily News (12/10, Mauer) reports, "The director of a Juneau-based salmon fishing group said last week he has been ordered by a federal grand jury investigating Alaska corruption to turn over lobbying and consulting records involving state Senate President Ben Stevens and former congressional aide Trevor McCabe, an Anchorage lawyer." The News continues, "The grand jury subpoena, issued last month, also seeks records on the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, a nonprofit federal-grant distribution corporation set up by Ben Stevens' father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. … The executive director of the Juneau salmon group responding to the subpoena, Robert Thorstenson Jr., serves on the marketing board. Thorstenson said he and a partner, Juneau and Seattle lawyer Rob Zuanich, rent space to the board for its Juneau office." The News adds, "In a telephone interview Thursday from Seattle, Thorstenson said the subpoena to Southeast Alaska Seiners Association arrived last month after he was contacted by agents from the FBI and the National Marine Fisheries Service. The subpoena said the grand jury was investigating felony crimes, Thorstenson said. … The subpoena appears to document a widening of the federal corruption investigation in Alaska, which burst into public view in August with dramatic raids of the offices of six legislators, including Ben Stevens. Agents returned to search Stevens' offices Sept. 18." The News notes, "On Wednesday, a federal grand jury indicted Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, on seven counts charging extortion, bribery, conspiracy and money laundering. The charges describe a scheme in which money was allegedly funneled to Anderson through a shell company in 2004 in exchange for actions he took as a legislator to benefit a private prison company. He pleaded not guilty Friday. … In the August legislative office searches, subpoenas and search warrants indicated the government's focus was on the relationships between legislators, oil and gas legislation, and the politically active oil field service and construction company Veco and its chairman, Bill Allen."

Lawmakers Not Surprised By Anderson's Arrest. The Anchorage Daily News (12/10, Hopkins) reported, "Other state legislators said Friday that they weren't surprised by state Rep. Tom Anderson's arrest this week -- his name had been grinding through the capital rumor mill ever since the FBI raided legislative offices weeks ago -- and many said they wouldn't be surprised if there are more indictments to come. … 'It could go beyond Tom. There's an expectation that that could be true,' said North Pole Rep. John Coghill, who is House majority leader. 'You don't have the FBI come looking around without some ramification.'" However, legislators and Gov. Sarah Palin "were quick to say that Anderson is innocent until proven guilty."

Faith-Based Prison Programs Proliferate Despite Adverse Rulings. The New York Times (12/10, A1, Henriques, Lehren, 1.16M), in an front-page article titled, "Religion For A Captive Audience, Paid For By Taxes," reports, "Life was different in Unit E at the state prison outside Newton, Iowa.. … There were occasional movies and events with live bands and real-world food. Best of all, there were opportunities to see loved ones in an environment quieter and more intimate than the typical visiting rooms. But the only way an inmate could qualify for this kinder mutation of prison life was to enter an intensely religious rehabilitation program and satisfy the evangelical Christians running it that he was making acceptable spiritual progress. The program — which grew from a project started in 1997 at a Texas prison with the support of George W. Bush, who was governor at the time — says on its Web site that it seeks 'to 'cure' prisoners by identifying sin as the root of their problems' and showing inmates 'how God can heal them permanently, if they turn from their sinful past.'" The Times adds that for Robert W. Pratt, chief judge of the federal courts in the Southern District of Iowa, "this all added up to an unconstitutional use of taxpayer money for religious indoctrination, as he ruled in June in a lawsuit challenging the arrangement." The Times notes that since 2000, courts "have cited more than a dozen programs for having unconstitutionally used taxpayer money to pay for religious activities or evangelism aimed at prisoners, recovering addicts, job seekers, teenagers and children. Nevertheless, the programs are proliferating. … But some constitutional lawyers say new federal rules may bar the government from imposing any special requirements for how faith-based programs are audited."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Missing Florida Baby Was Kidnapped By Coyotes For Ransom. The Naples Daily News (12/10, Batista) reported that "baby Bryan Dos Santos Gomes apparently was not kidnapped by a woman seeking to replace her child but as ransom to force the parents to pay the 'coyote' who smuggled them into the United States. … Police say the parents fell behind in their payments to the smugglers and that Bryan is being held as ransom. They said they believe the 1-month-old infant is still being taken care of." The Daily News noted, "The information came from various tips called in to the police department."

US Steel Industry Attracting Foreign Bids. The Baltimore Sun (12/10, Connolly) reports, "Five years ago, there would have been few takers for the steel plants in Sparrows Point and Weirton, W.Va. … Bethlehem Steel Corp., which owned Sparrows Point at the time and was once the largest steelmaker in the world, was in its death throes, joining the list of Rust Belt companies that buckled under the weight of high costs and fierce competition. … But if either plant goes up for sale early next year, there could be multiple bids for each. And there's a good chance the buyer won't be American." The Sun continues, "After years of bankruptcy and rampant consolidation, American steel is suddenly hot.

Foreign companies have the cash, and are looking to get a foothold in the American market, where they can charge a premium for their product. … It started with Mittal Steel Co. NV chief executive Lakshmi N. Mittal's quest to build the largest steelmaker in the world. Two years ago, he bought International Steel Group, which itself had been built on the carcasses of defunct companies, including Bethlehem's Sparrows Point complex and Weirton. This year, Netherlands-based Mittal successfully waged a hostile takeover of the world's second-largest steel company, Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA. … The combined company, Arcelor Mittal, will control 10 percent of the world's steel production, with more than 110 million tons this year. The $33.5 billion deal, which is expected to be completed in the spring, is the largest to date." The Sun notes, "Following Mittal's lead, steel companies from Europe, Russia, South America and Asia in recent weeks have been circling U.S. companies. … In the past, foreigners stayed away from American companies because they had higher costs and unionized work forces. … But now, after an industry shakeout, American steel companies are more efficient than ever. For example, Sparrows Point's nearly 2,500 workers produce 3 million tons of steel a year. That's more output per worker than in 1969, when 26,500 workers produced 5 million tons a year. … And, many no longer carry 'legacy costs,' having shed their health care and pension obligations for retirees during bankruptcy, as was the case with Bethlehem Steel."

EU Launches Antitrust Probe Of Universal-BMG Deal. The AP (12/10, White) reports, "EU regulators have opened an antitrust probe of Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for about $2.1 billion, saying the deal could damage 'the already concentrated music publishing market.'" The AP continues, "Officials in Brussels said Friday that they would issue a final decision about whether to block or allow the deal by April 27." The AP adds, "BMG - owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG - has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers. … Paris-based Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group is the world's largest music company. Its publishing arm controls the rights to songs by artists such as 50 Cent, Mary J. Blige and Chamillionaire." The AP notes, "If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs, giving them a 22 percent market share and scraping ahead of current market leader EMI. … European Union approval was the last hurdle for the deal, which the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department in the United States cleared last month. … The EU rarely blocks deals, but it can, and often does, demand that companies under investigation sell units or make binding promises to change the way they do business."

Future Of Delta-US Air Merger Unclear. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/10, Hirschman) reports, "A marriage of Delta Air Lines and US Airways would be a setback for Augusta, say business and civic leaders who fear putting all local airline service in the hands of a single carrier. … 'Limited competition is better than no competition,' said Diane Johnson, marketing director at Augusta Regional Airport. 'When you have no competition, fares rise and reliability goes down the tubes.'" The AJC continues, "Augusta, along with Fayetteville, Wilmington and Jacksonville, N.C.; Lynchburg, Va.; Wilmington, Del., and Florence, S.C., could go from two airlines to one if US Airways succeeds in its $8.4 billion bid to acquire Delta. … Augusta, a historic city on the South Carolina border, has five daily flights to Atlanta on a Delta regional partner and six to Charlotte on US Airways Express." The AJC adds, "US Airways plans a 10 percent capacity cut and $1.6 billion in annual savings if it gets creditor and regulatory approval to merge the airlines, but it hasn't identified which routes, if any, will be cut. Industry officials say there would be little reason for the combined airline to operate two Southeastern hubs, however, and Charlotte flights could shrink dramatically. .. .Even if Augusta routes were maintained, business leaders there say the absence of competition would allow the airline to raise fares with impunity — a move they say would push Augusta residents to drive to airports in Columbia or Atlanta."

The Arizona Daily Star (12/10, Hogan) reports, "If Tempe-based US Airways is successful in executing its proposed $8.7 billion hostile takeover of bankrupt Delta Air Lines, it will become the largest U.S. airline and one of the biggest in the world. … It's a big 'if.'" The Star continues, "Delta, first of all, doesn't want to be acquired — at least its chief executive officer and its pilots don't. Its creditors — at least the biggest ones — haven't weighed in yet. … And we haven't yet heard from U.S. regulators, US Airways shareholders and politicians, who together or separately can make or break the deal." The Star adds, "While US Airways Chairman Doug Parker stunned everyone from Wall Street analysts to Delta officials when he announced the proposed merger Nov. 15, the company had clearly been plotting it for some time. … Parker had already lined up financial backing and answers for all the concerns. And once the news was out, he quickly tried to line up supporters among those who have a stake, if not a say, in whether the merger happens. … There is no consensus about whether the merger could happen or should happen, but most agree on the big issues that need to be addressed: antitrust concerns; employees and jobs; financing; headquarters and air hubs; and any impact on passengers."

Reid Worked To Quash Dairy That Provided Cheap Milk In Southwest. The Washington Post (12/10, Morgan, Cohen, Gaul, 690K) reports on its front page that in 2003, a "maverick dairyman," Hein Hettinga, "started bottling his own milk and selling it for as much as 20 cents a gallon less than the competition, exercising his right to work outside the rigid system that has controlled U.S. milk production for almost 70 years. … That was when a coalition of giant milk companies and dairies, along with their congressional allies, decided to crush Hettinga's initiative. For three years, the milk lobby spent millions of dollars…and made deals with lawmakers, including incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid. Last March, Congress passed a law reshaping the Western milk market and essentially ending Hettinga's experiment -- all without a single congressional hearing." According to the Post, Reid "made his move on Dec. 16 [2205], with the Senate chamber nearly empty. He brought up the milk bill, which passed a few minutes later by 'unanimous consent,' a procedure that requires no debate or roll call vote if both political parties agree."

Local Governments Take Initiative On Anti-Global Warming Measures. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, A1, Simon, 850K) reports, "Frustrated with the federal response to global warming, hundreds of cities, suburbs and rural communities across the nation have taken bold steps to slash their energy consumption and reduce emissions of the pollutants that cause climate change. … The movement began nearly two years ago, when Seattle Mayor Greg Nickels announced that his city would strive to meet the targets of the Kyoto Protocol." President Bush "rejected the goals of the Kyoto treaty soon after he took office, calling it ineffective and unfair. … Determined to prove him wrong, Nickels challenged his fellow mayors to adopt Kyoto's targets at the local level. He has received more than 330 pledges from mayors representing 54 million people. All have vowed to reduce their cities' emissions below 1990 levels within the next several years."

WPost Welcomes Inhofe's Ouster From Environment Committee Chair. The Washington Post (12/10, B6, 690K) editorializes, "the last hearing on global climate change chaired by Sen. James M. Inhofe provided an excellent and public tutorial on why Americans should be grateful that it was, in fact, his last. … He has used his time at the committee's helm to cast spurious doubts on the problem even as the scientific consensus about its reality and severity has gelled."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Trentadue Continues Quest To Prove Neo-Nazis Conspired With McVeigh. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Chicago Tribune (12/10, Witt) reported, "Another envelope from the FBI landed in Jesse Trentadue's mailbox last week, bearing a copy of another secret memo from the FBI's investigation into the Oklahoma City bombing more than a decade ago. Like thousands of other pages that the Salt Lake City lawyer has extracted from the government over the years via a series of lawsuits and Freedom of Information Act requests, this latest document was heavily censored to obscure the names of most suspects and informants. But a few key words stood out among all the ones that had been covered over: 'Aryan Nations' and 'explosives' and 'bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building.' By itself, the three-page document was no smoking gun. But read alongside all the others that overflow Trentadue's file cabinets, the FBI memo was another small piece of a puzzle he has been doggedly trying to solve: whether neo-Nazi conspirators helped Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols…and whether federal government agents failed to heed warnings of the scheme." Trentadue told the Tribune, "The FBI had informants in these groups all over the country. So they knew more than they have ever said about McVeigh and the bank robbers and who else may have been involved in the Oklahoma City bombing."

IMMIGRATION:

Localities Struggling With Influx Of Illegal Immigrants. The Newark Star-Ledger (NJ) (12/10, Donohue) reports, "With Congress deadlocked over how to handle illegal immigration, a growing number of towns and cities are taking matters into their own hands, using local laws to crack down on the problems associated with a massive underground population." The Star-Ledger continues, "In New Jersey, some towns have toughened traffic laws to deter contractors from picking up day laborers on city streets. Others have tried to ban workers from gathering on street corners to wait for work. Several have launched housing code crackdowns to combat overcrowding. One has banned illegal immigrants from renting apartments altogether. … And few, if any, are having much success." The Star Ledger adds, "In a growing number of towns, local crackdowns are faltering amid court challenges, political opposition or other hurdles. … Consider: … The Borough of Bound Brook launched a series of housing raids to address rampant overcrowding in homes rented mostly by Latino immigrants in the late 1990s. But the U.S. Justice Department sued the town for illegally targeting Hispanics, resulting in a 2004 consent decree requiring the town to repay victims $425,000, hire a bilingual housing coordinator and make dramatic changes to its housing and zoning practices. … Freehold Borough's housing crackdown and an effort to shut down a day laborer gathering area were challenged in a lawsuit filed by immigrant rights groups. In a settlement last month, the borough agreed to pay $278,000, change its housing inspection procedures and allow laborers to gather on public property. … In July, the Township of Riverside in Burlington County passed a law fining employers and landlords who hire or rent apartments to illegal immigrants. In local elections last month, the Republican mayor and council member who pushed the measure were swept from office. With legal fees mounting from a pair of lawsuits challenging the law, Mayor Charles Hilton -- the man who proposed the law -- is calling for its repeal."

Mexico's Low Wages Blamed For Spurring Wave Of Immigrants. The Arizona Republic (12/10, Hawley) reports, "Welcome to a typical life in Mexico: a world of long hours, low pay and prices that are much higher than in the United States. It is those economic pressures that drive Mexicans to the United States and that lie at the heart of the illegal immigration problem. Mexicans do not come to the United States because they can't find jobs at home. In fact, unemployment in Mexico is currently lower than in the United States, at about 3.6 percent. Some 95 percent of newly arrived Mexican migrants had jobs before they came to the United States, according to a 2005 survey by the Pew Hispanic Center. But in Mexico, having a job does not necessarily mean being paid well or even being paid well enough to make ends meet. The average Mexican household earns $7,297 a year in wages, according to the government. But because 39 percent of Mexico's wealth is concentrated in 10 percent of the population, most people actually earn less than the national average. In fact, 82 percent of Mexicans earn less than $21 per workday."

Irish Illegals' Amnesty Demand Noted. In his New York Times (12/10, WK11, 1.16M) column, Lawrence Downes writes, "To roars and applause" Sen. Charles Schumer "swept into the packed church auditorium, levitating on a cloud of affection. … This happy moment was a rally by Irish immigrants. … 'The more Irish there are in America, the better we all are!' Mr. Schumer declared, repeating a line he had caught some flak about a few months before. Some non-Irish immigrants had grumbled about how unlikely it would be to hear another group's name tucked into that equation." Downes adds, "'We Are America' is the Latinos' and Asians' cry. The well-organized Irish don't feel the need to say that. Their slogan, on T-shirts and the Irish Lobby's Web site, is blunt: 'Legalize the Irish.' The Irish have a just cause, but I only wish they and their many friends would preach the gospel of immigration reform in a bigger tent. It is, after all, every immigrant group's fate to start out in this country unloved, as the Irish are only too eager to remind us."

TAX:

LATimes Blames TurboTax Lobbyists For ReadyReturn's Demise. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K) editorializes, "State number-crunchers are going to go over your tax return anyway, calculating whether you sent in too much or too little. What if they did their figuring beforehand and sent you a return already completed except for your signature? If you don't like what they came up with, or you don't trust them, you can throw it out and file the old-fashioned way, no questions asked. But if you have relatively simple finances and the state's calculation looks right to you, you could take advantage of ReadyReturn, a service of the Franchise Tax Board. … The Legislature killed the pilot program this year after intense pressure from Intuit Inc., maker of TurboTax, and other companies selling tax-preparation software and services. Thanks to them, there will be no ReadyReturn for the 2006 tax year."

DOJ_NMG_0104606

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Leahy Signals Increased Oversight Of DOJ. The Rutland (VT) Herald (12/10, Allen) reports, "Sen. Patrick Leahy is about to begin his 33rd year as the only Democrat to represent Vermont in the U.S. Senate, but it might as well be his first." The Herald continues, "Even after a long day in the halls of Congress, Leahy couldn't contain his excitement over returning to work in a chamber dominated, for the fourth time in his career, by his party. … 'I see the Senate getting back to where it's supposed to be – the conscience of the nation,' Leahy said in a phone interview. 'The nation has not been helped by being a rubber stamp.'" The Herald adds, "Leahy, other Democrats and some stalwarts of the GOP have accused the Republican-controlled 109th Congress of being a rubber stamp for the president's agenda, ultimately allowing Bush to run afoul of the Constitution with impunity. .. But even under these circumstances, the Vermont senator has commanded power and attention. And that's due in part to his longevity in office. Leahy, a former Chittenden County prosecutor, won the 1974 election at age 34 and became the youngest Vermonter and the only member of his party ever elected to the U.S. Senate. Over the years, he has been a member of the minority periodically, from 1981 to 1987, again from 1995 to 2001, then from 2003 until last week. … Leahy is seventh on the Senate's seniority list, and he is considered to be among the top 10 most influential people on Capitol Hill. … And he's about to become more powerful. When Congress meets next month, Leahy will – for the second time – become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where he will control the flow and tenor of hearings over matters ranging from federal judicial appointments to oversight of the FBI and the Justice Department." The Herald notes, "Leahy hasn't officially laid out his agenda for the next two years, but anyone paying attention to last week's Judiciary Committee hearing on FBI oversight would be hard pressed to have missed where the senator is going. … 'The recent revelation that the Bush administration, since 9/11, has been compiling secret dossiers on millions of unwitting, law-abiding Americans who travel across our borders, highlights the importance of congressional oversight,' he said. 'It is simply incredible that the administration is willing to share this sensitive information with foreign governments and even private employers, while refusing to allow U.S. citizens to see or challenge the so-called terror score that the government has assigned them based on their travel habits and schedules. … This administration has gone to unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public, while at the same time collecting and compiling unprecedented amounts of information about every citizen.'"

Republican Control Of Congress Comes To An End After All-Night Session. The final hours of the 109th Congress, and of a dozen years of Republican control of the House, was covered by all three broadcast networks. In a brief report, ABC World News (12/9, story 3, 0:20, Weir, 8.78M) said the "109th Congress has been gaveled into history in their final hours under Republican control. The House and Senate worked practically all night, voting to extend $38 billion in tax breaks. But they left plenty of unfinished business for next month when the Democrats take over." NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 10, 0:24, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) also had a brief report, saying "the 109th Congress wrapped up with a flurry of votes" including the tax breaks and expanded Gulf of Mexico oil drilling.

The CBS Evening News (12/9, story 2, 2:20, Assuras, 7.66M) ran a longer, and more critical report, saying the "Republican-controlled 109th Congress adjourned early this morning without completing work on a new federal budget. Added together, the number of days the two Houses sat this year came to 235. That is fewer days than the do-nothing Congress that President Harry Truman ran against in 1948." The AP (12/9) says the session, "frustrated by partisanship and criticized for its meager record of accomplishment, ended with flurry of bill-passing and promises of change when Democrats take over the House and Senate in January."

The Washington Post (12/10, Weisman, 690K) says on its front page that "demoralized Republicans adjourned the 109th Congress at 5 a.m. yesterday with a near-empty Capitol, closing the door on a dozen years of nearly unbroken GOP control by spending more time in the final days lamenting their failures -- to rein in government, tame the deficit and temper their own lust for power -- than reliving their successes." The GOP "capped an era of conservative ascendance with the passage of business tax break extensions, a package of trade measures, and legislation to stave off physician-payment cuts they once trumpeted in their budget-cutting drive." The Post says that "measured against the ambitions of 1994, not much has changed." A second Washington Post (12/10, A5, Weisman, Barr, 690K) story says "last-minute Republican budget squabbles marred the final hours of a Congress already tainted by scandal, indictments and resignations, and ushered out Republican control on a discordant note."

The New York Times (12/10, A43, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "As they plowed through legislation in the early morning, Congress also whisked through a package of three major health care initiatives that continued a program for H.I.V. and AIDS that will provide more than $6 billion for care over three years, created an agency to centralize efforts against bioterrorism and restructured the National Institutes of Health. … Congress also adopted a measure intended to strengthen the ability to predict tsunamis. Lawmakers approved the first reorganization of the Postal Service in more than 30 years and sent Mr. Bush an agreement allowing the United States to share civilian nuclear technology with India." President Bush "praised Congress for delivering the last batch of bills, singling out the oil drilling, AIDS assistance and fisheries legislation, as well as the nuclear agreement with India and the elevated trade status for Vietnam."

Congress Overhauls Fishing Industry Regulations. The Washington Post (12/10, A8, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "Congress yesterday passed the broadest overhaul of the rules that govern the U.S. fishing industry in a decade, with provisions instructing fishery managers to adhere strictly to scientific advice so as not to deplete the ocean. The final language of the Magnuson-Stevens Act, which passed the Senate on Thursday and the House early yesterday, was a compromise between environmentalists and fishing interests. The measure mandates an end to overfishing of depleted species within 2 1/2 years and allows the selling and trading of shares in a fishery to promote conservation." The AP (12/9, Daly) reports President Bush "said Saturday the country is committed to ensuring strong commercial and recreational fishing, praising legislation that overhauls management of marine fisheries and strengthens protections against further depleting dwindling stocks."

Tax-And-Trade Package Compromises Disparate Items Left On GOP's Agenda. The Washington Post (12/10, A5, Weisman, Barr, 690K) reports, "The centerpiece of the closing hours' work was a tax-and-trade bill. The measure temporarily extended expiring tax breaks for business research and development and for hiring people off the welfare rolls, a partial college tuition deduction, and energy conservation incentives. It extended a generous deduction for state and local sales taxes that was slipped into a business tax law in 2004 as a temporary measure to win votes in states without income taxes but is taking on an air of permanence. The huge package also contained measures to permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti. The Haiti provision was strongly challenged by some Southern lawmakers, who said it would further erode jobs in their states' textile industries."

The New York Times (12/10, A43, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "The trade measure, a compendium of last-minute priorities sent to President Bush, was the chief legislative accomplishment of the final hours. It restored $38 billion in popular tax breaks; established normal trade relations with Vietnam and granted trade benefits to Haiti and four South American countries; and blocked a cut in Medicare payments to doctors. The measure also fulfilled a long-sought objective of Gulf Coast lawmakers and the oil industry by expanding offshore drilling opportunities in the eastern Gulf of Mexico and directing hundreds of millions of dollars in new royalties to the region. 'Just when everyone bet against us, Republicans put together a broad package of energy, tax, trade and health care measures,' said Senator Bill Frist."

Stopgap Funding Measure Approved. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K) reports, "As one of its final acts, Congress approved a stopgap measure keeping federal programs running at or slightly below current levels through Feb. 15. Bush signed it Saturday. The action was necessary because lawmakers failed to pass the annual spending bills covering the budget year that began Oct. 1, except those dealing with defense and homeland security."

Lewis Blasts Frist Over Failure To Pass Appropriations Bills. The New York Times (12/10, A43, Hulse, 1.16M) reports Rep. Jerry Lewis, outgoing chairman of the Appropriations Committee, in an "unusual public attack on a fellow Republican," said, "The breakdown of regular order this cycle — indeed the failure to get our bills done — should be squarely placed at the feet of the departing Senate majority leader who failed to schedule floor time for the consideration of appropriations bills."

State Sales Tax Break Expected To Save Texans $1 Billion Annually. The Houston Chronicle (12/10, Ivanovich, Mittelstadt, 530K) reports, "For residents in Texas and six other states without state income taxes, the bill ensures taxpayers who itemize will be able to deduct state and local sales taxes on their federal income tax forms, for tax years 2006 and 2007. The tax break, which will cost the Treasury $5.5 billion, will allow Texans to keep $2 billion over the next two years. This provision was an effort to approximate the benefit enjoyed by taxpayers in other states, who can deduct their state income taxes."

Democrats' Agenda Could Add Tens Of Billions Of Dollars To Deficit. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Havemann, 850K) reports, "Democrats' expansive vision of the government's role in American life is on a collision course with budget deficits that are already running about $250 billion a year. The Concord Coalition, a lobby for fiscal responsibility, warns that the deficit could reach $800 billion in 10 years if Congress enacts all the programs its members are talking about. In the education budget, for example, some leading Democrats have discussed cutting the interest rate on federally subsidized student loans in half — boosting the federal interest subsidy by an estimated $18 billion over five years — plus increasing Pell Grants for college students by 25% and raising funding for the No Child Left Behind program by as much as $16 billion. Among all the spending initiatives being discussed on Capitol Hill, perhaps none would cost so much so soon as closing the 'doughnut hole' in the new Medicare prescription drug program. … Having the federal government pick up those expenses would cost the Treasury an estimated $50 billion a year for the first 10 years."

Alternative Energy Firms Already Benefiting From Democrats' Return To Power. The New York Times (12/10, BU6, Alster, 1.16M) reports, "some analysts and money managers are hoping the imminent Democratic takeover of Congress will also be bullish for alternative energy stocks by improving prospects for favorable legislation for the industry. One likely initiative, known as a national renewable portfolio standard, would require utilities to derive 10 percent of their electricity output from renewable sources by 2020. Currently, less than 3 percent of electricity is generated from such sources. Senator Jeff Bingaman…the presumptive chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, says he hopes to pass 'some version' of a renewable portfolio standard in the next Congress. The details of such legislation — as well as whether it would be approved by Congress and signed by President Bush — are very much uncertain. But that hasn't stopped investors from placing their bets."

WPost Criticizes Proposed Closed-Door Meeting Of Senate. The Washington Post (12/10, B6, 690K), in an editorial, notes that incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "plans to open the 110th Congress with a closed gathering of all 100 senators. We're all for senators getting to know each other. But when they meet as the Senate, it should be in public. Reducing gridlock depends on more senators putting the public good ahead of the two-year electoral cycle, not on cooking up more deals behind closed doors."

Bush Said To Be "Locked In A Lethal Downward Spiral." The New York Daily News (12/10, DeFrank, 729K) writes, "For a wounded President locked in a lethal downward spiral ever since his reelection, it was the cruelest week of all. Not since Bill Clinton forlornly insisted that 'the President is still relevant' after being trounced in the 1994 mid-term elections has a President struggled so hard to salvage his political traction. In 72 hours last week, a bipartisan commission harshly repudiated Bush's Iraq policy. Incoming Secretary of Defense Robert Gates told senators the U.S. isn't winning the war. Then a British journalist snarkily asked at a White House press conference if Bush weren't 'in denial' about Iraq. For good measure, a new poll found only 27% of Americans back his Iraq policy, a new low. And a moderate GOP senator termed the policy 'absurd' and possibly criminal." A "well-placed Bush source who talks with the President often" said, "He'll be fine but he can't be doing very good. It's been a terrible year, and it keeps getting worse." But the President "is described by another recent visitor as still resolutely defiant, convinced history will ultimately vindicate him."

Dinner With Abramoff Could Further Complicate Myers Nomination. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Weinstein, 850K) reports, "Five years ago…Jack Abramoff went to a dinner with top officials of the Interior Department, representatives of the White House and leaders of the National Mining Assn. That Georgetown dinner has now come back to haunt one of the guests -- William G. Myers III, who was the Interior Department's top lawyer at the time and for the last three years one of President Bush's most controversial nominees for a federal judgeship. Last week, Myers was asked to explain why he testified earlier to the Senate Judiciary Committee that he had never met Abramoff. … Immediately after the November midterm election, Bush announced his intention to renominate Myers." However, "In recent days…questions have arisen about Myers' March 2005 response to a query by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democratic on the judiciary committee. Leahy asked Myers whether he had ever had any contact with Abramoff. … 'I have searched my memory and files,' Myers responded. 'To the best of my recollection, I have never had any contact with Mr. Abramoff." The Times continues, "A week ago, however, the Denver Post published a story based on information obtained under the Freedom of Information Act showing that Myers was among two dozen people attending the dinner on Sept. 24, 2001, with Abramoff."

Cardin Adjusting To "Peculiar Customs" Of Senate. The Washington Post (12/10, C4, Mosk, 690K) reports Sen.-elect Ben Cardin "is still adjusting to the peculiar customs of his new job. But in the unmarked basement warren of transition offices for new members," Cardin "said he is brimming with plans. 'I'm not coming to the Senate to retire,' said Cardin, 63, when asked about the charge that his Republican opponent, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, frequently leveled during a year of campaigning. 'I'm going to be very busy. And I won't waste a minute.'" Cardin "will find himself in the thick of deliberations over the Iraq war as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and will serve on panels that deal with the budget, the environment, minority business and judicial appointments."

SMU Reportedly Frontrunner For Bush Presidential Library. The Houston Chronicle (12/10, A1, Korosec, 530K) reports, "Three Texas universities are hoping to land the George W. Bush presidential library, and each is calling in its own heavy hitters and Bush backers to try to make the case. Baylor touts its location, Southern Methodist University its personal ties and the University of Dallas its spacious site. The president's library site-selection committee, which has been working entirely in private, could choose a winner among the three finalists as early as next month. SMU, Laura Bush's alma mater, has been widely considered the frontrunner since the first lady told the Houston Chronicle in a 2005 interview that the school is her sentimental favorite."

Space Shuttle Discovery Successfully Lifts Off. The New York Times (12/10, A41, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports, "Night became day on Saturday as the shuttle Discovery muscled its way off of the launching pad with a shuddering roar on a mission to rewire the International Space Station. With a blinding streak of yellow flame that left a mark on the retina and a lump in the throat, the shuttle and its crew of seven astronauts lifted off at 8:47 p.m. in the program's first nighttime launching in more than four years." The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Johnson, 850K) reports launch director Mike Leinbach "said the successful launch was the best sign yet that NASA had fully recovered from the Columbia disaster. 'We're getting back in the groove. We're getting back in business,' Leinbach said. NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin said the launch marked another milestone in finishing the space station and going beyond. The Houston Chronicle (12/10, Carreau, 530K) reports in its front-page story that Griffin said the program was back on track and, "On average we want to fly every two months."

The Washington Post (12/10, A20, Harwood, 690K) adds, "The brilliant light of the takeoff illuminated the shuttle's heat shield in the first two minutes of flight. But engineers will not be able to assess the health of the protective tiles until a detailed inspection Sunday by the astronauts and again during final approach to the space station Monday. Discovery's mission is considered the most complex station assembly flight yet attempted and one of the most complicated in manned spaceflight history."

LATimes Says Moon Program Not Worth Cost. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K) editorializes, "When it comes to poetic vision, 'Fly Me to the Moon' has it all over 'Global Precipitation Mission.' But the prosaic and twice-delayed NASA meteorology project would conduct a useful scientific study of Earth weather. A return to the moon is a romantic but expensive mission in search of a purpose." The Times adds, "Even NASA's 'Why the Moon?' website doesn't really explain it." It contends, "For too long, NASA has been overspending on manned flight and under-funding scientific study. Vital missions to study the Earth's climate, for example, have been delayed for years or indefinitely. An unmanned scientific mission to scan for Earth-like planets in nearby solar systems, scheduled to launch in 2011, has been postponed until 2015."

Missile Defense System Takes Shape In Alaska. The New York Times (12/10, A36, Yardley, 1.16M) reports from Fort Greely, Alaska, "Four years after President Bush ordered a limited missile defense system to be built and nearly a quarter century after Ronald Reagan first proposed the Strategic Defense Initiative, this sub-Arctic outpost, once a cold war training site and still a cold-weather training site, is where progress on the long-embattled missile system is perhaps most evident, military officials say. Eleven interceptor missiles are installed in underground silos here, buried beneath the snow and a former forest of black spruce."

Top USAF Lawyer Had Been Practicing 23 Years Without License. The Washington Post (12/10, A22, Ricks, 690K) reports, "A top Air Force lawyer who served at the White House and in a senior position in Iraq turns out to have been practicing law for 23 years without a license. Col. Michael D. Murphy was most recently commander of the Air Force Legal Operations Agency at Bolling Air Force Base in the District." Murphy "was relieved of his command at Bolling on Nov. 30 after the Air Force learned that he had been disbarred for professional misconduct in Texas in 1984 but hadn't informed his superiors."

OTHER NEWS:

Jefferson Easily Wins Reelection In LA2 Runoff. The Washington Post/AP (12/10, A10, Burdeau) reports voters in Louisiana's Second District "looked past a federal bribery investigation" and reelected eight-term incumbent Rep. William Jefferson Saturday. In a runoff election in the New Orleans district, "Jefferson grabbed a commanding lead over state Rep. Karen Carter, a fellow Democrat, almost as soon as the polls closed." With 96% of precincts reporting, Jefferson had 57% of the vote, and Carter 43%.

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/10) says that, "confounding political pundits and a slew of rivals who had become confident of his defeat," Jefferson "neatly sidestepped" the "roiling federal corruption probe. … Guilty pleas by aides and associates who admitted to bribing the congressman and the revelation in court documents that FBI agents had found $90,000 in marked bills stuffed into Jefferson's freezer had put the scent of blood in political waters." The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Simmons, 850K) says "voter turnout was only about 16% on what turned out to be a cold and windy election day." Roll Call (12/10, Kurtz) also runs the news of Jefferson's reelection on its website this morning.

The Time-Picayune story was typical of the nationwide news coverage of Jefferson's reelection, all of which noted the details of the ongoing federal investigation – including the cash found by FBI agents in Jefferson's freezer. The Baton Rouge Advocate (12/10, Gyan) reported, "Jefferson made no mention of the federal investigation in his victory party remarks," but "he told a small group of supporters that he hopes to build on his 'record of effectiveness and record of productivity in Congress.' … Jefferson said it is now time to unite the East and West banks, black and white, rich and poor in order to speed up the area's recovery and 'get our people back home.'" In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/10, A10, Burdeau) added, "In her concession speech, Carter embraced family members and pledged to work with Jefferson, particularly on the area's recovery from Hurricane Katrina. 'I guess the people are happy with the status quo,' she said."

The New York Times (12/10, Nossiter) reported that Jefferson "was heavily favored in black precincts, and Saturday's result suggested that his loyal constituents ignored the accusations of an F.B.I. investigation and rallied around him, as they had in the past and as the congressman had pleaded with them to do. He has not been charged with anything, and vigorously maintains his innocence. … Analysts were surprised at Mr. Jefferson's victory. 'It's not good for the city, and it's not good for the state,' said Susan Howell, a political scientist at the University of New Orleans."

Black Voters, Skeptical Of FBI Probe, Elated By Jefferson Victory. Under the headline "New Orleans Voters Support Their Man Over F.B.I.," the New York Times (12/11, Nossiter) reports, "Outside the Greater St. Stephen Full Gospel Baptist Church, there was no surprise on Sunday at the re-election of…Jefferson, only satisfaction. The late-night comedians could joke all they wanted about the $90,000 that the Federal Bureau of Investigation said it found in Mr. Jefferson's freezer and that the agency said was bribe money. White New Orleans could tut-tut at the seamy portrait outlined by the F.B.I. in its investigation of him, and at the guilty pleas of two associates of Mr. Jefferson, who is a black Democrat.

Supporters in the broken-down, crime-plagued Central City neighborhood here saw another picture: of a godly man persecuted by a racially biased government." The Times notes University of New Orleans Prof. Susan Howell said, "The background to this is the cultural divide between blacks and whites, and their different attitude to law enforcement."

Jefferson Brushes Off Election-Night Questions About Investigation. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/11, Burdeau) reports Jefferson "on Sunday savored a landslide win in the comfort of supporters and family, and put to rest a grueling campaign that shined the spotlight on an FBI bribery investigation overshadowing his long political career. Analysts said his victory was stunning and defied conventional thinking that averred he could not retain his seat and overcome allegations the FBI found $90,000 in bribe money in his freezer." The AP adds, "With the race in his pocket, Jefferson shrugged off questions from reporters about the FBI probe at his re-election party…where supporters gloated over the victory by chanting his name and jeering Carter when she appeared on television to give her concession speech. Asked if he plans to explain his side of the story, something he has promised to do, Jefferson said: 'I'm done with that. I've talked to the voters and they're very happy.'"

New Orleans Democrats Call For Pelosi To Return Jefferson To Ways And Means. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/11, Alpert) reports, "Now that U.S. Rep. William Jefferson has been convincingly re-elected to a ninth term, some local Democrats are calling on House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi to return him to his slot on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee. … 'The 2nd Congressional District said, "This is our guy,"' said state Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans. 'She should respect that.'" The Picayune notes, "Jefferson said he isn't ready to discuss possible committee assignments." In Saturday's victory speech, Jefferson said, "Tonight, my good and faithful friends, I want to just tell you and promise to you that I'm going to do all that is in my power with the help and grace of God to serve you as fully, as effectively, as I possibly can with all the tools that God has given me."

Jefferson Reelection Seen As Posing Ethical Dilemma For House Democrats. The AP (12/11) reports, "In awarding Rep. William Jefferson a new lease on his political life, Louisiana voters this weekend also saddled Nancy Pelosi with another ethics quandary as she prepares to become the Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives. 'It's going to be quite a headache for the Democrats,' Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said Sunday." The AP notes, "Democrats ran against a 'culture of corruption' that they said Republicans had fostered while in control of Congress." Pelosi removed Jefferson from Ways and Means, but she "now may come under pressure to restore his committee assignment or at least place him on a committee where he could benefit New Orleans. Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Pelosi, did not address committee assignments Sunday. In a statement, she said, 'Leader Pelosi has said that it is up to the people of New Orleans to choose who represents them and they did that.'"

On ABC's This Week (12/10, Stephanopoulos), Kokie Roberts said of the difficulty Jefferson's reelection presents for the Democrats, "I think it is going to be very difficult…to embrace Bill Jefferson, given the situation. But on the other hand, somebody better bring some charges against him, if they're going to carry it out."

McCain, Romney Lead Race To Woo Big Bush Donors. The Washington Post (12/10, Cillizza, Fletcher, 690K) reports on its front page on the efforts of Republican presidential hopefuls to win over major donors to President Bush's 2000 and 2004 campaigns. Bush's 2000 run "forever changed the fundraising dynamic for presidential races, showing that an enormous early financial advantage was the same as winning an 'invisible primary.' In that race, there are no voters, elections or overt campaigning -- just the wooing of fabulously rich people with the rewards of insider status, complete with fancy titles." So far, Sen. John McCain and Gov. Mitt Romney "are well ahead among the Republican contenders, though neither yet has come up with monikers like 'Pioneer' or 'Ranger' to flatter the biggest donors." Rudy Giuliani "has on staff Anne Dickerson, who ran the high-dollar program for the Bush campaign in 2004, and he has the backing of a handful of Bush Pioneers and Rangers." But other possible GOP candidates, including Sens. Sam Brownback and Chuck Hagel, Gov. Mike Huckabee, and Newt Gingrich, "are far behind in the pursuit of these fundraising big shots."

Romney Haunted By 1994 Letter On Gay Rights. The Washington Post/AP (12/10, A15) picks up the news that Gov. Mitt Romney "is facing new questions about his beliefs on gay issues after the emergence of a letter he wrote during his 1994 U.S. Senate run, in which he promised to be a stronger advocate for gays" than Sen. Edward Kennedy. The AP report says a "gay-oriented Massachusetts newspaper, Bay Windows, has also released a transcript of a 1994 interview with Romney during the Senate race."

Obama Heading To New Hampshire. NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 11, 0:10, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "One of the most closely watched lawmakers in the new Congress, Barack Obama, heads to New Hampshire tomorrow on his first trip to the important Presidential primary state. Tickets to his afternoon event are sold out and more than 150 media credentials have been issued."

Clinton, Obama Campaigns Could Change Race And Gender Equations. The New York Times (12/10, WK1, Nagourney, 1.16M) writes that "after a 217-year march of major presidential nominees who were, without exception, white and male, the 2008 campaign may offer voters a novel choice." But as Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama plot possible campaigns, "the question remains: are Americans prepared to elect an African-American or a woman as president? Or, to look at it from the view of Democrats hungry for victory in 2008, is the nation more likely to vote for a woman or an African-American for president?"

Presidential Prospects' Works Hit The Bookshelves. The Washington Post (12/10, A4, Goldfarb, 690K) writes that "a number of prospective 2008 presidential candidates are betting that the free publicity that comes with the release of a book can't hurt." Sen. Hillary Clinton's "It Takes a Village" will be re-released this week. In a "newly written introduction, Clinton 'reflects on how our village has changed over the last decade -- from the impact of the Internet to new research in early child development and education,' according to her publisher, Simon & Schuster." Sen. Barack Obama "has been actively promoting his new book, 'The Audacity of Hope,'" and John Edwards "has traveled to early primary states to sell his new tome, 'Home.'" Sen. John McCain and his chief of staff Mark Salter "will release their fifth book in August. … The book, tentatively titled 'Hard Call,' will explore historic decisions in politics, history, science and other endeavors." Al Gore, "who has kept the door to a presidential run slightly ajar, next year will publish 'The Assault on Reason' -- an examination of how 'the public arena has grown more hostile to reason.'" Sen. John Kerry "is releasing a so-far-untitled book on the environment in March with his wife, Teresa." Rudy Giuliani "has no book plans, though his post-Sept. 11 tome, 'Leadership,' was a huge success." Gov. Mitt Romney "has no plans for a book in the next few years."

Crist Cancels Florida Inaugural Ball. The AP (12/9) reports Florida Gov.-elect Charlie Crist "has decided to cancel his inaugural ball, saying Saturday that he didn't feel right about an expensive party when many people are struggling with higher insurance and property tax bills. Other free events, including a prayer breakfast, parade, the swearing-in ceremony and tours of the governor's mansion will still continue." Crist's inaugural committee is "returning all donations it's received."

Longer Hours Blamed For Increase In Trucker-Related Highway Deaths. The Chicago Tribune (12/10, Franklin, Little, 617K) reports, "Spurred by a global economy that demands that goods be delivered on time and at low prices, business has never been so brisk and so cutthroat" for truckers." The Tribune adds, "Paid by the delivery, not the hour, the country's 350,000 independent truckers…are lashed to punishing schedules that practically force them to live in their rigs. Counting all their time on the job, some earn as little as $8 an hour. Long hours, chaotic schedules and exhausting work conditions make for a potentially lethal formula -- for truck drivers and everyone else on the road. Nearly a decade ago, the government vowed to significantly reduce the number of fatalities from truck crashes, but the results have been mixed. Nationally the death toll fell until 2002 and then started climbing. In the three most heavily traveled states, California, Texas and Florida, deaths involving large truck crashes have steadily climbed. Over 5,000 people die and 116,000 are injured yearly in truck-related accidents, according to the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration."

NYTimes Blames The Administration For Loosening Trucking Safety Standards. The New York Times (12/10, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "To describe the Bush administration's policy toward the trucking industry as deregulation is farcical. The word empowerment is so much more fitting for the array of trucking executives the White House appointed to be the ranking regulators of their own industry. While avowing professionalism, this cadre of political contributors and industry insiders has brazenly relaxed federal standards for truck safety over the last six years. Rather than tightening drivers' hours as safety specialists advised, the political powers at the truck safety agency have actually loosened them."

Chris Matthews Released From Hospital. The Washington Post (12/10, D3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) "Reliable Source" column reports, "Chris Matthews is out of the hospital and ready to start interrupting people again. The 'Hardball' host was sidelined by complications from diabetes, which caused him to miss more than a week behind the mike."

Six-Party Talks On North Korea To Restart In Eight Days. The AP (12/10, Gearan) carries comments by an anonymous "senior U.S. official" that "a long-delayed round of international talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear weapons program is scheduled for later this month." The Six-Party Talks should recommence on December 18 in Beijing, and adjourn for Christmas several days later. The AP adds, "U.S. diplomats have been preparing for a new round,…but the date was uncertain." The "talks carry greater weight now that North Korea has exploded a nuclear device and tested a long-range missile earlier this year." Secretary Rice "said last month North Korea must come to new talks ready to deal, or there is no point in holding them."

Ahmadinejad Says Iran Installing 3,000 Centrifuges. The AP (12/10, Dareini) details remarks by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that Iran "has begun installing 3,000 centrifuges in an expansion of its uranium enrichment program that brings the Islamic nation significantly closer to large-scale production of nuclear fuel." He "also claimed that the international community was caving in to Tehran's demands to continue its nuclear program."

Economic, Political Ties Said To Drive Endorsement Of US-India Nuclear Deal. Continuing coverage of the background of the US-India nuclear cooperation agreement approved by the 109th Congress, the New York Times (12/10, A10, Sengupta, 1.16M) notes, "Beyond simple good will, unique commercial and strategic imperatives have driven a bipartisan swell of support for the deal, even though New Delhi steadfastly rejects the global nonproliferation treaty and advances a nuclear weapons program." The Times says the "economic incentives for the United States are huge," adding that, "as India gradually opens its vast market, American companies stand to make a great many gains, from investments in Indian real estate to selling soybean oil and fighter planes. There is also New Delhi's growing strategic value in a rapidly changing Asia." The Times calls it "revealing" that "a contentious bill has enjoyed so much bipartisan support," adding, "With the Indian economy growing at a steady clip of up to 8 percent in recent years, India last month hosted the largest American trade delegation to any single country, including vendors of nuclear equipment.

Abbas May Be Close To Calling New Palestinian Elections. The Washington Post (12/10, A31, Wilson, 690K) notes Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "is inclined to call early elections, including for his own office, to end the political and economic crisis in the territories." A PLO Executive Committee meeting gave Abbas "17 options to end the months-long stalemate with the governing Hamas movement," and he "is expected to give a national address next week on how he intends to end the crisis that has battered the economy and increased partisan strife in the territories. He is under pressure from his own [Fatah] party to move decisively at a time when talks over a unity government have foundered again." One Executive Committee member said Abbas is "leaning towards" early elections and has "dismissed the option that he continue talks with Hamas." The Post calls such a move "an uncharacteristically bold gesture by Abbas, a cautious veteran of the Palestinian national movement who has long favored consensus over confrontation, even in his dealings with Israel."

The New York Times (12/10, A8, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Fatah sources said Abbas is "leaning toward calling early parliamentary and presidential elections." The Times says he "has been stuck, with top Fatah officials urging him to fire the prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, and to call new elections."

CNN (12/9, Shubert) reported Abbas "may announce early parliamentary and presidential elections within the week. He made that announcement apparently to the Executive Committee of the PLO, saying that he had failed to negotiate a coalition government with the militant Hamas faction and that early elections may be an option. He said that he may make an address within the week and that's when his decision would be announced. Hamas was very quick to respond, an official saying that they rejected the idea calling it, quote, 'a coup against democracy.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Boudreaux, Abukhater, 850K) says a call for early elections would be "a risky move" and "a gamble" for Abbas," who "left the door open to compromise with Hamas." For its part, "Hamas warned that any such step would be illegal and meet with resistance, raising the stakes in a months-long and often violent conflict over control of the Palestinian Authority."

BBC.com (12/9) focuses on Hamas' reaction to the early election rumors, saying it "reacted by condemning the suggestion." Haniyeh "condemned the idea of early elections, saying they would accentuate 'crisis and tensions,'" and a Hamas spokesman "described the PLO committee's statement as a threat to democracy."

Lebanon's Shiites, Once Marginalized, Reshape Politics. A 2,600-word piece on the front page of the Washington Post (12/10, Shadid, 690K) details the growing political power of Lebanon's Shiite Muslims. "Once the country's most downtrodden, entrenched in feudal misery, Lebanon's Shiites stand today on the verge of their greatest political power in the history of a diverse country defined by its fractious religious communities: Sunni and Shiite Muslims, Druze and Christians. But their ascent is a story of contradictions: Now at the peak of that power, confident of victory, the community is still shaped by its own sense of vulnerability and weakness." While Shiite "leaders rely on age-old notions of backroom, under-the-table Lebanese politics," the Post says those ideas "may be reshaped by leaving a legacy of turning to the street with populist demands. And in pursuit of power, through the protests that began Dec. 1, the Shiites, the country's single-largest community, may end up breaking a system that appears to be buckling under the stress of Lebanon's most acute crisis since the 15-year civil war ended in 1990."

A Los Angeles Times (12/10, Stack, 850K) piece describes the challenges facing Minister Fouad Siniora's government. "Inside the Grand Serail, what remains of [that] government toils away, trying to ignore the thousands upon thousands of people massed at its gate. The people outside describe the government leaders as unwanted and illegitimate, pawns of U.S. interests." The Times calls the separation of Siniora's government from the Hezbollah-led street protests "the kernel of a dangerous political standoff." While the palace "stands isolated behind snarls of razor wire and layers of soldiers and security forces," the "mood is stoical and confident" in the protest enclaves. "The demonstrators seem convinced that the government will, inevitably, collapse, that Siniora and his allies cannot stay in place with so many people on the streets."

Radiation Found In Hamburg Apartments Tied To Litvinenko Associate. The CBS Evening News (12/9, story 6, 0:15, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "In the mystery of the poisoned Russian spy, radiation traces were found today in two German buildings linked to a Russian businessman he'd met with Alexander Litvinenko in London on the day he became fatally ill." The Washington Post (12/10, A28, Finn, Jordan, 690K) reports German authorities "said that the businessman, Dmitry Kovtun, had visited the two apartments, which belong to his ex-wife and former mother-in-law. Kovtun is reportedly seriously ill in a Moscow hospital." Kovtun, "a Russian business consultant who has spent years living in Germany, is emerging as a key figure in the investigation. While there are conflicting reports about his condition, the Russian news agency Interfax has reported that Kovtun is in serious condition and experiencing problems with major organ functions as a result of the poisoning. Kovtun and another Russian businessman, Andrei Lugovoy, met with Litvinenko…in London on Nov. 1, the day Litvinenko began feeling sick."

The AP (12/9) reports, "Meanwhile, tests have shown no trace of the radioactive substance polonium-210 on a plane used by a contact of Litvinenko to fly to London, German airline Germanwings said Saturday. Authorities carried out tests at Cologne-Bonn airport after determining that Dmitry Kovtun flew to London from Hamburg on the Airbus A319 on Nov. 1. Kovtun met with Litvinenko later that day."

The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Fleishman, 850K) reports, "Police discounted media reports suggesting that Kovtun, who reportedly lived in Germany for 12 years, planned Litvinenko's assassination in Hamburg. No traces of radiation were discovered in Kovtun's apartment, which is in the same building as his ex-wife's in the northern port city's Ottensen neighborhood."

Litvinenko's Widow Says Culprit Was "Obviously…Not Putin." BBC.com (12/10) reports, "The widow of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko has said she believes the Russian authorities could have been behind his murder. Marina Litvinenko, 44, told the Mail on Sunday: 'Obviously it was not Putin himself, of course not.' But she said what President Putin 'does around him in Russia makes it possible to kill a British person' in Britain. … Mrs Litvinenko also told the Sunday Times: 'Everybody tries to write about Sasha like he was an ex-spy, but it's completely untrue. He never was a spy.'"

KGB Veterans Said To Hold "All The Most Important Jobs" In Russia. In an "Week in Review" piece for the New York Times (12/10, WK3, 1.16M) Scott Shane writes, "President Boris N. Yeltsin considered dismantling the K.G.B. but 'decided it was too dangerous,' said Michael McFaul, a Russia specialist at Stanford University. In the seven-year rule of President Vladimir V. Putin, the security service has returned to prestige and power. 'All the most important jobs in Russia today,' Mr. McFaul said, 'are held by K.G.B. or former K.G.B. officers, in every ministry, in every industry.'"

International Nuclear Regulators Seek Curbs On Polonium Traffic. The New York Times (12/10, A16, Broad, 1.16M) reports, "Nuclear regulators in Washington and abroad are studying whether to tighten security on polonium 210 in case terrorists seek the deadly material for so-called dirty bombs that spew radioactivity, officials and diplomats said in recent interviews. … Groups considering tighter controls include the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in the United States and the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, which sets global standards for radiation safety."

LATimes Ties Litvinenko's Poisoning To Journalists' Murders. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "the cloak-and-dagger theatrics threaten to obscure an urgent danger at the story's heart — journalists in President Vladimir V. Putin's Russia are increasingly being attacked and killed. … We may never find out whodunit or who ordered it done, but we know what Litvinenko was investigating at the time of his death: the killing of decorated Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who had been exposing alleged Russian misdeeds in Chechnya. Were the killings of Politkovskaya and Litvinenko isolated incidents, the Kremlin's protests that it suffers most from the bad international publicity would be more worthy of sympathy. But Politkovskaya was at least the 21st Russian journalist to be killed since Putin was elected in 2000, according to Reporters Without Borders. Two others have disappeared and are presumed dead, and there have been 320 assaults."

Chen's Party Wins One Taiwan Mayor Race, But Loses Another. Reporting on yesterday's mayoral elections in Taipei and Kaohsiung, Taiwan, the New York Times (12/10, A9, Bradsher, 1.16M) notes President Chen Shui-bian's Democratic Progressive Party "eked out the narrowest victory in Taiwanese political history in crucial mayoral elections [in Kaohsiung], but the opposition Nationalist Party quickly said it would seek a recount." The DPP candidate, Chen Chu, appears to have a 1,120 vote margin, out of 761,000 ballots, "a victory margin of about one seventh of a percent. On an island with already deep political divisions, the paper-thin margin and the possibility of a court fight are likely to cause further political friction in the weeks ahead." The Times says the Nationalists had hoped to "turn" the mayoral votes "into an informal referendum on President Chen, who has been dogged by allegations that he and his family have committed financial impropriety." Nationalist candidate Hau Lung-bin easily won the Taipei election.

The AP (12/10, Grauwels) says the DPP "narrowly won a crucial mayoral election in [Kaohsiung], while the opposition candidate won comfortably in the capital of Taipei in a pair of votes seen by many as a referendum on President Chen Shui-bian." Chen Chu's election "seems likely to take pressure off of the president, who has been on the defensive for more than six months over allegations his family and inner circle benefited financially from their proximity to him."

Under the headline, "Taiwan's Ruling Party Dodges An Electoral Bullet," the Los Angeles Times (12/10, Magnier, Ting-i, 850K) says the DPP "defied expectations that it would be trounced in local elections Saturday, handing President Chen Shui-bian some breathing room after months of fighting off scandals. But the mixed results probably will result in continued political infighting at least through the 2008 presidential election, analysts said."

Hong Kong Begins Process Of Selecting Next Leader. BBC.com (12/10) reports Hong Kong voters "are electing the members of a committee that will choose the territory's next leader. Pro-democracy groups are hoping to win enough representation on the 800-seat committee to enter a candidate in next March's chief executive contest." Only 427 of the seats are up for election, and the BBC notes that candidates must have the backing of 100 members in order to challenge current executive Donald Tsang. The BBC's local reporter "says that the democrats already admit that their chosen potential candidate, lawyer Alan Leong, has no chance of beating Mr Tsang. But for the first time since Hong Kong was handed back to China by the UK in 1997, the democrat groups now say they feel that it is worth taking part in the contest."

South American Leaders Consider EU-Style Community. The AP (12/10, Keane) details the results of a summit of 12 South American nations in Cochabamba, Bolivia. Leaders "agreed Saturday to create a high-level commission to study the idea of forming a continent-wide community similar to the European Union." They "agreed to form a study group in Rio de Janeiro to look at the possibility of creating a continent-wide union, and even a South American parliament." Bolivian President Evo Morales is quoted saying, "We seek that South America be forever a region of peace that works to solve the economic problems of its historically abandoned majority." The AP says discussions may continue at Mercosur's meeting in Brazil this month.

Analyst Says Latin Americans Want "Best Of" Castro, Pinochet Models. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/10, B2, 690K), the Inter-American Dialogue's Michael Shifter says, "For the past half-century, no two leaders have so defined Latin America's political scene as Cuba's Fidel Castro and Chile's Gen. Augusto Pinochet." While their regimes were "similar only in their harshness and in the intense passions they evoked," their "legacies" will "loom large, and will long outlive them. They have been tyrants in life, but after their deaths, they will still shape the Latin America they leave behind." Noting that Castro "recognized the fundamental social inequities that mar the region," and Pinochet "embraced the market and its power to lift an economy," Shifter says modern, democratic "governments of the region are drawing on both those veins in their quest to better their citizens' political and economic futures."

Fiji Coup Leader Tries To Assemble Government. The AP (12/9) reports Fiji coup leader Frank Bainimarama "ran want ads in local newspapers Saturday to fill vacant Cabinet jobs, trying to piece together a new government for the south Pacific country." He had earlier "removed a swath of senior civil servants, including top police officers, saying he is weeding out corruption entrenched in the administration of ousted Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase." The AP also notes that Bainimarama's "hand-picked" leader, Jona Senilagakali, "took over the prime minister's office for the first time Friday, arriving with an armed military guard."

Czech Republic Remains "On Autopilot" Six Months After Elections. A New York Times (12/10, A3, Smith, 1.16M) piece details the continued failure of Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek to form a government. "For six long months, the Czech Republic has waited with increasing impatience for Mr. Topolanek to form a government that can win a vote of confidence from a Parliament perfectly split along partisan lines. He had promised President Vaclav Klaus that he would present a winning cabinet by [last week,] but he had no cabinet ready." The country "is suddenly finding democracy something of a puzzle. The combination of a backstabbing political culture and a parliamentary system that provides no tie-breaker in the case of an evenly divided legislature has left the country on autopilot since national elections in June. The crisis shows how far the region's post-Communist political culture has to go before it is mature, but it also indicates that the area's political systems are remarkably secure."

Kosovo Conflict Ordnance Cleanup In Albania Continues. The Washington Post (12/10, A26, Frye, 690K) reports on efforts to eliminate unexploded NATO ordnance in Albania. "For many Albanians living near Kosovo, "it's been seven years of death, amputations, shrapnel wounds and blown-up farm animals, seven years of blocked-off grazing lands, forests and water supplies. The explosives have choked off any hope of development, denying more than 25,000 people access to parts of their land, according to government estimates." Of one rural area, the Post says, "The terrain here is more vertical than horizontal, and planting and grazing land is so precious that before organized de-mining began, some residents tried to clear fields and paths on their own, often with tragic results." Demining "has focused on ground that villagers deem to be high and medium priority: grazing and crop land, roads, areas near water sources. This fall, those and other useful areas along the length of the border were finally declared free of explosives, but it will probably be 2010 before nearly all the explosives along the border are gone."

Border Conflicts Threaten To Destabilize Central African Republic. A lengthy front-page story in the New York Times (12/10, Polgreen, 1.16M) reports, "The Central African Republic — so important as a potential bulwark against the chaos and misery of its neighbors in Chad and the Darfur region of Sudan — is being dragged right into the dangerous and ever-expanding conflict that has begun to engulf central Africa." The Times says the CAR's borders are "porous" and its border lands "ungoverned," and adds, "The situation is so bad in some places that 50,000 residents have fled … to find refuge in Chad, of all places, while starvation threatens hundreds of thousands who remain." Noting that the CAR "sits almost at the bottom of the United Nations development index," the Times says "its vulnerability has only grown in recent months." United Nations border enhancement efforts aim "to avoid a broad, multicountry conflict like the one that swept Congo after the fall of Mobutu Sese Seko."

Chadian Rebels Claim Government Attack Repulsed. The AP (12/9) carries a Chadian rebel group's claim that "rebels fought back a Chadian army attack on Saturday outside an eastern Chad town, killing 100 soldiers and injuring an unknown number of others." Chadian "soldiers attacked a rebel position just outside the eastern Chad town of Biltine … and after three hours of fighting, rebels of the Union of Forces for Democracy and Development, known by the French acronym UFDD, repulsed them, said Ali Moussa Izzo, spokesman of the group." The AP adds, "It was not possible to independently confirm the rebels' claims and government officials were not immediately available for comment."

Madagascar's Ravalomanana Reelected. The AP (12/10, Hogg) reports Madagascar President Marc Ravalomanana "has been re-elected in the Indian Ocean island country, officials said Saturday." Ravalomanana, who appears to have won 55 percent of the vote in last Sunday's runoff election, "promised a five-year development plan to reduce poverty, the dominant issue in a country were 70 percent of the island's 17 million people live on less than $1 a day."

Africa Expert Says Somali Conflict Will Become Regional War Soon. Former CIA case officer Garrett Jones writes extensively in the Los Angeles Times (12/10, Jones, 850K) about Somalia, whose violence "is in a class by itself." He calls Somalia "a space between countries. Or simply a feral nation." Today, "the Somalis are poised to insist that the international community tune back in while they commit an auto-da-fe on CNN. Somali Islamists, modeling themselves on the Taliban, have taken control of most of the country, driving the warlords out of the cities and into the bush." Jones predicts that, "when the roads are dry enough to allow military operations [in Baidoa], the Islamists will swiftly overwhelm the interim government unless outside help arrives at the last minute." He continues, "Somalia's neighbors are bracing for a regional war, and the U.S. State Department says 10 countries are taking sides in some fashion." That "big, ugly regional war" could happen next year, Jones says, and "it is going to become a concern of the U.S."

Yunus, Grameen Bank To Receive Nobel Peace Prize Today. Noting today's Nobel Peace Prize ceremony in Oslo, at which Muhammad Yunus and the Grameen Bank will be jointly awarded the 2006 honor, the New York Times (12/10, A27, Gibbs, 1.16M) reports Yunus "said he would use his newfound celebrity … to urge bankers everywhere to make small business loans to the poorest people they can find." He "is credited with inventing microfinance, the practice of lending small amounts of money to destitute people, 30 years ago. The idea is for borrowers — almost all of them women — to start or expand money-making enterprises like weaving, rope-making, vegetable farming and holding livestock." Yunus said microcredit will allow Bangladesh to halve "the number of people classified as extremely poor by 2015." Noting that 90 percent of the Grameen Bank is owned by millions of borrowers, the Times says Yunus "urged the United States to recalibrate its strategy for fighting terrorism and to address what he said were its 'root causes' — poverty and injustice."

Kristof Sees Stereotyping Of Islam. In his New York Times (12/10, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof writes, "There's a fatigue in the West with an Arab world that sometimes seems to put its creative juices mostly into building better bombs. ... Those stereotypes are largely derived from the less than 20 percent of Muslims who are Arabs, with Persians and Pashtuns thrown in as well. But the great majority of the world's Muslims live not in the Middle East but ... in Asia, where religion has mostly been milder. ... Meanwhile, many Muslims are as disenchanted with us as we are with them. They complain about hypocritical Americans who parrot slogans about human rights but brutalize Muslims at Guantánamo and supply the weaponry that kills Muslim children in Gaza and Lebanon." Kristof predicts, "Desert Muslims grab the headlines, but my bet is that in the struggle for the soul of Islam, maritime Muslims ['more outward-looking, flexible and tolerant'] have the edge."

Today's Events In Washington 25

TERRORISM NEWS:

Ashcroft Claims Enemy Combatant Held Since 2001 Was Tied To 9/11 Attackers. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, A1, Serrano, 850K) reports, "Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri is the last enemy combatant imprisoned in this country. Yet four years after his arrest, government officials still cannot agree on what threat he posed. In a new allegation, former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft says Al-Marri was sent to the United States a day before the Sept. 11 attacks to plan strikes on West Coast targets, including the tallest building in Los Angeles. Ashcroft's claim — made in a new book — is the first time any U.S. official has directly linked Al-Marri to the West Coast attacks that Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden allegedly hoped would follow the deaths of nearly 3,000 people in New York, the Pentagon and Pennsylvania. Citing Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who was captured and interrogated, Ashcroft wrote: 'I believe KSM had planned to use Al-Marri to help facilitate this next wave of attacks focused on Los Angeles.' But three federal law enforcement officials asked about the allegation said they were mystified by Ashcroft's assertions."

Plans To Build Guantanamo Legal Compound Are Halted. The Miami Herald (12/10, Rosenberg, 286K) reports, "In an abrupt about-face, the Pentagon has scrapped plans to invoke emergency authority to fast-track construction of a controversial $100 million legal compound at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Instead, Defense Department officials will seek permission from Congress for any new major buildings in which to stage the first war-crimes trials since World War II." The retreat was "a setback in Bush administration war-on-terrorism policy, just as the Republican-led Congress finished business Saturday -- to be replaced by a Democratic majority."

Lithwick Says Congress Effectively Legalized Torture. In the New York Times Magazine (12/10), journalist Dahlia Lithwick writes, "There were always two narratives offered about the change in American torture policy after 9/11. The first story — told by the Bush administration — was that the Geneva Conventions mandating humane treatment of war prisoners could be unilaterally suspended by the president for the duration of the war on terror. But ... only a few renegade bad apples abused detainees. The alternate version of the story went this way: from the outset of the war, human rights groups said, Bush-administration attorneys devoted considerable energy to secretly redefining torture." The competing versions "collided this summer with the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld." Lithwick concludes disapprovingly, "Congress passed legislation decreasing Congressional and judicial oversight of detainees. When Bush admitted, in short, that the second narrative — America tortures people in secret — was true, Congress effectively made it legal."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Coast Guard Live Fire Practice Perturbs Great Lakes Area. The Washington Post (12/10, A18, Slevin, 690K) reports, "U.S. Coast Guard vessels staging machine-gun target practice in the peaceable Great Lakes? ... In the name of defending the United States against terrorists, the Coast Guard proposes live-fire zones in all five Great Lakes, where gunners could perfect their skills on M-240B machine guns to be mounted on lake vessels. The weapons can fire hundreds of 7.62mm rounds a minute and send lead 2.3 miles downrange." The Bush Administration "sought to assure the Canadians that the [machine guns] would not violate the spirit of an 1817 agreement limiting armaments on the lakes, home to 21 percent of the fresh water on the Earth's surface." However, "opposition to the proposal is formidable and growing."

DOJ_NMG_0104622

WAR NEWS:

White House Seeking Alternatives To Key ISG Proposals. Coverage by both television networks and print media of the White House stance on Iraq casts President Bush as standing his ground regarding the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, but suggests Bush is open to change. ABC World News (12/9, story 2, 1:30, Weir, 8.78M) reported Bush "has promised to announce his plan for a new direction in Iraq before the end of the year; though the bipartisan Iraq Study Group has weighed in, the President says he wants to hear more." ABC (Morrell): "The White House says the President is still digesting the Iraq Study Group report but at the same time he is seeking lots more advice. ... Now, all this is a clear indication that while the President appreciates the hard work of the Iraq Study Group, he certainly does not believe they have all the answers."

NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 2, 2:35, Court, 9.87M) reported Bush "struck a conciliatory tone in his weekly radio address," but "didn't address two of the study group's key recommendations: that the US begin direct talks with Iran and Syria and begin pulling out troops by early 2008. Still the President faces heavy pressure to change course." On the CBS Evening News (12/9, story 3, 2:30, Assuras, 7.66M), ISG adviser Steven Cook said, "Certainly the report is a rebuke of the Administration's foreign policy."

CNN (12/9, Quijano) reported, "On the heels of that sobering report by the Iraq Study Group, President Bush today, in his weekly radio address, praised the bipartisan panel for its work, but continued to remain vague about its recommendations. ... As he's done since the report was released on Wednesday, the President was careful not to weigh in in any specific fashion on the 79 recommendations."

The New York Times (12/10, A18, Rutenberg, Sanger, 1.16M) reports Bush Administration officials "say their preliminary review of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's recommendations has concluded that many of its key proposals are impractical or unrealistic, and a small group inside the National Security Council is now racing to come up with alternatives to the panel's ideas. ... President Bush and his top aides were described as deeply reluctant to follow the core strategy advocated by the study group: to pressure Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to rein in sectarian violence faced with reduced United States military and economic support." The AP (12/10, Loven) also says "President Bush's national security team is debating whether additional troops are needed to secure Baghdad."

Implying a presidential effort to put the best light on things, the Los Angeles Times (12/10, Richter, 850K) reports that "although the bipartisan commission on Iraq endorsed actions that the White House firmly opposed, President Bush said Saturday that the panel's report shared his chief goal for the country. ... The release of the report Wednesday has amplified criticism of the administration's policies and lent new momentum to calls for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq. Bush is now scrambling to develop an alternate course."

ISG Report Shows "Divide Within GOP." The New York Times (12/10, A1, Broder, Toner, 1.16M) reports, "The release of the [ISG report] this week exposed deep fissures among Republicans over how to manage a war that many fear will haunt their party — and the nation — for years to come. A document that many in Washington had hoped would pave the way for a bipartisan compromise on Iraq instead drew sharp condemnation from the right." White House officials "who conducted a preliminary review of the report said they had concluded that many of the proposals were impractical or unrealistic." On the other hand, GOP "moderates clung to the report, mindful of the drubbing the party received in last month's midterm elections largely because of Iraq." The disagreements "could make it more difficult for Republicans to coalesce on national security policy and avoid a bitter intraparty fight going into the 2008 campaign." President Bush "has not yet tipped his hand on what course he intends to pursue," but "has already signaled that he intends to make some adjustments, most notably by dismissing Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld immediately after the midterm elections."

The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Levey, 850K) reports President Bush, "weakened by an unpopular war and the loss of Republican control in Congress, is now confronting disaffection within his own party that could complicate his attempt to set an agenda for his final two years in office." Republicans "are advertising attacks on Bush's foreign policy that they once kept largely private. Last week…Sen. Gordon Smith gave a speech calling the current war strategy 'absurd' and sent out a news release with his remarks. Some longtime Bush allies, such as Texas Sen. John Cornyn, are even adopting Democratic rhetoric to criticize the Iraq war. And on other issues that will confront the new Congress in January -- including trade and judicial appointments -- Republican lawmakers have signaled an unwillingness to follow the White House."

Hawks "Rage" Over ISG Plan. The Washington Post (12/10, A3, Abramowitz, Kessler, 690K) reports, "Steady condemnation from conservatives for the Iraq Study Group report may be providing some cover to the Bush administration as it completes its own review of strategy in Iraq, apparently with little enthusiasm for the panel's prescription of U.S. troop withdrawal and dialogue with Syria and Iran. ... Comments from the hawkish right, meanwhile, have often been an accurate gauge of the beliefs of key figures inside the Bush administration, especially Vice President Cheney." Sen. John McCain is described as "notably fueling the skepticism."

Bush Seen By Some As "Rejecting Lifeline." The San Francisco Chronicle (12/10, A1, Lochhead, 384K) reports, "Much of Washington is looking at President Bush as a man standing on quicksand in Iraq, refusing the branch offered by his father's friend to save his presidency and the country from a historic blunder." Bush "is in full flower of what he calls resolve and others call obduracy. The Baker-Hamilton report has left Bush isolated even within his own party. ... It remains to be seen whether Bush is clinging to Cold War metaphors that he hopes history will vindicate or saving face before delivering a speech expected by Christmas. During it he would call for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq based on reviews he has ordered from his State Department, Pentagon and National Security Council." The Chronicle notes doubt that James Baker "was sent as an envoy from father to son. ... he is no longer playing family messenger."

WPost, NYTimes Examine ISG. The Washington Post (12/10, B6, 690K) editorializes that the ISG's "recommendations for shifting U.S. military tactics in the war are specific, focused and aimed at incremental improvement over the next few months; they are also close to what the Pentagon and Iraqi government already were hoping to achieve. By contrast, the group's diplomatic strategy is sweeping -- and untethered to reality. ... Start with the supposition that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is somehow central to ending the chaos in Iraq. In fact, even if the two-state solution sought by the Bush administration were achieved, it's difficult to imagine how or why that would cause Sunnis and Shiites to cease their sectarian war in Baghdad or the Baathist-al Qaeda insurgency to stand down." In addition, "Bashar al-Assad is very different from his father, Hafez, with whom Mr. Baker negotiated."

The New York Times (12/10, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes that the ISG report's recommendations 46, 72, and 78 "share one basic idea: Government officials should not lie to the public or each other, especially in matters of war. ... the fact that it had to be said, and so often, in the report goes a long way toward explaining how Mr. Bush got the country into the Iraq mess and why it is proving so hard to dig out of it." Recommendation 46 "calls on the new secretary of defense to create 'an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice' to civilian leaders"; recommendation 72 "says that "costs for the war in Iraq should be included in the president's annual budget request," and recommendation 78 "calls on the Pentagon and the intelligence community to 'institute immediate changes' in how they collect data on violence in Iraq 'to provide a more accurate picture of events on the ground.'"

Rumsfeld Makes Surprise Trip To Iraq. There was extensive television coverage of outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's surprise trip to Iraq, but little made its way into major newspapers. ABC World News (12/9, lead story, 2:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The Pentagon has always asked the media to keep Secretary Rumsfeld's prior visits under wraps until he arrives on the ground here in Iraq. But this time, they still haven't officially announced the visit. They're giving out very little information and no pictures. ... Iraqis we spoke with today about Rumsfeld's visit told us they blame him for the chaos so prevalent here." CNN (12/9, Robertson) had a similar report, saying that "it appears that even some very senior officials here don't even know Rumsfeld's whereabouts, and weren't aware that he had been in country. So that is an indication of the secretive nature of the mission. And obviously, security is a very, very big part of that. … But, perhaps here, the Secretary of Defense wanting to keep this mission a very low-profile one, keep it very private. Certainly the indications seem to be that it is a personal visit for him to thank personally the generals here, commanding the operations, to show his appreciation to the troops. Of course, it has been his decisions that have put so many lives on the line here and still on the line."

NBC Nightly News (12/9, lead story, 4:04, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) opened with "late word from the Pentagon" that Rumsfeld "is in Iraq as he prepares to leave office he made the trip to say goodbye to American troops. ... In a secret visit [outgoing] Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld is in Baghdad to say goodbye to the troops. None of his previous 12 trips, all of them unannounced, has ever seen security this tight." The CBS Evening News (12/9, story 3, 2:30, Assuras, 7.66M) said it "has confirmed that outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld today made a surprise visit to Iraq to say farewell and thank you to US troops."

The AP (12/10, Yost) reports Rumsfeld "made a surprise trip to Iraq Saturday, just days after a bipartisan commission called the situation there 'grave and deteriorating' and said the administration's policy wasn't working." Some of his remarks to "more than 1,200 soldiers and Marines at Al-Assad, a sprawling air base in Anbar province, the large area of western Iraq that is an insurgent stronghold," are quoted. His "15th trip to Iraq" comes after "an emotional farewell at the Pentagon." AFP (12/10) says "the outspoken defense secretary's visit coincided with more sectarian bloodshed in Iraq. A suspected Sunni suicide bomber on Saturday detonated his car near a revered Shiite shrine in the central city of Karbala, killing six civilians and wounding 47 more "

The New York Times (12/10, A30, Burns, 1.16M) reports in an article about ethnic cleansing in Baghdad that Rumsfeld "arrived in Baghdad on Saturday for what American military officials said was a farewell visit to the troops." The Washington Post (12/10, A24, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) reports in an article on the same ethnic cleansing episode that Rumsfeld "visited Iraq 'to express his appreciation to the troops,' said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman."

Shiites Rout Sunnis From Mixed Baghdad Neighborhood. The New York Times (12/10, A30, Burns, 1.16M) reports, "Bands of armed Shiite militiamen stormed through a neighborhood in north-central Baghdad on Saturday, driving hundreds of Sunni Arabs from their homes in what a Sunni colonel in the Iraqi Army described as one of the most flagrant episodes of sectarian warfare yet unleashed in the capital." The officer "said that more than 100 Sunni families, many with very young children, had left the Hurriya neighborhood aboard a convoy of trucks and cars under cover of the nightly curfew. Government officials tried to urge the families to return by promising army protection, but could not persuade them." The Times adds, "The role of American troops in the turmoil was unclear. The Sunni cleric, Sayed Muhammad, said appeals for assistance from the First Cavalry Division, its headquarters about three miles southwest of Hurriya, had gone unanswered. But Colonel Jabouri said Iraqi commanders had told the Americans there was no need for their help." Furthermore, "One of the striking features of the violence Saturday was that it occurred in an area that lies less than three miles northwest of the heavily guarded Green Zone compound."

The Washington Post (12/10, A24, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) reports, "By evening, dozens of Sunni Arab families had fled their homes, carrying their belongings and furniture in trucks in one of the worst known incidents of sectarian cleansing to grip the capital in recent weeks." The Post ironically notes that the neighborhood's name, Hurriyah, "means freedom." An anonymous Iraqi commander said that "the attack was apparently in retaliation for an attack on Shiite residents by Sunni gunmen."

More Violence Roils Iraq. NBC Nightly News (12/9, lead story, 4:04, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reports, "Sectarian violence crossed another red line today in Karbala, Iraq's second holiest Shiite city, south of Baghdad. A suicide car bomb struck a crowded market near a religious shrine. The blast killed at least five and left dozens dazed and wounded and set cars ablaze. While to the north, in Saladin province, Sunnis grieved the deaths of 18 of their own by a US airstrike Friday on their town." Maceda: "At the emotional funeral, locals shouted, 'Death to the occupiers' and reporters saw the wrapped bodies of at least seven children. But in a statement, the US military claimed the strike in fact killed 20 insurgents." Retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey, NBC military analyst: "We are fighting in urban areas. This is a disaster for the innocent population."

Iraqi Sunni Vice President Warns Of "Chaos" If US Leaves. NBC Nightly News (12/9, lead story, 4:04, Maceda, 9.87M), reported, "Meanwhile, despite mixed reviews in Baghdad, the highest ranking Sunni in the Iraqi government called the Iraq Study Group's recommendations practical and workable but warned against any rapid pullout of US combat troops." Tariq al-Hashimi, Iraqi vice president: "I think immediate withdrawal means Iraq is going to slide into chaos." Maceda: "With yet another mortar attack killing several and dozens of Sunni executions daily many Iraqis say the slide into chaos already happened. It is this kind of turmoil that in Iraq, at least, that has come to define Rumsfeld's tenure of Secretary of Defense. We understand he will be away, uncharacteristically, from any cameras, marking the end of his tour."

Saddam's Nephew Escapes From Prison. The AP (12/10, Wagner) reports Ayman Sabawi, a nephew of Saddam Hussein who is "serving a life sentence for financing insurgents and possessing bombs escaped from prison Saturday in northern Iraq with the help of a police officer." His escape "underlined one of the problems facing the U.S. military as it tries to train enough Iraqi security personnel so U.S. troops can go home: the ability of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militiamen to infiltrate Iraqi police forces." Sabawi's father, who remains in Iraqi custody, had led Saddam's intelligence services. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) also reports the escape, saying it "might have been an inside job" rather than stating so outright: "Authorities are investigating whether night-shift guards helped him escape."

Iran Willing To Discuss Stabilizing Iraq If US Promises Troop Withdrawal. The New York Times (12/10, A18, Fattah, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "Just days after the Iraq Study Group recommended opening a dialogue with Tehran, Iran's foreign minister said his country would enter discussions on stabilizing Iraq only if the United States commits to a troop withdrawal." Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said publicly that Tehran "was open to dialogue as long as the United States 'changes its attitude,' and he asserted that the Americans were '50 percent to blame' for Iraq's violence." He is quoted saying, "The United States should help itself before anyone else. The first step is they have to say that they will be ready to leave Iraq." The

Times adds, "American officials at the meeting [where Mottaki spoke] doubted that Iran could improve the situation in Iraq, dismissing Mr. Mottaki's speech as posturing to put Iran's Arab neighbors at ease about the chances of a confrontation between Iran and the United States." In his remarks, Mottaki also "insisted that the United States stop campaigning against Iran's nuclear program."

The AP (12/10, Krane) says Mottaki "delivered a blunt challenge to the United States on Saturday, saying Tehran is willing to help U.S. troops withdraw from neighboring Iraq but only if Washington makes some tough policy changes." He "claimed U.S. troops were responsible for at least half the violence tearing apart Iraq and that their departure would pay security dividends for the entire region." The AP calls the "forceful" speech "a challenge to U.S. interests in the Gulf and a strong display of the country's rising assertiveness in the face of U.S failures in the region."

Syrian Ambassador To US Explains Nation's Motivations In Iraq. In an op-ed contribution to the Washington Post (12/10, 690K), Syrian ambassador to the US Imad Moustapha writes, "Let us be clear: Syria is not looking for a 'deal' with the U.S. administration on any issue. ... . A rigorous and comprehensive approach is required. This approach should include a reconsideration of U.S. policy in Iraq, starting with the recognition of the necessity to include all parties involved: neighboring countries and all factions of the Iraqi political and social spectrum. ... A solution should also include U.S. acknowledgment that the majority of Iraqis regard the occupation as only exacerbating the situation and causing further violence and instability. A U.S. plan for withdrawal should be on the table."

Training Iraqis Could Endanger US Forces. The Washington Post (12/10, A19, Pincus, 690K) reports that the current concept of "embedding 11- to 15-member U.S. transition teams in Iraqi battalions" is believed so dangerous "that a group of potential replacements stand ready at Fort Riley, the U.S. Army base directing the program, for immediate shipment to Iraq if members of a deployed team are killed or wounded, Maj. Gen. Carter F. Ham, who runs the training program, told House members last week." The "high-risk" teams, "made up of highly qualified senior commissioned and noncommissioned officers, have specialties that include combat operations, intelligence, communications and logistics." The Post quotes the ISG's criticism of "hesitant" early training efforts by the US, resulting in "Iraqi army units [that] are questionable loyalty to the Baghdad government." Furthermore, "police units cannot control crime, and some, according to the report, 'routinely engage in sectarian violence.' The facilities protection service is 'incompetent, dysfunctional or subversive.'"

Combat Troops' Pullout Would Leave Most US Forces In Iraq. The New York Times (12/10, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "On any given day, according to military officers in Baghdad, only about 11 percent of the Army and Marine Corps personnel in Iraq are carrying out purely offensive operations. ... an analysis of the current numbers and tasks of American forces suggests that it will prove difficult to drop far below 100,000 by early 2008, and that 70,000 or more troops might have to stay for a considerable time." The New York Times (12/10, 1.16M) includes a graphic showing only 229 combat troops out "of every 1,000 [personnel] deployed."

Prices For Black-Market Weapons Surge Amidst "Iraq Chaos." The New York Times (12/10, A1, Chivers, 1.16M) reports in a pessimistic article on the Iraqi black market, "Weapon prices are soaring along with an expanding sectarian war, as more buyers push prices several times higher than those that existed at the time of the American-led invasion nearly four years ago. Rising prices, in turn, have encouraged an insidious form of Iraqi corruption -- the migration of army and police weapons from Iraqi state armories to black-market sales." A change since the US-led invasion is that "three types of American-issued weapons are now readily visible in shops and bazaars here as well: Glock and Walther 9-millimeter pistols, and pristine, unused Kalashnikovs from post-Soviet Eastern European countries."

Bereaved Military Families Divided On Iraq. ABC World News (12/9, story 7, 2:55, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "This split is deeply personal. It is the divide among parents whose children went to fight in Iraq and died there." ABC (Hendren): "Each day in Iraq, on average, two Americans are killed, most by roadside bombs. While the families of the fallen are joined in grief; they are deeply divided over calls to pull troops out of Iraq. ... Matthew Holley's father fears that if an American pullout leads to an all-out civil war, the death of his son only son will have served no purpose." Celeste Zappala: "The longer we stay, the more dead Americans there are." The Washington Post (12/10, A3, Davenport, Partlow, 690K) reports in an article hinting at falling support for the war, "As the country debates what's next for Iraq, many family members who have lost loved ones in the war are torn about what should happen and how the legacy of those who have died there will be affected. ... When the war began nearly four years ago, there was virtually unanimous support for it among military families. But as the country's belief in it has deteriorated, cracks have also begun to show among those who were its staunchest backers." Bereaved mothers are quoted expressing both points of view on the war.

NBC Profiles Marine, Remembers Fallen Soldier. NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 8, 2:04, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "We have an extraordinary look at what if is really like how one man is reacting to what he has seen and done there. He went to Iraq armed with a rifle and video camera. His story in his own words." Matthew Orth, former Marine: "My name is Matthew Orth. I am 22 years old and until recently I was a highly trained weapon of the United States Marine Corps. They called me a Scout Sniper. ... I felt very alone and scared because people don't understand what we go through over there. They expect to us come back the same people we were and we are not."

NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 12, 2:22, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) also reported, "We remember a soldier that made the ultimate sacrifice in Iraq. Donovan Watts spent more than half his life serving his country and changed the lives of countless young soldiers along the way. Today they gathered to honor him." NBC (Martin Savage): "You expect good things to be said about a soldier that dies for his country, but in this case of Command Sgt. Maj. Donovan Watts, it was how many that wanted to say them." Siegenthaler: "Just one of the more than 2,900 American stories that have ended in Iraq. We honor them all."

Commentators Turn Focus To Iraq. Today's op-ed pages are filled with reaction to the ISG report and the Bush Administration's Iraq policy. In a scathing New York Times (12/10, WK12, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich writes, "Its recommendations are bogus because the few that have any teeth are completely unattainable. Of course, it would be fantastic if additional Iraqi troops would stand up en masse after an infusion of new American military advisers. ... It would also be nice if we could all break the bank in Vegas. ... the Iraq Study Group isn't plotting a way forward but delaying the recognition of our defeat. Its real aim is to enact a charade of progress to pacify the public while Washington waits, no doubt in vain, for Mr. Bush to return to the real world." Rich warns that the lesson of Vietnam is that "As bad as things may seem now, they can yet become worse, and not just in Iraq. The longer we pretend that we have not lost there, the more we risk losing other wars we still may salvage, starting with Afghanistan."

In his Washington Post (12/10, 690K) column, David Broder writes that the ISG differs from President Bush and Prime Minister Blair on Iraq's problems: "Bush wants to step up the training and assistance for the nascent Iraqi army. The Iraq Study Group would offer more help -- economic, military and diplomatic -- only if the government in Baghdad began soon to repair its factional fights. ... one thing is clear. As Baker and Hamilton say, there is no other bipartisan blueprint for the future. Bush will reject it at his peril."

In his Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait likens President Bush to a boy in a "Twilight Zone" episode who "has fantastical powers. ... the adults around him can do nothing but cheerfully praise his decisions while they try to nudge him in a less destructive direction."

In his New York Times (12/10, WK12, 1.16M) column, David Brooks imagines the Middle East in 2007 after the US begins withdrawals from Iraq: "The essence of all this disorder was that the Arab nation-states lost control. Subnational groups — like Hezbollah and the Mahdi Army — and supranational groups — like loosely connected terror networks, the new Sunni and Shiite Leagues and the satellite television networks — went from strength to strength while central national governments toppled and fell. The collapse of national governments led to a power vacuum that the more authentic and deeply rooted social groups sought to fill. ... The spreading disorder vindicated an observation that the historian Michael Oren had once made: that there are really only three nations in the Muslim Middle East: Iran, Turkey and Egypt. The other nations are make-believe."

In his Washington Post (12/10, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland writes, "President Bush has finally heard some realistic, even brutal, ideas about finding a path out of Iraq. But few of them came from the politically interesting but strategically flawed Iraq Study Group's report. ... The most important event was the least conspicuous one," namely, "a visit to the White House on Monday by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the single most powerful Shiite political leader in Iraq. ... on Iraq, the study group repeats the fundamental error that this administration has made since overthrowing Saddam Hussein. That is to refuse to anticipate and then accept the logical -- in fact, inescapable -- consequences of U.S. actions."

In his column for the Washington Post (12/10, B7, 690K), Robert Kagan writes of the "very old debate" in America between an "expansive, idealistic, interventionist approach to the world" and "opposition to this grand vision." Kagan concludes, "The problem for those who have tried to steer the United States away from its long history of expansiveness, then and now, is that Americans' belief in the possibility of global transformation -- the 'messianic' impulse -- is and always has been the more dominant strain in the nation's character. It is rooted in the nation's founding principles and is the hearty offspring of the marriage between Americans' driving ambitions and their overpowering sense of righteousness."

In the New York Times (12/10, WK1, 1.16M) "Week In Review" section, the Times' Roger Cohen states, "It's hard to escape the conclusion that the [ISG] report treats Iraq as an existing country needing a quick fix in the name of resurgent American realism, rather than a still-to-be-born country that needs to be ushered into being in the name of American idealism." Despite the lack of national identity demonstrated by Shiite-dominated Iraqi forces, Cohen warns, "Iraq has to survive, not because it's lovely, or within sight of peace, but because it's the least bad solution. Its breakup would entail unfathomable horror:"

In the Washington Post (12/10, B1, 690K), scholar David Rothkopf writes, "The best we can hope for is an end to only this latest chapter of U.S. military involvement in the region. There is no getting out of the Middle East. Even if we leave now, we'll be back." Calling the Iraq war "Gulf War II," Rothkopf adds, "The Vietnam War offers an important lesson, as well as an important distinction. The lesson is that leaving a country is often much more complicated than entering it." Rothkopf warns of possible causes of a Gulf War III: "Clearly, the confrontation with Iran -- over its regional policies, support of terrorists and desire to acquire nuclear weapons -- tops the list. ... What if Jordan, Pakistan or Saudi Arabia fell into fundamentalist hands?"

In the New York Times Magazine (12/10)'s "The Way We Live Now" department, contributing writer James Traub observes, "Scholars and diplomats who have closely studied civil wars describe them almost as forces of nature, grinding on until the parties exhaust themselves, shredding bonds that cannot be stitched back together even long years after the killing stops. ... And you generally can't stop it either, as we are now learning in Iraq."

On a single page in today's "Week In Review" section, the New York Times (12/10, WK13, 1.16M) runs 12 brief op-eds on the Iraq Study Group report, each between 150 and 250 words in length.

Richard Perle of the American Enterprise Institute says "not a shred of evidence" is offered to support the ISG's claims that "Iran and Syria have an 'interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq,'" and that the report lacks "any serious reflection on the president's goal of encouraging the development of representative government in the despotic Arab world." And author and professor Fouad Ajami says "James Baker and Lee Hamilton would take us back to the past, for they are men of the past. … A 'wise man' who proposes to fix Iraq by returning the Golan Heights to Syria has missed the meaning of Iraq. This report describes a long-vanished Arab world: Its poverty is given away in its banal language, in that familiar assertion that all of history yields to the fixer's touch." Josef Joffe of Germany's Die Zeit says the "suggestion to 'engage' Iran and Syria to extricate the United States from the current Iraqi morass reflects a grievous misreading of those nations' ambitions and America's options." However, ex-British Special Representative to Iraq Jeremy Greenstock says "we cannot turn things around in Iraq without involving the entire region. Iran would be foolish to risk the emergence of a new autocracy in Iraq. Syria, only a secondary player in Iraq, has other priorities: the return of the Golan Heights within a decade."

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright says that "in the spirit" of the ISG recommendations, the Bush Administration "should make clear to Muslims throughout the Middle East that America will not take sides in the millennium-old Sunni-Shiite split." Council on Foreign Relations President Emeritus Leslie Gelb says the report, "for all its deftness and honesty…flees the hardest choices and leaves us without a credible strategy." Rory Stewart, a former British Foreign Service officer in Iraq, says the report "is refreshingly honest in its description of Iraq. But its recommendations are less reliable and in some cases dangerous," especially in saying a less successful Iraqi government should receive less outside support.

Ex-Assistant Secretary of Defense Bing West says that the ISG's calls for an "infusion of 20,000 advisers" may help "hold the country together," but Iraq's "police are in wretched shape, intimidated and poorly led," and Iraqi soldiers "trust American advisers more than their own government." But Andrew Exum, who led an Army Rangers platoon in Iraq, says "to increase the number of advisers while simultaneously decreasing the number of combat brigades is a recipe for disaster. The adviser teams embedded with Iraqi units will become increasingly vulnerable, and a smaller force left behind in Iraq will find itself called upon to fight the inevitable worsening of violence with far fewer troops." University of Chicago political scientist Robert Pape says a "large fraction of all American forces" should be moved "into staging areas outside Baghdad so that, within hours, tremendous air and ground power could suppress any major escalation in attacks against civilians. Over the next year, American ground troops should gradually pull back and their mission should evolve into a longer term, off-shore balancing strategy using naval and air forces and allies."

The Hoover Institution's Larry Diamond says "if we press all the components of the study group's approach to 'national reconciliation' -- like amnesty, a rollback of de-Baathification and a new bargain on oil and federalism -- while renouncing permanent military bases and clearly signaling our intent to withdraw militarily from Iraq over the next few years, it is possible that a deal can be had with a critical mass of the insurgency." However, Nathaniel Fick, a Marine infantry officer in Iraq and Afghanistan, says amnesty "must be offered only after United States forces have shifted their priority from conventional operations to an advisory role. It cannot occur with 141,000 potential targets in Iraq." It must also "forgive only past attacks, and cannot appear to sanction or legitimize future ones," and apply "only to Iraqis. Foreign fighters, with no legal standing in Iraq, cannot be eligible."

Taliban Establishes Rules Targeting Teachers.

The AP (12/9, Straziuso) reports that Taliban rules stipulate: "Teachers receive a warning, then a beating, and if they continue to teach must be killed. ... The new list of 30 rules, decided on during a high Taliban meeting in September or October and since circulated over the Internet, span from the organizational ... to the health conscious." Rule no. 25 "says teachers who ignore Taliban warnings will be killed."

DOJ:

Senate Confirms Paulose As Minnesota US Attorney. The AP (12/10) reports, "The U.S. Senate unanimously confirmed Rachel Paulose as the U.S. Attorney for Minnesota early Saturday." The AP continues, "The 33-year-old Paulose, of Eagan, had been acting U.S. attorney for about nine months. President Bush nominated her for the permanent job about four months ago." The AP adds, "Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said in a news release that he urged the Senate Judiciary Committee to allow full a Senate vote on Paulose before the Senate adjourned early Saturday. … Paulose met Wednesday with outgoing Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minn., and got his support. However, it appeared that the Senate session would end before it took up her confirmation. … 'It would have been a shame to see such a capable, experienced nominee fail to get a chance for confirmation, and I am very excited we were able to get her nomination through the Senate before adjournment,' Coleman said a news release." The AP notes, "Paulose was a federal prosecutor in Minnesota from 1999 to 2002 and then worked in private practice for the Dorsey & Whitney law firm in Minneapolis. … Before 1999, she worked in the Justice Department as an attorney general's honors program trial attorney for the Civil Rights Division."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Rent-Way Head Comes Clean With SEC About Accounting Scandal. The New York Times (12/10, Duhigg) reports, "Near midnight on a Friday in 2000, William E. Morgenstern, the chief executive of Rent-Way, one of the nation's largest rent-to-own retailers, was preparing for bed when a woman called to warn him that the company he had built from scratch was about to fall apart." The Times continues, "In the days before that call, Mr. Morgenstern had been scrambling to reconcile discrepancies he had discovered in Rent-Way's books. He had much at stake. Since its founding in 1981 in Erie, Pa., Rent-Way had grown into a national powerhouse by renting furniture and electronics to low-income consumers through more than 1,100 stores. .. .The stock price had tripled since its initial offering in 1993, making Mr. Morgenstern a Wall Street darling and propelling dozens of Erie families who had invested in the company to sudden wealth." The Times adds, "When he discovered the accounting problems, Mr. Morgenstern initially hoped for a quick explanation. But interviews with executives led to more questions. Then came the midnight phone call: a weeping employee told him that for three years Mr. Morgenstern's top deputies had forced her to cook Rent-Way's books. .. .Mr. Morgenstern then called the company's lawyer in a panic. What, he asked, should they do? … Over the following years, similar dilemmas would arise at Enron, WorldCom, Tyco and dozens of other companies. Today, hundreds of executives are anxiously discussing how hard they should look for evidence of options backdating or other accounting problems." The Times notes, "At companies where far lesser frauds or malfeasance emerge, executives face an even more ticklish quandary: Should they reveal everything, and then confront the hazards of bad publicity and outside investigations, or clean things up and hope that the problems will evaporate unnoticed? Rent-Way's own journey, which came to a head last month, offers a chilling lesson: Even the most virtuous decisions have unforeseen, often damaging, consequences, and full disclosure may create as many problems as it solves. … Rent-Way's board made a decision within days of detecting the fraud — Mr. Morgenstern called the Securities and Exchange Commission and revealed everything. The company would turn over documents typically protected by attorney-client privilege, he said. He then invited the S.E.C. to set up an office at Rent-Way's headquarters to conduct an on-site investigation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Releases 2005 Statistics On Death Row Population And Executions. The AP (12/9) reports, "Fewer prison inmates were moved to death row in 2005, according to a federal study that shows one more person was executed than in the year before. Four states — California, Texas, Florida and Pennsylvania — held half of the 3,254 inmates awaiting execution at the end of 2005, the study by the Bureau of Justice Statistics showed. There were 37 death row inmates in federal prisons at that time. Sixteen states executed 60 prisoners last year, one more inmate than in 2004. Overall, however, the number of inmates on death row on Dec. 31, 2005, or the number of inmates moved there during the year dipped."

Virginia Enlists Volunteers To Witness Executions. The Washington Post (12/10, A1, Rondeaux, 690K) reports, "It's been 70 years since executions in the United States were open to the public. But in Virginia, there is always someone watching, turning what is for most people a distinctly private moment into a very public end. One of more than a dozen death penalty states that require ordinary citizens to witness executions, Virginia has enlisted hundreds of volunteers for the task. … For nearly 100 years, broad public support for capital punishment has helped the Virginia Department of Corrections maintain a rotating list of about 20 to 30 volunteers, although only six are required to witness each execution."

Alaskan Tribes Worried That DNA Research Could Threaten Land Rights, Beliefs. The New York Times (12/10, Harmon) reports from South Naknek, Alaska, "The National Geographic Society's multimillion-dollar research project to collect DNA from indigenous groups around the world in the hopes of reconstructing humanity's ancient migrations has come to a standstill on its home turf in North America." The Times continues, "Billed as the 'moon shot of anthropology,' the Genographic Project intends to collect 100,000 indigenous DNA samples. But for four months, the project has been on hold here as it scrambles to address questions raised by a group that oversees research involving Alaska natives." The Times adds, "At issue is whether scientists who need DNA from aboriginal populations to fashion a window on the past are underselling the risks to present-day donors. Geographic origin stories told by DNA can clash with long-held beliefs, threatening a world view some indigenous leaders see as vital to preserving their culture. … They argue that genetic ancestry information could also jeopardize land rights and other benefits that are based on the notion that their people have lived in a place since the beginning of time." The Times notes, "Such situations have not come up, and officials with the Genographic Project discount them as unlikely. Spencer Wells, the population geneticist who directs the project, says it is paternalistic to imply that indigenous groups need to be kept from the knowledge that genetics might offer. … But indigenous leaders point to centuries of broken promises to explain why they believe their fears are not far-fetched. Scientific evidence that American Indians or other aboriginal groups came from elsewhere, they say, could undermine their moral basis for sovereignty and chip away at their collective legal claims."

Alaska Corruption Probe Widens. The Anchorage Daily News (12/10, Mauer) reports, "The director of a Juneau-based salmon fishing group said last week he has been ordered by a federal grand jury investigating Alaska corruption to turn over lobbying and consulting records involving state Senate President Ben Stevens and former congressional aide Trevor McCabe, an Anchorage lawyer." The News continues, "The grand jury subpoena, issued last month, also seeks records on the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, a nonprofit federal-grant distribution corporation set up by Ben Stevens' father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. … The executive director of the Juneau salmon group responding to the subpoena, Robert Thorstenson Jr., serves on the marketing board. Thorstenson said he and a partner, Juneau and Seattle lawyer Rob Zuanich, rent space to the board for its Juneau office." The News adds, "In a telephone interview Thursday from Seattle, Thorstenson said the subpoena to Southeast Alaska Seiners Association arrived last month after he was contacted by agents from the FBI and the National Marine Fisheries Service. The subpoena said the grand jury was investigating felony crimes, Thorstenson said. … The subpoena appears to document a widening of the federal corruption investigation in Alaska, which burst into public view in August with dramatic raids of the offices of six legislators, including Ben Stevens. Agents returned to search Stevens' offices Sept. 18." The News notes, "On Wednesday, a federal grand jury indicted Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, on seven counts charging extortion, bribery, conspiracy and money laundering. The charges describe a scheme in which money was allegedly funneled to Anderson through a shell company in 2004 in exchange for actions he took as a legislator to benefit a private prison company. He pleaded not guilty Friday. … In the August legislative office searches, subpoenas and search warrants indicated the government's focus was on the relationships between legislators, oil and gas legislation, and the politically active oil field service and construction company Veco and its chairman, Bill Allen."

Lawmakers Not Surprised By Anderson's Arrest. The Anchorage Daily News (12/10, Hopkins) reported, "Other state legislators said Friday that they weren't surprised by state Rep. Tom Anderson's arrest this week -- his name had been grinding through the capital rumor mill ever since the FBI raided legislative offices weeks ago -- and many said they wouldn't be surprised if there are more indictments to come. … 'It could go beyond Tom. There's an expectation that that could be true,' said North Pole Rep. John Coghill, who is House majority leader. 'You don't have the FBI come looking around without some ramification.'" However, legislators and Gov. Sarah Palin "were quick to say that Anderson is innocent until proven guilty."

Faith-Based Prison Programs Proliferate Despite Adverse Rulings. The New York Times (12/10, A1, Henriques, Lehren, 1.16M), in an front-page article titled, "Religion For A Captive Audience, Paid For By Taxes," reports, "Life was different in Unit E at the state prison outside Newton, Iowa.. … There were occasional movies and events with live bands and real-world food. Best of all, there were opportunities to see loved ones in an environment quieter and more intimate than the typical visiting rooms. But the only way an inmate could qualify for this kinder mutation of prison life was to enter an intensely religious rehabilitation program and satisfy the evangelical Christians running it that he was making acceptable spiritual progress. The program — which grew from a project started in 1997 at a Texas prison with the support of George W. Bush, who was governor at the time — says on its Web site that it seeks 'to 'cure' prisoners by identifying sin as the root of their problems' and showing inmates 'how God can heal them permanently, if they turn from their sinful past.'" The Times adds that for Robert W. Pratt, chief judge of the federal courts in the Southern District of Iowa, "this all added up to an unconstitutional use of taxpayer money for religious indoctrination, as he ruled in June in a lawsuit challenging the arrangement." The Times notes that since 2000, courts "have cited more than a dozen programs for having unconstitutionally used taxpayer money to pay for religious activities or evangelism aimed at prisoners, recovering addicts, job seekers, teenagers and children. Nevertheless, the programs are proliferating. … But some constitutional lawyers say new federal rules may bar the government from imposing any special requirements for how faith-based programs are audited."

Missing Florida Baby Was Kidnapped By Coyotes For Ransom. The Naples Daily News (12/10, Batista) reported that "baby Bryan Dos Santos Gomes apparently was not kidnapped by a woman seeking to replace her child but as ransom to force the parents to pay the 'coyote' who smuggled them into the United States. … Police say the parents fell behind in their payments to the smugglers and that Bryan is being held as ransom. They said they believe the 1-month-old infant is still being taken care of." The Daily News noted, "The information came from various tips called in to the police department."

US Steel Industry Attracting Foreign Bids. The Baltimore Sun (12/10, Connolly) reports, "Five years ago, there would have been few takers for the steel plants in Sparrows Point and Weirton, W.Va. … Bethlehem Steel Corp., which owned Sparrows Point at the time and was once the largest steelmaker in the world, was in its death throes, joining the list of Rust Belt companies that buckled under the weight of high costs and fierce competition. … But if either plant goes up for sale early next year, there could be multiple bids for each. And there's a good chance the buyer won't be American." The Sun continues, "After years of bankruptcy and rampant consolidation, American steel is suddenly hot. Foreign companies have the cash, and are looking to get a foothold in the American market, where they can charge a premium for their product. … It started with Mittal Steel Co. NV chief executive Lakshmi N. Mittal's quest to build the largest steelmaker in the world. Two years ago, he bought International Steel Group, which itself had been built on the carcasses of defunct companies, including Bethlehem's Sparrows Point complex and Weirton. This year, Netherlands-based Mittal successfully waged a hostile takeover of the world's second-largest steel company, Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA. … The combined company, Arcelor Mittal, will control 10 percent of the world's steel production, with more than 110 million tons this year. The $33.5 billion deal, which is expected to be completed in the spring, is the largest to date." The Sun notes, "Following Mittal's lead, steel companies from Europe, Russia, South America and Asia in recent weeks have been circling U.S. companies. … In the past, foreigners stayed away from American companies because they had higher costs and unionized work forces. … But now, after an industry shakeout, American steel companies are more efficient than ever. For example, Sparrows Point's nearly 2,500 workers produce 3 million tons of steel a year. That's more output per worker than in 1969, when 26,500 workers produced 5 million tons a year. … And, many no longer carry 'legacy costs,' having shed their health care and pension obligations for retirees during bankruptcy, as was the case with Bethlehem Steel."

EU Launches Antitrust Probe Of Universal-BMG Deal. The AP (12/10, White) reports, "EU regulators have opened an antitrust probe of Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for about $2.1 billion, saying the deal could damage 'the already concentrated music publishing market.'" The AP continues, "Officials in Brussels said Friday that they would issue a final decision about whether to block or allow the deal by April 27." The AP adds, "BMG - owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG - has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers. … Paris-based Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group is the world's largest music company. Its publishing arm controls the rights to songs by artists such as 50 Cent, Mary J. Blige and Chamillionaire." The AP notes, "If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs, giving them a 22 percent market share and scraping ahead of current market leader EMI. … European Union approval was the last hurdle for the deal, which the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department in the United States cleared last month. … The EU rarely blocks deals, but it can, and often does, demand that companies under investigation sell units or make binding promises to change the way they do business."

Future Of Delta-US Air Merger Unclear. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/10, Hirschman) reports, "A marriage of Delta Air Lines and US Airways would be a setback for Augusta, say business and civic leaders who fear putting all local airline service in the hands of a single carrier. … 'Limited competition is better than no competition,' said Diane Johnson, marketing director at Augusta Regional Airport. 'When you have no competition, fares rise and reliability goes down the tubes.'" The AJC continues, "Augusta, along with Fayetteville, Wilmington and Jacksonville, N.C.; Lynchburg, Va.; Wilmington, Del., and Florence, S.C., could go from two airlines to one if US Airways succeeds in its $8.4 billion bid to acquire Delta. … Augusta, a historic city on the South Carolina border, has five daily flights to Atlanta on a Delta regional partner and six to Charlotte on US Airways Express." The AJC adds, "US Airways plans a 10 percent capacity cut and $1.6 billion in annual savings if it gets creditor and regulatory approval to merge the airlines, but it hasn't identified which routes, if any, will be cut. Industry officials say there would be little reason for the combined airline to operate two Southeastern hubs, however, and Charlotte flights could shrink dramatically. .. .Even if Augusta routes were maintained, business leaders there say the absence of competition would allow the airline to raise fares with impunity —- a move they say would push Augusta residents to drive to airports in Columbia or Atlanta."

The Arizona Daily Star (12/10, Hogan) reports, "If Tempe-based US Airways is successful in executing its proposed $8.7 billion hostile takeover of bankrupt Delta Air Lines, it will become the largest U.S. airline and one of the biggest in the world. … It's a big 'if.'" The Star continues, "Delta, first of all, doesn't want to be acquired — at least its chief executive officer and its pilots don't. Its creditors — at least the biggest ones — haven't weighed in yet. … And we haven't yet heard from U.S. regulators, US Airways shareholders and politicians, who together or separately can make or break the deal." The Star adds, "While US Airways Chairman Doug Parker stunned everyone from Wall Street analysts to Delta officials when he announced the proposed merger Nov. 15, the company had clearly been plotting it for some time. … Parker had already lined up financial backing and answers for all the concerns. And once the news was out, he quickly tried to line up supporters among those who have a stake, if not a say, in whether the merger happens. … There is no consensus about whether the merger could happen or should happen, but most agree on the big issues that need to be addressed: antitrust concerns; employees and jobs; financing; headquarters and air hubs; and any impact on passengers."

Reid Worked To Quash Dairy That Provided Cheap Milk In Southwest. The Washington Post (12/10, Morgan, Cohen, Gaul, 690K) reports on its front page that in 2003, a "maverick dairyman," Hein Hettinga, "started bottling his own milk and selling it for as much as 20 cents a gallon less than the competition, exercising his right to work outside the rigid system that has controlled U.S. milk production for almost 70 years. … That was when a coalition of giant milk companies and dairies, along with their congressional allies, decided to crush Hettinga's initiative. For three years, the milk lobby spent millions of dollars…and made deals with lawmakers, including incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid. Last March, Congress passed a law reshaping the Western milk market and essentially ending Hettinga's experiment -- all without a single congressional hearing." According to the Post, Reid "made his move on Dec. 16 [2205], with the Senate chamber nearly empty. He brought up the milk bill, which passed a few minutes later by 'unanimous consent,' a procedure that requires no debate or roll call vote if both political parties agree."

Local Governments Take Initiative On Anti-Global Warming Measures. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, A1, Simon, 850K) reports, "Frustrated with the federal response to global warming, hundreds of cities, suburbs and rural communities across the nation have taken bold steps to slash their energy consumption and reduce emissions of the pollutants that cause climate change. … The movement began nearly two years ago, when Seattle Mayor Greg Nickels announced that his city would strive to meet the targets of the Kyoto Protocol." President Bush "rejected the goals of the Kyoto treaty soon after he took office, calling it ineffective and unfair. … Determined to prove him wrong, Nickels challenged his fellow mayors to adopt Kyoto's targets at the local level. He has received more than 330 pledges from mayors representing 54 million people. All have vowed to reduce their cities' emissions below 1990 levels within the next several years."

WPost Welcomes Inhofe's Ouster From Environment Committee Chair. The Washington Post (12/10, B6, 690K) editorializes, "the last hearing on global climate change chaired by Sen. James M. Inhofe provided an excellent and public tutorial on why Americans should be grateful that it was, in fact, his last. … He has used his time at the committee's helm to cast spurious doubts on the problem even as the scientific consensus about its reality and severity has gelled."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Trentadue Continues Quest To Prove Neo-Nazis Conspired With McVeigh. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Chicago Tribune (12/10, Witt) reported, "Another envelope from the FBI landed in Jesse Trentadue's mailbox last week, bearing a copy of another secret memo from the FBI's investigation into the Oklahoma

DOJ_NMG_0104632

City bombing more than a decade ago. Like thousands of other pages that the Salt Lake City lawyer has extracted from the government over the years via a series of lawsuits and Freedom of Information Act requests, this latest document was heavily censored to obscure the names of most suspects and informants. But a few key words stood out among all the ones that had been covered over: 'Aryan Nations' and 'explosives' and 'bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building.' By itself, the three-page document was no smoking gun. But read alongside all the others that overflow Trentadue's file cabinets, the FBI memo was another small piece of a puzzle he has been doggedly trying to solve: whether neo-Nazi conspirators helped Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols…and whether federal government agents failed to heed warnings of the scheme." Trentadue told the Tribune, "The FBI had informants in these groups all over the country. So they knew more than they have ever said about McVeigh and the bank robbers and who else may have been involved in the Oklahoma City bombing."

IMMIGRATION:

Localities Struggling With Influx Of Illegal Immigrants. The Newark Star-Ledger (NJ) (12/10, Donohue) reports, "With Congress deadlocked over how to handle illegal immigration, a growing number of towns and cities are taking matters into their own hands, using local laws to crack down on the problems associated with a massive underground population." The Star-Ledger continues, "In New Jersey, some towns have toughened traffic laws to deter contractors from picking up day laborers on city streets. Others have tried to ban workers from gathering on street corners to wait for work. Several have launched housing code crackdowns to combat overcrowding. One has banned illegal immigrants from renting apartments altogether. … And few, if any, are having much success." The Star Ledger adds, "In a growing number of towns, local crackdowns are faltering amid court challenges, political opposition or other hurdles. … Consider: … The Borough of Bound Brook launched a series of housing raids to address rampant overcrowding in homes rented mostly by Latino immigrants in the late 1990s. But the U.S. Justice Department sued the town for illegally targeting Hispanics, resulting in a 2004 consent decree requiring the town to repay victims $425,000, hire a bilingual housing coordinator and make dramatic changes to its housing and zoning practices. … Freehold Borough's housing crackdown and an effort to shut down a day laborer gathering area were challenged in a lawsuit filed by immigrant rights groups. In a settlement last month, the borough agreed to pay $278,000, change its housing inspection procedures and allow laborers to gather on public property. … In July, the Township of Riverside in Burlington County passed a law fining employers and landlords who hire or rent apartments to illegal immigrants. In local elections last month, the Republican mayor and council member who pushed the measure were swept from office. With legal fees mounting from a pair of lawsuits challenging the law, Mayor Charles Hilton -- the man who proposed the law -- is calling for its repeal."

Mexico's Low Wages Blamed For Spurring Wave Of Immigrants. The Arizona Republic (12/10, Hawley) reports, "Welcome to a typical life in Mexico: a world of long hours, low pay and prices that are much higher than in the United States. It is those economic pressures that drive Mexicans to the United States and that lie at the heart of the illegal immigration problem. Mexicans do not come to the United States because they can't find jobs at home. In fact, unemployment in Mexico is currently lower than in the United States, at about 3.6 percent. Some 95 percent of newly arrived Mexican migrants had jobs before they came to the United States, according to a 2005 survey by the Pew Hispanic Center. But in Mexico, having a job does not necessarily mean being paid well or even being paid well enough to make ends meet. The average Mexican household earns $7,297 a year in wages, according to the government. But because 39 percent of Mexico's wealth is concentrated in 10 percent of the population, most people actually earn less than the national average. In fact, 82 percent of Mexicans earn less than $21 per workday."

Irish Illegals' Amnesty Demand Noted. In his New York Times (12/10, WK11, 1.16M) column, Lawrence Downes writes, "To roars and applause" Sen. Charles Schumer "swept into the packed church auditorium, levitating on a cloud of affection. … This happy moment was a rally by Irish immigrants. … 'The more Irish there are in America, the better we all are!' Mr. Schumer declared, repeating a line he had caught some flak about a few months before. Some non-Irish immigrants had grumbled about how unlikely it would be to hear another group's name tucked into that equation." Downes adds, "'We Are America' is the Latinos' and Asians' cry. The well-organized Irish don't feel the need to say that. Their slogan, on T-shirts and the Irish Lobby's Web site, is blunt: 'Legalize the Irish.' The Irish have a just cause, but I only wish they and their many friends would preach the gospel of immigration reform in a bigger tent. It is, after all, every immigrant group's fate to start out in this country unloved, as the Irish are only too eager to remind us."

TAX:

LATimes Blames TurboTax Lobbyists For ReadyReturn's Demise. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K) editorializes, "State number-crunchers are going to go over your tax return anyway, calculating whether you sent in too much or too little. What if they did their figuring beforehand and sent you a return already completed except for your signature? If you don't like what they came up with, or you don't trust them, you can throw it out and file the old-fashioned way, no questions asked. But if you have relatively simple finances and the state's calculation looks right to you, you could take advantage of ReadyReturn, a service of the Franchise Tax Board. … The Legislature killed the pilot program this year after intense pressure from Intuit Inc., maker of TurboTax, and other companies selling tax-preparation software and services. Thanks to them, there will be no ReadyReturn for the 2006 tax year."

DOJ_NMG_0104633

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Leahy Signals Increased Oversight Of DOJ. The Rutland (VT) Herald (12/10, Allen) reports, "Sen. Patrick Leahy is about to begin his 33rd year as the only Democrat to represent Vermont in the U.S. Senate, but it might as well be his first." The Herald continues, "Even after a long day in the halls of Congress, Leahy couldn't contain his excitement over returning to work in a chamber dominated, for the fourth time in his career, by his party. … 'I see the Senate getting back to where it's supposed to be – the conscience of the nation,' Leahy said in a phone interview. 'The nation has not been helped by being a rubber stamp.'" The Herald adds, "Leahy, other Democrats and some stalwarts of the GOP have accused the Republican-controlled 109th Congress of being a rubber stamp for the president's agenda, ultimately allowing Bush to run afoul of the Constitution with impunity. .. But even under these circumstances, the Vermont senator has commanded power and attention. And that's due in part to his longevity in office. Leahy, a former Chittenden County prosecutor, won the 1974 election at age 34 and became the youngest Vermonter and the only member of his party ever elected to the U.S. Senate. Over the years, he has been a member of the minority periodically, from 1981 to 1987, again from 1995 to 2001, then from 2003 until last week. … Leahy is seventh on the Senate's seniority list, and he is considered to be among the top 10 most influential people on Capitol Hill. … And he's about to become more powerful. When Congress meets next month, Leahy will – for the second time – become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where he will control the flow and tenor of hearings over matters ranging from federal judicial appointments to oversight of the FBI and the Justice Department." The Herald notes, "Leahy hasn't officially laid out his agenda for the next two years, but anyone paying attention to last week's Judiciary Committee hearing on FBI oversight would be hard pressed to have missed where the senator is going. … 'The recent revelation that the Bush administration, since 9/11, has been compiling secret dossiers on millions of unwitting, law-abiding Americans who travel across our borders, highlights the importance of congressional oversight,' he said. 'It is simply incredible that the administration is willing to share this sensitive information with foreign governments and even private employers, while refusing to allow U.S. citizens to see or challenge the so-called terror score that the government has assigned them based on their travel habits and schedules. … This administration has gone to unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public, while at the same time collecting and compiling unprecedented amounts of information about every citizen.'"

Republican Control Of Congress Comes To An End After All-Night Session. The final hours of the 109th Congress, and of a dozen years of Republican control of the House, was covered by all three broadcast networks. In a brief report, ABC World News (12/9, story 3, 0:20, Weir, 8.78M) said the "109th Congress has been gaveled into history in their final hours under Republican control. The House and Senate worked practically all night, voting to extend $38 billion in tax breaks. But they left plenty of unfinished business for next month when the Democrats take over." NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 10, 0:24, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) also had a brief report, saying "the 109th Congress wrapped up with a flurry of votes" including the tax breaks and expanded Gulf of Mexico oil drilling.

The CBS Evening News (12/9, story 2, 2:20, Assuras, 7.66M) ran a longer, and more critical report, saying the "Republican-controlled 109th Congress adjourned early this morning without completing work on a new federal budget. Added together, the number of days the two Houses sat this year came to 235. That is fewer days than the do-nothing Congress that President Harry Truman ran against in 1948." The AP (12/9) says the session, "frustrated by partisanship and criticized for its meager record of accomplishment, ended with flurry of bill-passing and promises of change when Democrats take over the House and Senate in January."

The Washington Post (12/10, Weisman, 690K) says on its front page that "demoralized Republicans adjourned the 109th Congress at 5 a.m. yesterday with a near-empty Capitol, closing the door on a dozen years of nearly unbroken GOP control by spending more time in the final days lamenting their failures -- to rein in government, tame the deficit and temper their own lust for power -- than reliving their successes." The GOP "capped an era of conservative ascendance with the passage of business tax break extensions, a package of trade measures, and legislation to stave off physician-payment cuts they once trumpeted in their budget-cutting drive." The Post says that "measured against the ambitions of 1994, not much has changed." A second Washington Post (12/10, A5, Weisman, Barr, 690K) story says "last-minute Republican budget squabbles marred the final hours of a Congress already tainted by scandal, indictments and resignations, and ushered out Republican control on a discordant note."

The New York Times (12/10, A43, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "As they plowed through legislation in the early morning, Congress also whisked through a package of three major health care initiatives that continued a program for H.I.V. and AIDS that will provide more than $6 billion for care over three years, created an agency to centralize efforts against bioterrorism and restructured the National Institutes of Health. … Congress also adopted a measure intended to strengthen the ability to predict tsunamis. Lawmakers approved the first reorganization of the Postal Service in more than 30 years and sent Mr. Bush an agreement allowing the United States to share civilian nuclear technology with India." President Bush "praised Congress for delivering the last batch of bills, singling out the oil drilling, AIDS assistance and fisheries legislation, as well as the nuclear agreement with India and the elevated trade status for Vietnam."

Congress Overhauls Fishing Industry Regulations. The Washington Post (12/10, A8, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "Congress yesterday passed the broadest overhaul of the rules that govern the U.S. fishing industry in a decade, with provisions instructing fishery managers to adhere strictly to scientific advice so as not to deplete the ocean. The final language of the Magnuson-Stevens Act, which passed the Senate on Thursday and the House early yesterday, was a compromise between environmentalists and fishing interests. The measure mandates an end to overfishing of depleted species within 2 1/2 years and allows the selling and trading of shares in a fishery to promote conservation." The AP (12/9, Daly) reports President Bush "said Saturday the country is committed to ensuring strong commercial and recreational fishing, praising legislation that overhauls management of marine fisheries and strengthens protections against further depleting dwindling stocks."

Tax-And-Trade Package Compromises Disparate Items Left On GOP's Agenda. The Washington Post (12/10, A5, Weisman, Barr, 690K) reports, "The centerpiece of the closing hours' work was a tax-and-trade bill. The measure temporarily extended expiring tax breaks for business research and development and for hiring people off the welfare rolls, a partial college tuition deduction, and energy conservation incentives. It extended a generous deduction for state and local sales taxes that was slipped into a business tax law in 2004 as a temporary measure to win votes in states without income taxes but is taking on an air of permanence. The huge package also contained measures to permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti. The Haiti provision was strongly challenged by some Southern lawmakers, who said it would further erode jobs in their states' textile industries."

The New York Times (12/10, A43, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "The trade measure, a compendium of last-minute priorities sent to President Bush, was the chief legislative accomplishment of the final hours. It restored $38 billion in popular tax breaks; established normal trade relations with Vietnam and granted trade benefits to Haiti and four South American countries; and blocked a cut in Medicare payments to doctors. The measure also fulfilled a long-sought objective of Gulf Coast lawmakers and the oil industry by expanding offshore drilling opportunities in the eastern Gulf of Mexico and directing hundreds of millions of dollars in new royalties to the region. 'Just when everyone bet against us, Republicans put together a broad package of energy, tax, trade and health care measures,' said Senator Bill Frist."

Stopgap Funding Measure Approved. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K) reports, "As one of its final acts, Congress approved a stopgap measure keeping federal programs running at or slightly below current levels through Feb. 15. Bush signed it Saturday. The action was necessary because lawmakers failed to pass the annual spending bills covering the budget year that began Oct. 1, except those dealing with defense and homeland security."

Lewis Blasts Frist Over Failure To Pass Appropriations Bills. The New York Times (12/10, A43, Hulse, 1.16M) reports Rep. Jerry Lewis, outgoing chairman of the Appropriations Committee, in an "unusual public attack on a fellow Republican," said, "The breakdown of regular order this cycle — indeed the failure to get our bills done — should be squarely placed at the feet of the departing Senate majority leader who failed to schedule floor time for the consideration of appropriations bills."

State Sales Tax Break Expected To Save Texans $1 Billion Annually. The Houston Chronicle (12/10, Ivanovich, Mittelstadt, 530K) reports, "For residents in Texas and six other states without state income taxes, the bill ensures taxpayers who itemize will be able to deduct state and local sales taxes on their federal income tax forms, for tax years 2006 and 2007. The tax break, which will cost the Treasury $5.5 billion, will allow Texans to keep $2 billion over the next two years. This provision was an effort to approximate the benefit enjoyed by taxpayers in other states, who can deduct their state income taxes."

Democrats' Agenda Could Add Tens Of Billions Of Dollars To Deficit. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Havemann, 850K) reports, "Democrats' expansive vision of the government's role in American life is on a collision course with budget deficits that are already running about $250 billion a year. The Concord Coalition, a lobby for fiscal responsibility, warns that the deficit could reach $800 billion in 10 years if Congress enacts all the programs its members are talking about. In the education budget, for example, some leading Democrats have discussed cutting the interest rate on federally subsidized student loans in half — boosting the federal interest subsidy by an estimated $18 billion over five years — plus increasing Pell Grants for college students by 25% and raising funding for the No Child Left Behind program by as much as $16 billion. Among all the spending initiatives being discussed on Capitol Hill, perhaps none would cost so much so soon as closing the 'doughnut hole' in the new Medicare prescription drug program. … Having the federal government pick up those expenses would cost the Treasury an estimated $50 billion a year for the first 10 years."

Alternative Energy Firms Already Benefiting From Democrats' Return To Power. The New York Times (12/10, BU6, Alster, 1.16M) reports, "some analysts and money managers are hoping the imminent Democratic takeover of Congress will also be bullish for alternative energy stocks by improving prospects for favorable legislation for the industry. One likely initiative, known as a national renewable portfolio standard, would require utilities to derive 10 percent of their electricity output from renewable sources by 2020. Currently, less than 3 percent of electricity is generated from such sources. Senator Jeff Bingaman…the presumptive chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, says he hopes to pass 'some version' of a renewable portfolio standard in the next Congress. The details of such legislation — as well as whether it would be approved by Congress and signed by President Bush — are very much uncertain. But that hasn't stopped investors from placing their bets."

WPost Criticizes Proposed Closed-Door Meeting Of Senate. The Washington Post (12/10, B6, 690K), in an editorial, notes that incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "plans to open the 110th Congress with a closed gathering of all 100 senators. We're all for senators getting to know each other. But when they meet as the Senate, it should be in public. Reducing gridlock depends on more senators putting the public good ahead of the two-year electoral cycle, not on cooking up more deals behind closed doors."

Bush Said To Be "Locked In A Lethal Downward Spiral." The New York Daily News (12/10, DeFrank, 729K) writes, "For a wounded President locked in a lethal downward spiral ever since his reelection, it was the cruelest week of all. Not since Bill Clinton forlornly insisted that 'the President is still relevant' after being trounced in the 1994 mid-term elections has a President struggled so hard to salvage his political traction. In 72 hours last week, a bipartisan commission harshly repudiated Bush's Iraq policy. Incoming Secretary of Defense Robert Gates told senators the U.S. isn't winning the war. Then a British journalist snarkily asked at a White House press conference if Bush weren't 'in denial' about Iraq. For good measure, a new poll found only 27% of Americans back his Iraq policy, a new low. And a moderate GOP senator termed the policy 'absurd' and possibly criminal." A "well-placed Bush source who talks with the President often" said, "He'll be fine but he can't be doing very good. It's been a terrible year, and it keeps getting worse." But the President "is described by another recent visitor as still resolutely defiant, convinced history will ultimately vindicate him."

Dinner With Abramoff Could Further Complicate Myers Nomination. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Weinstein, 850K) reports, "Five years ago…Jack Abramoff went to a dinner with top officials of the Interior Department, representatives of the White House and leaders of the National Mining Assn. That Georgetown dinner has now come back to haunt one of the guests -- William G. Myers III, who was the Interior Department's top lawyer at the time and for the last three years one of President Bush's most controversial nominees for a federal judgeship. Last week, Myers was asked to explain why he testified earlier to the Senate Judiciary Committee that he had never met Abramoff. … Immediately after the November midterm election, Bush announced his intention to renominate Myers." However, "In recent days…questions have arisen about Myers' March 2005 response to a query by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democratic on the judiciary committee. Leahy asked Myers whether he had ever had any contact with Abramoff. … 'I have searched my memory and files,' Myers responded. 'To the best of my recollection, I have never had any contact with Mr. Abramoff." The Times continues, "A week ago, however, the Denver Post published a story based on information obtained under the Freedom of Information Act showing that Myers was among two dozen people attending the dinner on Sept. 24, 2001, with Abramoff."

Cardin Adjusting To "Peculiar Customs" Of Senate. The Washington Post (12/10, C4, Mosk, 690K) reports Sen.-elect Ben Cardin "is still adjusting to the peculiar customs of his new job. But in the unmarked basement warren of transition offices for new members," Cardin "said he is brimming with plans. 'I'm not coming to the Senate to retire,' said Cardin, 63, when asked about the charge that his Republican opponent, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, frequently leveled during a year of campaigning. 'I'm going to be very busy. And I won't waste a minute.'" Cardin "will find himself in the thick of deliberations over the Iraq war as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and will serve on panels that deal with the budget, the environment, minority business and judicial appointments."

SMU Reportedly Frontrunner For Bush Presidential Library. The Houston Chronicle (12/10, A1, Korosec, 530K) reports, "Three Texas universities are hoping to land the George W. Bush presidential library, and each is calling in its own heavy hitters and Bush backers to try to make the case. Baylor touts its location, Southern Methodist University its personal ties and the University of Dallas its spacious site. The president's library site-selection committee, which has been working entirely in private, could choose a winner among the three finalists as early as next month. SMU, Laura Bush's alma mater, has been widely considered the frontrunner since the first lady told the Houston Chronicle in a 2005 interview that the school is her sentimental favorite."

Space Shuttle Discovery Successfully Lifts Off. The New York Times (12/10, A41, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports, "Night became day on Saturday as the shuttle Discovery muscled its way off of the launching pad with a shuddering roar on a mission to rewire the International Space Station. With a blinding streak of yellow flame that left a mark on the retina and a lump in the throat, the shuttle and its crew of seven astronauts lifted off at 8:47 p.m. in the program's first nighttime launching in more than four years." The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Johnson, 850K) reports launch director Mike Leinbach "said the successful launch was the best sign yet that NASA had fully recovered from the Columbia disaster. 'We're getting back in the groove. We're getting back in business,' Leinbach said. NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin said the launch marked another milestone in finishing the space station and going beyond. The Houston Chronicle (12/10, Carreau, 530K) reports in its front-page story that Griffin said the program was back on track and, "On average we want to fly every two months."

The Washington Post (12/10, A20, Harwood, 690K) adds, "The brilliant light of the takeoff illuminated the shuttle's heat shield in the first two minutes of flight. But engineers will not be able to assess the health of the protective tiles until a detailed inspection Sunday by the astronauts and again during final approach to the space station Monday. Discovery's mission is considered the most complex station assembly flight yet attempted and one of the most complicated in manned spaceflight history."

LATimes Says Moon Program Not Worth Cost. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K) editorializes, "When it comes to poetic vision, 'Fly Me to the Moon' has it all over 'Global Precipitation Mission.' But the prosaic and twice-delayed NASA meteorology project would conduct a useful scientific study of Earth weather. A return to the moon is a romantic but expensive mission in search of a purpose." The Times adds, "Even NASA's 'Why the Moon?' website doesn't really explain it." It contends, "For too long, NASA has been overspending on manned flight and under-funding scientific study. Vital missions to study the Earth's climate, for example, have been delayed for years or indefinitely. An unmanned scientific mission to scan for Earth-like planets in nearby solar systems, scheduled to launch in 2011, has been postponed until 2015."

Missile Defense System Takes Shape In Alaska. The New York Times (12/10, A36, Yardley, 1.16M) reports from Fort Greely, Alaska, "Four years after President Bush ordered a limited missile defense system to be built and nearly a quarter century after Ronald Reagan first proposed the Strategic Defense Initiative, this sub-Arctic outpost, once a cold war training site and still a cold-weather training site, is where progress on the long-embattled missile system is perhaps most evident, military officials say. Eleven interceptor missiles are installed in underground silos here, buried beneath the snow and a former forest of black spruce."

Top USAF Lawyer Had Been Practicing 23 Years Without License. The Washington Post (12/10, A22, Ricks, 690K) reports, "A top Air Force lawyer who served at the White House and in a senior position in Iraq turns out to have been practicing law for 23 years without a license. Col. Michael D. Murphy was most recently commander of the Air Force Legal Operations Agency at Bolling Air Force Base in the District." Murphy "was relieved of his command at Bolling on Nov. 30 after the Air Force learned that he had been disbarred for professional misconduct in Texas in 1984 but hadn't informed his superiors."

Jefferson Easily Wins Reelection In LA2 Runoff. The Washington Post/AP (12/10, A10, Burdeau) reports voters in Louisiana's Second District "looked past a federal bribery investigation" and reelected eight-term incumbent Rep. William Jefferson Saturday. In a runoff election in the New Orleans district, "Jefferson grabbed a commanding lead over state Rep. Karen Carter, a fellow Democrat, almost as soon as the polls closed." With 96% of precincts reporting, Jefferson had 57% of the vote, and Carter 43%.

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/10) says that, "confounding political pundits and a slew of rivals who had become confident of his defeat," Jefferson "neatly sidestepped" the "roiling federal corruption probe. … Guilty pleas by aides and associates who admitted to bribing the congressman and the revelation in court documents that FBI agents had found $90,000 in marked bills stuffed into Jefferson's freezer had put the scent of blood in political waters." The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Simmons, 850K) says "voter turnout was only about 16% on what turned out to be a cold and windy election day." Roll Call (12/10, Kurtz) also runs the news of Jefferson's reelection on its website this morning.

The Time-Picayune story was typical of the nationwide news coverage of Jefferson's reelection, all of which noted the details of the ongoing federal investigation – including the cash found by FBI agents in Jefferson's freezer. The Baton Rouge Advocate (12/10, Gyan) reported, "Jefferson made no mention of the federal investigation in his victory party remarks," but "he told a small group of supporters that he hopes to build on his 'record of effectiveness and record of productivity in Congress.' … Jefferson said it is now time to unite the East and West banks, black and white, rich and poor in order to speed up the area's recovery and 'get our people back home.'" In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/10, A10, Burdeau) added, "In her concession speech, Carter embraced family members and pledged to work with Jefferson, particularly on the area's recovery from Hurricane Katrina. 'I guess the people are happy with the status quo,' she said."

The New York Times (12/10, Nossiter) reported that Jefferson "was heavily favored in black precincts, and Saturday's result suggested that his loyal constituents ignored the accusations of an F.B.I. investigation and rallied around him, as they had in the past and as the congressman had pleaded with them to do. He has not been charged with anything, and vigorously maintains his innocence. … Analysts were surprised at Mr. Jefferson's victory. 'It's not good for the city, and it's not good for the state,' said Susan Howell, a political scientist at the University of New Orleans."

Black Voters, Skeptical Of FBI Probe, Elated By Jefferson Victory. Under the headline "New Orleans Voters Support Their Man Over F.B.I.," the New York Times (12/11, Nossiter) reports, "Outside the Greater St. Stephen Full Gospel Baptist Church, there was no surprise on Sunday at the re-election of…Jefferson, only satisfaction. The late-night comedians could joke all they wanted about the $90,000 that the Federal Bureau of Investigation said it found in Mr. Jefferson's freezer and that the agency said was bribe money. White New Orleans could tut-tut at the seamy portrait outlined by the F.B.I. in its investigation of him, and at the guilty pleas of two associates of Mr. Jefferson, who is a black Democrat. Supporters in the broken-down, crime-plagued Central City neighborhood here saw another picture: of a godly man persecuted by a racially biased government." The Times notes University of New Orleans Prof. Susan Howell said, "The background to this is the cultural divide between blacks and whites, and their different attitude to law enforcement."

Jefferson Brushes Off Election-Night Questions About Investigation. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/11, Burdeau) reports Jefferson "on Sunday savored a landslide win in the comfort of supporters and family, and put to rest a grueling campaign that shined the spotlight on an FBI bribery investigation overshadowing his long political career. Analysts said his victory was stunning and defied conventional thinking that averred he could not retain his seat and overcome allegations the FBI found $90,000 in bribe money in his freezer." The AP adds, "With the race in his pocket, Jefferson shrugged off questions from reporters about the FBI probe at his re-election party…where supporters gloated over the victory by chanting his name and jeering Carter when she appeared on television to give her concession speech. Asked if he plans to explain his side of the story, something he has promised to do, Jefferson said: 'I'm done with that. I've talked to the voters and they're very happy.'"

New Orleans Democrats Call For Pelosi To Return Jefferson To Ways And Means. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/11, Alpert) reports, "Now that U.S. Rep. William Jefferson has been convincingly re-elected to a ninth term, some local Democrats are calling on House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi to return him to his slot on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee. … 'The 2nd Congressional District said, "This is our guy,"' said state Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans. 'She should respect that.'" The Picayune notes, "Jefferson said he isn't ready to discuss possible committee assignments." In Saturday's victory speech, Jefferson said, "Tonight, my good and faithful friends, I want to just tell you and promise to you that I'm going to do all that is in my power with the help and grace of God to serve you as fully, as effectively, as I possibly can with all the tools that God has given me."

Jefferson Reelection Seen As Posing Ethical Dilemma For House Democrats. The AP (12/11) reports, "In awarding Rep. William Jefferson a new lease on his political life, Louisiana voters this weekend also saddled Nancy Pelosi with another ethics quandary as she prepares to become the Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives. 'It's going to be quite a headache for the Democrats,' Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said Sunday." The AP notes, "Democrats ran against a 'culture of corruption' that they said Republicans had fostered while in control of Congress." Pelosi removed Jefferson from Ways and Means, but she "now may come under pressure to restore his committee assignment or at least place him on a committee where he could benefit New Orleans. Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Pelosi, did not address committee assignments Sunday. In a statement, she said, 'Leader Pelosi has said that it is up to the people of New Orleans to choose who represents them and they did that.'"

On ABC's This Week (12/10, Stephanopoulos), Kokie Roberts said of the difficulty Jefferson's reelection presents for the Democrats, "I think it is going to be very difficult…to embrace Bill Jefferson, given the situation. But on the other hand, somebody better bring some charges against him, if they're going to carry it out."

McCain, Romney Lead Race To Woo Big Bush Donors. The Washington Post (12/10, Cillizza, Fletcher, 690K) reports on its front page on the efforts of Republican presidential hopefuls to win over major donors to President Bush's 2000 and 2004 campaigns. Bush's 2000 run "forever changed the fundraising dynamic for presidential races, showing that an enormous early financial advantage was the same as winning an 'invisible primary.' In that race, there are no voters, elections or overt campaigning -- just the wooing of fabulously rich people with the rewards of insider status, complete with fancy titles." So far, Sen. John McCain and Gov. Mitt Romney "are well ahead among the Republican contenders, though neither yet has come up with monikers like 'Pioneer' or 'Ranger' to flatter the biggest donors." Rudy Giuliani "has on staff Anne Dickerson, who ran the high-dollar program for the Bush campaign in 2004, and he has the backing of a handful of Bush Pioneers and Rangers." But other possible GOP candidates, including Sens. Sam Brownback and Chuck Hagel, Gov. Mike Huckabee, and Newt Gingrich, "are far behind in the pursuit of these fundraising big shots."

Romney Haunted By 1994 Letter On Gay Rights. The Washington Post/AP (12/10, A15) picks up the news that Gov. Mitt Romney "is facing new questions about his beliefs on gay issues after the emergence of a letter he wrote during his 1994 U.S. Senate run, in which he promised to be a stronger advocate for gays" than Sen. Edward Kennedy. The AP report says a "gay-oriented Massachusetts newspaper, Bay Windows, has also released a transcript of a 1994 interview with Romney during the Senate race."

Obama Heading To New Hampshire. NBC Nightly News (12/9, story 11, 0:10, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "One of the most closely watched lawmakers in the new Congress, Barack Obama, heads to New Hampshire tomorrow on his first trip to the important Presidential primary state. Tickets to his afternoon event are sold out and more than 150 media credentials have been issued."

Clinton, Obama Campaigns Could Change Race And Gender Equations. The New York Times (12/10, WK1, Nagourney, 1.16M) writes that "after a 217-year march of major presidential nominees who were, without exception, white and male, the 2008 campaign may offer voters a novel choice." But as Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama plot possible campaigns, "the question remains: are Americans prepared to elect an African-American or a woman as president? Or, to look at it from the view of Democrats hungry for victory in 2008, is the nation more likely to vote for a woman or an African-American for president?"

Presidential Prospects' Works Hit The Bookshelves. The Washington Post (12/10, A4, Goldfarb, 690K) writes that "a number of prospective 2008 presidential candidates are betting that the free publicity that comes with the release of a book can't hurt." Sen. Hillary Clinton's "It Takes a Village" will be re-released this week. In a "newly written introduction, Clinton 'reflects on how our village has changed over the last decade -- from the impact of the Internet to new research in early child development and education,' according to her publisher, Simon & Schuster." Sen. Barack Obama "has been actively promoting his new book, 'The Audacity of Hope,'" and John Edwards "has traveled to early primary states to sell his new tome, 'Home.'" Sen. John McCain and his chief of staff Mark Salter "will release their fifth book in August. … The book, tentatively titled 'Hard Call,' will explore historic decisions in politics, history, science and other endeavors." Al Gore, "who has kept the door to a presidential run slightly ajar, next year will publish 'The Assault on Reason' -- an examination of how 'the public arena has grown more hostile to reason.'" Sen. John Kerry "is releasing a so-far-untitled book on the environment in March with his wife, Teresa." Rudy Giuliani "has no book plans, though his post-Sept. 11 tome, 'Leadership,' was a huge success." Gov. Mitt Romney "has no plans for a book in the next few years."

Crist Cancels Florida Inaugural Ball. The AP (12/9) reports Florida Gov.-elect Charlie Crist "has decided to cancel his inaugural ball, saying Saturday that he didn't feel right about an expensive party when many people are struggling with higher insurance and property tax bills. Other free events, including a prayer breakfast, parade, the swearing-in ceremony and tours of the governor's mansion will still continue." Crist's inaugural committee is "returning all donations it's received."

Longer Hours Blamed For Increase In Trucker-Related Highway Deaths. The Chicago Tribune (12/10, Franklin, Little, 617K) reports, "Spurred by a global economy that demands that goods be delivered on time and at low prices, business has never been so brisk and so cutthroat" for truckers." The Tribune adds, "Paid by the delivery, not the hour, the country's 350,000 independent truckers…are lashed to punishing schedules that practically force them to live in their rigs. Counting all their time on the job, some earn as little as $8 an hour. Long hours, chaotic schedules and exhausting work conditions make for a potentially lethal formula -- for truck drivers and everyone else on the road. Nearly a decade ago, the government vowed to significantly reduce the number of fatalities from truck crashes, but the results have been mixed. Nationally the death toll fell until 2002 and then started climbing. In the three most heavily traveled states, California, Texas and Florida, deaths involving large truck crashes have steadily climbed. Over 5,000 people die and 116,000 are injured yearly in truck-related accidents, according to the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration."

NYTimes Blames The Administration For Loosening Trucking Safety Standards. The New York Times (12/10, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "To describe the Bush administration's policy toward the trucking industry as deregulation is farcical. The word empowerment is so much more fitting for the array of trucking executives the White House appointed to be the ranking regulators of their own industry. While avowing professionalism, this cadre of political contributors and industry insiders has brazenly relaxed federal standards for truck safety over the last six years. Rather than tightening drivers' hours as safety specialists advised, the political powers at the truck safety agency have actually loosened them."

Chris Matthews Released From Hospital. The Washington Post (12/10, D3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) "Reliable Source" column reports, "Chris Matthews is out of the hospital and ready to start interrupting people again. The 'Hardball' host was sidelined by complications from diabetes, which caused him to miss more than a week behind the mike."

Six-Party Talks On North Korea To Restart In Eight Days. The AP (12/10, Gearan) carries comments by an anonymous "senior U.S. official" that "a long-delayed round of international talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear weapons program is scheduled for later this month." The Six-Party Talks should recommence on December 18 in Beijing, and adjourn for Christmas several days later. The AP adds, "U.S. diplomats have been preparing for a new round,…but the date was uncertain." The "talks carry greater weight now that North Korea has exploded a nuclear device and tested a long-range missile earlier this year." Secretary Rice "said last month North Korea must come to new talks ready to deal, or there is no point in holding them."

Ahmadinejad Says Iran Installing 3,000 Centrifuges. The AP (12/10, Dareini) details remarks by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that Iran "has begun installing 3,000 centrifuges in an expansion of its uranium enrichment program that brings the Islamic nation significantly closer to large-scale production of nuclear fuel." He "also claimed that the international community was caving in to Tehran's demands to continue its nuclear program."

Economic, Political Ties Said To Drive Endorsement Of US-India Nuclear Deal. Continuing coverage of the background of the US-India nuclear cooperation agreement approved by the 109th Congress, the New York Times (12/10, A10, Sengupta, 1.16M) notes, "Beyond simple good will, unique commercial and strategic imperatives have driven a bipartisan swell of support for the deal, even though New Delhi steadfastly rejects the global nonproliferation treaty and advances a nuclear weapons program." The Times says the "economic incentives for the United States are huge," adding that, "as India gradually opens its vast market, American companies stand to make a great many gains, from investments in Indian real estate to selling soybean oil and fighter planes. There is also New Delhi's growing strategic value in a rapidly changing Asia." The Times calls it "revealing" that "a contentious bill has enjoyed so much bipartisan support," adding, "With the Indian economy growing at a steady clip of up to 8 percent in recent years, India last month hosted the largest American trade delegation to any single country, including vendors of nuclear equipment.

Abbas May Be Close To Calling New Palestinian Elections. The Washington Post (12/10, A31, Wilson, 690K) notes Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "is inclined to call early elections, including for his own office, to end the political and economic crisis in the territories." A PLO Executive Committee meeting gave Abbas "17 options to end the months-long stalemate with the governing Hamas movement," and he "is expected to give a national address next week on how he intends to end the crisis that has battered the economy and increased partisan strife in the territories. He is under pressure from his own [Fatah] party to move decisively at a time when talks over a unity government have foundered again." One Executive Committee member said Abbas is "leaning towards" early elections and has "dismissed the option that he continue talks with Hamas." The Post calls such a move "an uncharacteristically bold gesture by Abbas, a cautious veteran of the Palestinian national movement who has long favored consensus over confrontation, even in his dealings with Israel."

The New York Times (12/10, A8, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Fatah sources said Abbas is "leaning toward calling early parliamentary and presidential elections." The Times says he "has been stuck, with top Fatah officials urging him to fire the prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, and to call new elections."

CNN (12/9, Shubert) reported Abbas "may announce early parliamentary and presidential elections within the week. He made that announcement apparently to the Executive Committee of the PLO, saying that he had failed to negotiate a coalition government with the militant Hamas faction and that early elections may be an option. He said that he may make an address within the week and that's when his decision would be announced. Hamas was very quick to respond, an official saying that they rejected the idea calling it, quote, 'a coup against democracy.'"

The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Boudreaux, Abukhater, 850K) says a call for early elections would be "a risky move" and "a gamble" for Abbas," who "left the door open to compromise with Hamas." For its part, "Hamas warned that any such step would be illegal and meet with resistance, raising the stakes in a months-long and often violent conflict over control of the Palestinian Authority."

BBC.com (12/9) focuses on Hamas' reaction to the early election rumors, saying it "reacted by condemning the suggestion." Haniyeh "condemned the idea of early elections, saying they would accentuate 'crisis and tensions,'" and a Hamas spokesman "described the PLO committee's statement as a threat to democracy."

Lebanon's Shiites, Once Marginalized, Reshape Politics. A 2,600-word piece on the front page of the Washington Post (12/10, Shadid, 690K) details the growing political power of Lebanon's Shiite Muslims. "Once the country's most downtrodden, entrenched in feudal misery, Lebanon's Shiites stand today on the verge of their greatest political power in the history of a diverse country defined by its fractious religious communities: Sunni and Shiite Muslims, Druze and Christians. But their ascent is a story of contradictions: Now at the peak of that power, confident of victory, the community is still shaped by its own sense of vulnerability and weakness." While Shiite "leaders rely on age-old notions of backroom, under-the-table Lebanese politics," the Post says those ideas "may be reshaped by leaving a legacy of turning to the street with populist demands. And in pursuit of power, through the protests that began Dec. 1, the Shiites, the country's single-largest community, may end up breaking a system that appears to be buckling under the stress of Lebanon's most acute crisis since the 15-year civil war ended in 1990."

A Los Angeles Times (12/10, Stack, 850K) piece describes the challenges facing Minister Fouad Siniora's government. "Inside the Grand Serail, what remains of [that] government toils away, trying to ignore the thousands upon thousands of people massed at its gate. The people outside describe the government leaders as unwanted and illegitimate, pawns of U.S. interests." The Times calls the separation of Siniora's government from the Hezbollah-led street protests "the kernel of a dangerous political standoff." While the palace "stands isolated behind snarls of razor wire and layers of soldiers and security forces," the "mood is stoical and confident" in the protest enclaves. "The demonstrators seem convinced that the government will, inevitably, collapse, that Siniora and his allies cannot stay in place with so many people on the streets."

Radiation Found In Hamburg Apartments Tied To Litvinenko Associate. The CBS Evening News (12/9, story 6, 0:15, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "In the mystery of the poisoned Russian spy, radiation traces were found today in two German buildings linked to a Russian businessman he'd met with Alexander Litvinenko in London on the day he became fatally ill." The Washington Post (12/10, A28, Finn, Jordan, 690K) reports German authorities "said that the businessman, Dmitry Kovtun, had visited the two apartments, which belong to his ex-wife and former mother-in-law. Kovtun is reportedly seriously ill in a Moscow hospital." Kovtun, "a Russian business consultant who has spent years living in Germany, is emerging as a key figure in the investigation. While there are conflicting reports about his condition, the Russian news agency Interfax has reported that Kovtun is in serious condition and experiencing problems with major organ functions as a result of the poisoning. Kovtun and another Russian businessman, Andrei Lugovoy, met with Litvinenko…in London on Nov. 1, the day Litvinenko began feeling sick."

The AP (12/9) reports, "Meanwhile, tests have shown no trace of the radioactive substance polonium-210 on a plane used by a contact of Litvinenko to fly to London, German airline Germanwings said Saturday. Authorities carried out tests at Cologne-Bonn airport after determining that Dmitry Kovtun flew to London from Hamburg on the Airbus A319 on Nov. 1. Kovtun met with Litvinenko later that day."

The Los Angeles Times (12/10, Fleishman, 850K) reports, "Police discounted media reports suggesting that Kovtun, who reportedly lived in Germany for 12 years, planned Litvinenko's assassination in Hamburg. No traces of radiation were discovered in Kovtun's apartment, which is in the same building as his ex-wife's in the northern port city's Ottensen neighborhood."

Litvinenko's Widow Says Culprit Was "Obviously…Not Putin." BBC.com (12/10) reports, "The widow of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko has said she believes the Russian authorities could have been behind his murder. Marina Litvinenko, 44, told the Mail on Sunday: 'Obviously it was not Putin himself, of course not.' But she said what President Putin 'does around him in Russia makes it possible to kill a British person' in Britain. … Mrs Litvinenko also told the Sunday Times: 'Everybody tries to write about Sasha like he was an ex-spy, but it's completely untrue. He never was a spy.'"

KGB Veterans Said To Hold "All The Most Important Jobs" In Russia. In an "Week in Review" piece for the New York Times (12/10, WK3, 1.16M) Scott Shane writes, "President Boris N. Yeltsin considered dismantling the K.G.B. but 'decided it was too dangerous,' said Michael McFaul, a Russia specialist at Stanford University. In the seven-year rule of President Vladimir V. Putin, the security service has returned to prestige and power. 'All the most important jobs in Russia today,' Mr. McFaul said, 'are held by K.G.B. or former K.G.B. officers, in every ministry, in every industry.'"

International Nuclear Regulators Seek Curbs On Polonium Traffic. The New York Times (12/10, A16, Broad, 1.16M) reports, "Nuclear regulators in Washington and abroad are studying whether to tighten security on polonium 210 in case terrorists seek the deadly material for so-called dirty bombs that spew radioactivity, officials and diplomats said in recent interviews. … Groups considering tighter controls include the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in the United States and the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, which sets global standards for radiation safety."

LATimes Ties Litvinenko's Poisoning To Journalists' Murders. The Los Angeles Times (12/10, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "the cloak-and-dagger theatrics threaten to obscure an urgent danger at the story's heart — journalists in President Vladimir V. Putin's Russia are increasingly being attacked and killed. … We may never find out whodunit or who ordered it done, but we know what Litvinenko was investigating at the time of his death: the killing of decorated Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who had been exposing alleged Russian misdeeds in Chechnya. Were the killings of Politkovskaya and Litvinenko isolated incidents, the Kremlin's protests that it suffers most from the bad international publicity would be more worthy of sympathy. But Politkovskaya was at least the 21st Russian journalist to be killed since Putin was elected in 2000, according to Reporters Without Borders. Two others have disappeared and are presumed dead, and there have been 320 assaults."

Chen's Party Wins One Taiwan Mayor Race, But Loses Another. Reporting on yesterday's mayoral elections in Taipei and Kaohsiung, Taiwan, the New York Times (12/10, A9, Bradsher, 1.16M) notes President Chen Shui-bian's Democratic Progressive Party "eked out the narrowest victory in Taiwanese political history in crucial mayoral elections [in Kaohsiung], but the opposition Nationalist Party quickly said it would seek a recount." The DPP candidate, Chen Chu, appears to have a 1,120 vote margin, out of 761,000 ballots, "a victory margin of about one seventh of a percent. On an island with already deep political divisions, the paper-thin margin and the possibility of a court fight are likely to cause further political friction in the weeks ahead." The Times says the Nationalists had hoped to "turn" the mayoral votes "into an informal referendum on President Chen, who has been dogged by allegations that he and his family have committed financial impropriety." Nationalist candidate Hau Lung-bin easily won the Taipei election.

The AP (12/10, Grauwels) says the DPP "narrowly won a crucial mayoral election in [Kaohsiung], while the opposition candidate won comfortably in the capital of Taipei in a pair of votes seen by many as a referendum on President Chen Shui-bian." Chen Chu's election "seems likely to take pressure off of the president, who has been on the defensive for more than six months over allegations his family and inner circle benefited financially from their proximity to him."

Under the headline, "Taiwan's Ruling Party Dodges An Electoral Bullet," the Los Angeles Times (12/10, Magnier, Ting-i, 850K) says the DPP "defied expectations that it would be trounced in local elections Saturday, handing President Chen Shui-bian some breathing room after months of fighting off scandals. But the mixed results probably will result in continued political infighting at least through the 2008 presidential election, analysts said."

Hong Kong Begins Process Of Selecting Next Leader. BBC.com (12/10) reports Hong Kong voters "are electing the members of a committee that will choose the territory's next leader. Pro-democracy groups are hoping to win enough representation on the 800-seat committee to enter a candidate in next March's chief executive contest." Only 427 of the seats are up for election, and the BBC notes that candidates must have the backing of 100 members in order to challenge current executive Donald Tsang. The BBC's local reporter "says that the democrats already admit that their chosen potential candidate, lawyer Alan Leong, has no chance of beating Mr Tsang. But for the first time since Hong Kong was handed back to China by the UK in 1997, the democrat groups now say they feel that it is worth taking part in the contest."

South American Leaders Consider EU-Style Community. The AP (12/10, Keane) details the results of a summit of 12 South American nations in Cochabamba, Bolivia. Leaders "agreed Saturday to create a high-level commission to study the idea of forming a continent-wide community similar to the European Union." They "agreed to form a study group in Rio de Janeiro to look at the possibility of creating a continent-wide union, and even a South American parliament." Bolivian President Evo Morales is quoted saying, "We seek that South America be forever a region of peace that works to solve the economic problems of its historically abandoned majority." The AP says discussions may continue at Mercosur's meeting in Brazil this month.

Analyst Says Latin Americans Want "Best Of" Castro, Pinochet Models. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/10, B2, 690K), the Inter-American Dialogue's Michael Shifter says, "For the past half-century, no two leaders have so defined Latin America's political scene as Cuba's Fidel Castro and Chile's Gen. Augusto Pinochet." While their regimes were "similar only in their harshness and in the intense passions they evoked," their "legacies" will "loom large, and will long outlive them. They have been tyrants in life, but after their deaths, they will still shape the Latin America they leave behind." Noting that Castro "recognized the fundamental social inequities that mar the region," and Pinochet "embraced the market and its power to lift an economy," Shifter says modern, democratic "governments of the region are drawing on both those veins in their quest to better their citizens' political and economic futures."

Fiji Coup Leader Tries To Assemble Government. The AP (12/9) reports Fiji coup leader Frank Bainimarama "ran want ads in local newspapers Saturday to fill vacant Cabinet jobs, trying to piece together a new government for the south Pacific country." He had earlier "removed a swath of senior civil servants, including top police officers, saying he is weeding out corruption entrenched in the administration of ousted Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase." The AP also notes that Bainimarama's "hand-picked" leader, Jona Senilagakali, "took over the prime minister's office for the first time Friday, arriving with an armed military guard."

Czech Republic Remains "On Autopilot" Six Months After Elections. A New York Times (12/10, A3, Smith, 1.16M) piece details the continued failure of Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek to form a government. "For six long months, the Czech Republic has waited with increasing impatience for Mr. Topolanek to form a government that can win a vote of confidence from a Parliament perfectly split along partisan lines. He had promised President Vaclav Klaus that he would present a winning cabinet by [last week,] but he had no cabinet ready." The country "is suddenly finding democracy something of a puzzle. The combination of a backstabbing political culture and a parliamentary system that provides no tie-breaker in the case of an evenly divided legislature has left the country on autopilot since national elections in June. The crisis shows how far the region's post-Communist political culture has to go before it is mature, but it also indicates that the area's political systems are remarkably secure."

Kosovo Conflict Ordnance Cleanup In Albania Continues. The Washington Post (12/10, A26, Frye, 690K) reports on efforts to eliminate unexploded NATO ordnance in Albania. "For many Albanians living near Kosovo, "it's been seven years of death, amputations, shrapnel wounds and blown-up farm animals, seven years of blocked-off grazing lands, forests and water supplies. The explosives have choked off any hope of development, denying more than 25,000 people access to parts of their land, according to government estimates." Of one rural area, the Post says, "The terrain here is more vertical than horizontal, and planting and grazing land is so precious that before organized de-mining began, some residents tried to clear fields and paths on their own, often with tragic results." Demining "has focused on ground that villagers deem to be high and medium priority: grazing and crop land, roads, areas near water sources. This fall, those and other useful areas along the length of the border were finally declared free of explosives, but it will probably be 2010 before nearly all the explosives along the border are gone."

Border Conflicts Threaten To Destabilize Central African Republic. A lengthy front-page story in the New York Times (12/10, Polgreen, 1.16M) reports, "The Central African Republic — so important as a potential bulwark against the chaos and misery of its neighbors in Chad and the Darfur region of Sudan — is being dragged right into the dangerous and ever-expanding conflict that has begun to engulf central Africa." The Times says the CAR's borders are "porous" and its border lands "ungoverned," and adds, "The situation is so bad in some places that 50,000 residents have fled … to find refuge in Chad, of all places, while starvation threatens hundreds of thousands who remain." Noting that the CAR "sits almost at the bottom of the United Nations development index," the Times says "its vulnerability has only grown in recent months." United Nations border enhancement efforts aim "to avoid a broad, multicountry conflict like the one that swept Congo after the fall of Mobutu Sese Seko."

Chadian Rebels Claim Government Attack Repulsed. The AP (12/9) carries a Chadian rebel group's claim that "rebels fought back a Chadian army attack on Saturday outside an eastern Chad town, killing 100 soldiers and injuring an unknown number of others." Chadian "soldiers attacked a rebel position just outside the eastern Chad town of Biltine … and after three hours of fighting, rebels of the Union of Forces for Democracy and Development, known by the French acronym UFDD, repulsed them, said Ali Moussa Izzo, spokesman of the group." The AP adds, "It was not possible to independently confirm the rebels' claims and government officials were not immediately available for comment."

Madagascar's Ravalomanana Reelected. The AP (12/10, Hogg) reports Madagascar President Marc Ravalomanana "has been re-elected in the Indian Ocean island country, officials said Saturday." Ravalomanana, who appears to have won 55 percent of the vote in last Sunday's runoff election, "promised a five-year development plan to reduce poverty, the dominant issue in a country were 70 percent of the island's 17 million people live on less than $1 a day."

Africa Expert Says Somali Conflict Will Become Regional War Soon. Former CIA case officer Garrett Jones writes extensively in the Los Angeles Times (12/10, Jones, 850K) about Somalia, whose violence "is in a class by itself." He calls Somalia "a space between countries. Or simply a feral nation." Today, "the Somalis are poised to insist that the international community tune back in while they commit an auto-da-fe on CNN. Somali Islamists, modeling themselves on the Taliban, have taken control of most of the country, driving the warlords out of the cities and into the bush." Jones predicts that, "when the roads are dry enough to allow military operations [in Baidoa], the Islamists will swiftly overwhelm the interim government unless outside help arrives at the last minute." He continues, "Somalia's neighbors are bracing for a regional war, and the U.S. State Department says 10 countries are taking sides in some fashion." That "big, ugly regional war" could happen next year, Jones says, and "it is going to become a concern of the U.S."

Yunus, Grameen Bank To Receive Nobel Peace Prize Today. Noting today's Nobel Peace Prize ceremony in Oslo, at which Muhammad Yunus and the Grameen Bank will be jointly awarded the 2006 honor, the New York Times (12/10, A27, Gibbs, 1.16M) reports Yunus "said he would use his newfound celebrity … to urge bankers everywhere to make small business loans to the poorest people they can find." He "is credited with inventing microfinance, the practice of lending small amounts of money to destitute people, 30 years ago. The idea is for borrowers — almost all of them women — to start or expand money-making enterprises like weaving, rope-making, vegetable farming and holding livestock." Yunus said microcredit will allow Bangladesh to halve "the number of people classified as extremely poor by 2015." Noting that 90 percent of the Grameen Bank is owned by millions of borrowers, the Times says Yunus "urged the United States to recalibrate its strategy for fighting terrorism and to address what he said were its 'root causes' — poverty and injustice."

Kristof Sees Stereotyping Of Islam. In his New York Times (12/10, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof writes, "There's a fatigue in the West with an Arab world that sometimes seems to put its creative juices mostly into building better bombs. ... Those stereotypes are largely derived from the less than 20 percent of Muslims who are Arabs, with Persians and Pashtuns thrown in as well. But the great majority of the world's Muslims live not in the Middle East but ... in Asia, where religion has mostly been milder. ... Meanwhile, many Muslims are as disenchanted with us as we are with them. They complain about hypocritical Americans who parrot slogans about human rights but brutalize Muslims at Guantánamo and supply the weaponry that kills Muslim children in Gaza and Lebanon." Kristof predicts, "Desert Muslims grab the headlines, but my bet is that in the struggle for the soul of Islam, maritime Muslims ['more outward-looking, flexible and tolerant'] have the edge."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Book Ties Enemy Combatant To L.A. Plot (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

CHARLESTON, S.C. — Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri is the last enemy combatant imprisoned in this country. Yet four years after his arrest, government officials still cannot agree on what threat he posed.

In a new allegation, former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft says Al-Marri was sent to the United States a day before the Sept. 11 attacks to plan strikes on West Coast targets, including the tallest building in Los Angeles.

Ashcroft's claim — made in a new book — is the first time any U.S. official has directly linked Al-Marri to the West Coast attacks that Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden allegedly hoped would follow the deaths of nearly 3,000 people in New York, the Pentagon and Pennsylvania.

Citing Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who was captured and interrogated, Ashcroft wrote: "I believe KSM had planned to use Al-Marri to help facilitate this next wave of attacks focused on Los Angeles."

But three federal law enforcement officials asked about the allegation said they were mystified by Ashcroft's assertions. And a court document alleging that Al-Marri — a U.S.-educated citizen of Qatar and Saudi Arabia — has deep ties to Al Qaeda makes no mention of any role in an assault on the West Coast.

Plot broken up

Speaking confidentially because they did not want a public fight with the former attorney general, the Washington officials said the West Coast plot was broken up by arrests overseas that did not involve Al-Marri.

They said Al-Marri was sent to the United States as an Al Qaeda "sleeper agent" and was not assigned to prepare an attack on any specific target. With his wife and five children, they said Al Qaeda leaders hoped he could reside unnoticed in Peoria, Ill., where he had once lived and attended school.

"He was never given any assignment," said one of the officials familiar with government intelligence on the West Coast plot. "KSM may have considered him as an operative, but that's about it."

He acknowledged, however, that Ashcroft's contention "might still be a possibility."

The dispute is spilling onto the public stage as the Bush administration finds itself under mounting legal and public pressure to provide some form of justice for captives arrested in the U.S. and abroad. The disagreement also shows there are deep divisions within the government over what to make of enemy combatants.

Al-Marri's defense lawyers have repeatedly called on the government to either charge him with a crime or set him free, saying his endless solitary confinement at a Navy brig next to Charleston violates the founding principles of American jurisprudence.

But twice this year different federal judges in South Carolina have denied their request and ruled that the Bush administration can continue to legally — and indefinitely — hold Al-Marri as an enemy combatant.

Al-Marri's defense attorneys have appealed, and the government, seeking to cut them off again, recently signaled it may bring Al-Marri before a military tribunal similar to those planned for Mohammed and other detainees at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Why Ashcroft is raising this assertion now is unclear. He did not respond to repeated requests for an interview.

In his book, "Never Again: Securing America and Restoring Justice," Ashcroft said the second wave was "planned meticulously" by Mohammed with Al-Marri in mind. He wrote that Al-Marri was "part of an Al Qaeda advance team sent to the United States to facilitate the next round of terrorist attacks."

But of Al-Marri's arrest, Ashcroft wrote, "I believe it frustrated Al Qaeda's plans for new attacks. The Los Angeles plot unraveled due to international cooperation among America's allies."

DOJ_NMG_0104650

David Ayres, Ashcroft's former chief of staff at the Department of Justice, said the department reviewed the book for accuracy and classified material. And others suggested the information must have been gleaned by Ashcroft from his four years as attorney general.

"Why would he make it up?" wondered Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia who has closely monitored the Al-Marri case.

Angry defense lawyers

Defense lawyers, however, are angry Ashcroft is making assertions that government prosecutors have never alleged in federal court here in Charleston. The attorneys theorize that Ashcroft is trying to make Al-Marri appear evil to support his own Justice Department policy of endlessly incarcerating enemy combatants.

"He's all spit and no sidewalk," defense lawyer Andrew J. Savage III of Charleston said of Ashcroft.

Jonathan L. Hafetz, a litigation specialist at the Brennan Center for Justice at the New York University School of Law, who is assisting in the Al-Marri defense, was equally dismissive. "If they have that evidence, they should present it," Hafetz said. "Put up or shut up."

In an apparent reference to Mohammed, Ashcroft wrote that the information on Al-Marri came from a "detained senior Al Qaeda leader, whose credibility had been well established" and who identified Al-Marri as "an Al Qaeda sleeper operative, someone inside the country, lying low but working all the while for the enemy."

Mohammed, who was captured in March 2003, is known to have named Al-Marri as an Al Qaeda operative during his interrogations.

He also gave lengthy, written testimony in this year's trial of Sept. 11 collaborator Zacarias Moussaoui. He described the West Coast plot in detail, including the selection of the 73-story Library Tower (now the U.S Bank building), as one of the targets. But he did not name Al-Marri as a co-conspirator.

He added that Bin Laden personally "advised that a second wave attack should focus on the West, believing that security might be more lax there."

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney recently stated that Mohammed has provided reliable information.

But Hafetz said any statements from Mohammed should be discounted because Mohammed was allegedly tortured into talking by a controversial technique that simulates drowning. Al-Marri should be released now, he said, because "you can't hold somebody based on a statement from a guy who was water-boarded."

The three senior federal law enforcement officials in Washington sharply disagree with Ashcroft's premise that Al-Marri is a key figure in the West Coast plot. They said the scheme fell apart after a "handful" of other suspects were arrested overseas for involvement in the plot.

"This guy [Al-Marri] was never named by KSM [Mohammed] as being in the Library Tower plot," said one of the officials. "But he was put on the radar by KSM as a guy who was here stateside as a potential operator."

Al-Marri, now 40, was arrested in December 2001 in Peoria. He had earned a bachelor's degree in business administration there in 1991. He returned and enrolled to earn a graduate degree in computer science at Bradley University.

FBI agents found evidence that appeared to link him to Al Qaeda, but he was held on minor bank-card and credit-card fraud charges.

He was preparing for trial when Mohammed was arrested in March 2003 and began talking.

Three months later, in June 2003, the Bush administration abruptly designated Al-Marri an enemy combatant and moved him from a jail in Illinois to the Navy brig.

The two judges, federal Magistrate Judge Robert Carr F. and U.S. District Judge Henry F. Floyd, who upheld the enemy combatant designation, based their rulings on a partially declassified summary from Jeffrey N. Rapp, a senior defense intelligence officer.

The summary says "multiple intelligence sources" confirmed Al-Marri was sent to the United States to explore how to hack into computer systems and disrupt U.S. financial systems.

DOJ_NMG_0104651

But it does describe Al-Marri as a man devoted to Al Qaeda, who had trained with the terrorist network, versed himself in poisons and chemical weapons, talked frequently with a terrorist financier, and kept Bin Laden speeches and lists of jihad websites on his computer.

"He met personally with Osama bin Laden and other known Al Qaeda members," Rapp concluded, "and volunteered for a martyr mission or to do anything else that Al Qaeda requested."

Plans To Construct Legal Compound At Guantánamo Halted (MH)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald, December 10, 2006

In an abrupt about-face, the Pentagon has scrapped plans to invoke emergency authority to fast-track construction of a controversial $100 million legal compound at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Instead, Defense Department officials will seek permission from Congress for any new major buildings in which to stage the first war-crimes trials since World War II.

The Pentagon's retreat from a plan it had earlier described as urgent was a setback in Bush administration war-on-terrorism policy, just as the Republican-led Congress finished business Saturday -- to be replaced by a Democratic majority in early January.

California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a key Democrat on the Senate's military construction and armed services committees, announced the Defense Department's change of course in a news release late Friday -- after members of Congress, both Republicans and Democrats, had protested the move.

"I thank the Department for postponing plans to build a permanent courthouse at Guantánamo Bay," Feinstein said. ``It's important this courthouse proceed through regular order, with public hearings, so that there is full knowledge of what is intended."

Feinstein was among critics of the project, which was first reported by The Miami Herald.

Last month, the Pentagon had quietly notified contractors that it was seeking design and construction bids for the elaborate legal compound -- complete with two courtrooms, housing for 1,200, dining facilities for 800, a 100-vehicle motor pool and conference and other meeting facilities.

MILITARY CITY

A virtual mini military city, the legal compound was projected to cost $75 million to $125 million and be the single-largest construction project at the remote U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba. Today there are about 420 foreign men and teens held at the base as enemy combatants; about 80 could face war-crimes trials.

The decision to freeze its plan to invoke emergency authority capped a week in which Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said goodbye to Pentagon employees; a blue-chip bipartisan panel said the war in Iraq was mismanaged; and key Republican and Democratic senators introduced legislation to restore captives' rights to challenge their detention -- a move that would give civilian courts a greater role in individual cases at Guantánamo.

The Bush administration has been in a tug of war with civilian attorneys over the rights of the captives at Guantánamo since soon after the prison camp opened in January 2002 with an airlift of 20 captives from Afghanistan. At the time, the Pentagon had provisional plans to house up to 2,000 captives there.

The Pentagon also made the about-face during the same week it put into service a new prison facility -- known as Camp 6. It had cost more than $37 million and was intended as a mediumsecurity prison with communal eating and praying until a riot last summer led to its redesign as a maximum-security compound.

The Miami Herald disclosed the Pentagon's pre-bid solicitation for the legal compound on MiamiHerald.com on Nov. 16.

`EXTREME URGENCY'

The next day, Nov. 17, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England wrote Republican and Democratic members of Congress that because of "national security implications and extreme urgency" the Pentagon was invoking "Section 2808 of title 10, United States Code" as authorization for its fast-track authority -- a move that did not require congressional approval.

DOJ_NMG_0104652

On Friday, the Pentagon notified Feinstein, according to her office, that ``it has canceled the contract solicitation and will examine alternatives."

The Pentagon on Saturday gave no details but suggested it would no longer seek to fund the Guantánamo project without explicit congressional appropriation and authorization.

"We continue to work with Congress to proceed in an expeditious fashion to bring these unlawful combatants to justice," said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, th Pentagon's weekend spokesman.

But as of Saturday, the fast-track bid solicitation was still on a U.S. government contracting website, with a Dec. 20 deadline for solicitations and a July 2007 completion date. The Pentagon previously built a more modest, single-court complex at the Navy base for earlier Military Commissions, which the U.S. Supreme Court declared unconstitutional in June.

Feinstein's office credited the about-face to ``concerns she and others had raised about the proposed location and funding mechanism."

Pentagon officials are now preparing new rules for presumably constitutional trials, under the 2006 Military Commissions Act, although lawyers for detainees are already challenging portions of the law in the federal courts.

Disclosure of the solicitation last month unleashed a wave of criticism.

California Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter, outgoing chairman of the House Armed Service Committee, declared the project ill-advised.

New York Republican Rep. James Walsh, outgoing chairman of the military appropriations subcommittee, in comments in the Syracuse Post-Standard, expressed concern about its impact on military readiness.

"We're at war," he said. ``It sounds like their priorities are skewed."

`BACK-ROOM STUNT'

And Democratic New York Sen. Charles Schumer, who has served on the Armed Services Committee, called the proposal a 'back-room stunt, of secretly taking money away from veterans' care and soldiers' facilities."

Outside of Congress, Amnesty International labeled it a "white elephant" and a St. Louis Post-Dispatch editorial scorned it as a ``kangaroo compound."

The American Civil Liberties Union wrote members in an e-mail alert that Vice President Dick Cheney's old firm, Halliburton, had attended Defense Department planning conferences on the project.

Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross last week would not say whether a subsidiary already working at Guantánamo, would bid to build the legal compound.

Pentagon spokesmen would not say how rarely, if ever, the Bush administration had used emergency authority to circumvent Congress' power to appropriate and authorize.

Although Congress had no power to halt construction under the Pentagon's emergency authority, the Pentagon's England had sought a commitment from key Congress members to restore the money it intended to divert from existing, authorized military construction projects.

Pentagon spokesmen would not identify which already appropriated projects it would set aside.

Redefining Torture (NYT)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The New York Times Magazine, December 10, 2006

There were always two narratives offered about the change in American torture policy after 9/11. The first story — told by the Bush administration — was that the Geneva Conventions mandating humane treatment of war prisoners could be unilaterally suspended by the president for the duration of the war on terror. But, this story continued, our prisoners were nevertheless well treated, as required by honor if not by law; only a few renegade bad apples abused detainees.

The alternate version of the story went this way: from the outset of the war, human rights groups said, Bush-administration attorneys devoted considerable energy to secretly redefining torture. Leaked memos revealed that widely agreed-upon definitions of torture had been changed; ambiguous new rules started filtering down through the C.I.A. and the military — with lethal consequences.

The two narratives collided this summer with the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. After striking down the tribunals proposed to try detainees at Guantánamo Bay, the court went on to rule that the Bush administration was obligated to comply with the "laws of war," including Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions — the provision barring torture, cruel and humiliating treatment or "outrages upon personal dignity."

The Hamdan decision demolished the argument that the president's war powers were limitless and beyond review. It also meant that C.I.A. and other administration officials faced possible criminal liability for past and future acts of abuse. So the administration scrambled to both justify the torture and change the law.

The result was a "showdown" in Congress, wherein the president requested the power to redefine the legal standard for torture and the power to determine whether and how the Geneva Conventions apply. The administration also requested the authority to keep the specifics of its "alternative interrogation methods" secret. Even though the president acknowledged that he had sent prisoners to secret "black sites" for interrogation, Congress passed legislation decreasing Congressional and judicial oversight of detainees. When Bush admitted, in short, that the second narrative — America tortures people in secret — was true, Congress effectively made it legal.

The final detainee bill, as passed by Congress in September, immunizes some of those who abused detainees and relaxes restrictions on abuse. It strips the courts of jurisdiction to hear whole classes of cases and denies "alien unlawful combatants" (a classification left to Bush to define) the power to assert Geneva Conventions claims in courts. The bill purports to apply the Geneva Conventions, then defines them away. It purports to prohibit torture, then defines the prohibition away.

In October, Dick Cheney allowed that one of the most controversial torture methods — simulated drowning or "water boarding"— could be called a mere "dunking." The White House later contended that he'd not been referring to water boarding but to something else. Perhaps. But it's striking that in the span of 12 months, prisoner abuse had morphed from a secret to the law to a punch line.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Great Lakes Area Tries To Dodge A Bullet (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

CHICAGO -- U.S. Coast Guard vessels staging machine-gun target practice in the peaceable Great Lakes? George Heartwell does not like the idea, not one little bit. He questions the need, the risk and the appearance.

"I think our Canadian friends see us as trigger-happy cowboys," said Heartwell, mayor of Grand Rapids, Mich. "There simply have to be other ways and better ways."

In the name of defending the United States against terrorists, the Coast Guard proposes live-fire zones in all five Great Lakes, where gunners could perfect their skills on M-240B machine guns to be mounted on lake vessels. The weapons can fire hundreds of 7.62mm rounds a minute and send lead 2.3 miles downrange.

The Coast Guard, at a series of public hearings this fall, defended the 34 proposed zones as essential to its mission. Each zone, located at least five miles offshore, would be used perhaps two or three times a year for a few hours. Civilian boaters would be warned to stay away.

Yet opposition to the proposal is formidable and growing, led by an alliance of 80 mayors from eight states and Canada who called on the Coast Guard last month to drop the plan. More than a dozen environmental groups have asked for changes in the project and a deeper study of the effect on the ecosystem of hundreds of thousands of lead bullets.

Toronto Mayor David Miller, speaking for the organization of mayors, called the live-fire proposal "totally contrary to the long history of peaceful relations and environmental cooperation between the United States and Canada on the Great Lakes."

The decision to install machine guns on Coast Guard vessels in the U.S. waters of the Great Lakes was sensitive enough that the Bush administration sought to assure the Canadians that the weapons would not violate the spirit of an 1817 agreement limiting armaments on the lakes, home to 21 percent of the fresh water on the Earth's surface.

Asserting the need for the guns, a State Department diplomatic note in April 2003 cited "the potential for a tragic outcome" if the border's integrity were breached.

The Coast Guard began live-fire training earlier this year, conducting 24 exercises before a public outcry forced a suspension. The Coast Guard held nine public hearings and extended the comment period by two months to explain the plans and overcome the suspicion that they had acted dismissively.

Chief Petty Officer Robert Lanier, a spokesman for the Coast Guard's regional headquarters in Cleveland, described the training: Gunners in the 34 zones would shoot at floating targets in exercises lasting four to six hours at a time.

"To be proficient on the weapon, we have to practice," Lanier said. "There's a tremendous difference between operating any type of weapon on land versus operating it on water, where you've got the motion of the Great Lakes, the wind current, the sun."

Opponents, however, suggest using a simulator or sending Coast Guard members to train on the ocean.

"To be honest with you, we don't feel we're ready for this militarization of the Great Lakes," said F. Ned Dikmen, Chicago-based chairman of the Great Lakes Boating Federation. "The waterways, the pristineness, the enjoyment, takes on a different picture."

Dikmen continued: "My biggest fear is a poor fisherman that is not very radio-friendly and might not even know exactly what hit him. Are you going to call them on the phone? How are they supposed to know they are 2.3 miles out from the firing range? "

Kevin Crawford, mayor of Manitowoc, Wis., is among the critics who believe the Coast Guard acted badly.

"That's our freshwater supply. We fish out of there. We recreate out of there," said Crawford, who is also skeptical of federal projections that the lead in the Coast Guard's bullets will do no harm. "The idea that continuous activity of the Coast Guard over time won't have an effect is untrue, or least we don't know it to be true."

One of Crawford's worries is the safety of passengers on the S.S. Badger, a steam-powered ferry that churns between Manitowoc and Ludington, Mich. Another concern is the potential for unease among tourists who gravitate to the lake.

"You never know what's going to set off a change in the visitor economy," said Crawford, who added that he was not concerned about the prospect of terrorists on the Great Lakes. "There just doesn't seem to be that kind of a threat out there."

Not everyone is speaking against the Coast Guard project. Among the supporters is Dexter Nelson, captain of the 34-foot, twin-engine Fishin' Luhrs, who figures he has spent more than 17,000 hours afloat in Lake Superior, catching lake trout, walleye and salmon. He is confident the Coast Guard will find ways to notify boaters and fishermen, and he believes the training is necessary.

"I just think leave them alone and let them do what they need to do," said Nelson, who is based in Duluth, Minn. "If something happens, it's good if they're well-trained."

The Great Lakes Sport Fishing Council proposes reducing the 14 proposed Lake Michigan zones by half and moving them farther offshore. In a vast lake that stretches about 120 miles at its widest point, the proposal would mean a zone perhaps 40 miles from the shoreline, compared with the current five-mile minimum.

"It's really nothing for the average angler to go 10 or 15 miles offshore to fish," said Dan Thomas, president of the Chicago-based council, which counts 300,000 members. He supports the Coast Guard and considers the live-fire zones a minor inconvenience worth tolerating.

"They're putting their lives on the line to protect your butt and my butt," Thomas said. "There need to be some adjustments, but at the same time, I'm telling my guys, 'Get a life.' "

The Coast Guard is reviewing its plans, with no announced date for a decision.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Aides Seek Alternatives To Iraq Study Group's Proposals, Calling Them Impractical (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg, David E. Sanger

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104655

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — Administration officials say their preliminary review of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's recommendations has concluded that many of its key proposals are impractical or unrealistic, and a small group inside the National Security Council is now racing to come up with alternatives to the panel's ideas.

In interviews over the last two days with officials from the White House, the State Department, the Pentagon and foreign diplomats, President Bush and his top aides were described as deeply reluctant to follow the core strategy advocated by the study group: to pressure Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to rein in sectarian violence faced with reduced United States military and economic support.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has cautiously embraced that approach, several officials said, but others — including people in the National Security Council and the vice president's office — argue that the risks are too high. "The worry is that the more Maliki is seen as our puppet, because he is abiding by our timelines and deadlines, the internal political dynamics will become so fragile that the whole government would collapse," said one senior official participating in the internal review. "That would set us back a year." A senior official said the administration was not near a "decision point" on how to go about influencing Mr. Maliki to move faster, and he said it was taking seriously some of the report's suggestions.

But in interviews, senior administration officials, who would not be quoted by name because Mr. Bush has made no final decisions about how to deal with the Iraq panel's recommendations, questioned the study group's assertions that Iran had an interest in helping to stabilize the situation in Iraq, or that it made sense to start negotiations with Iran without conditions. And they took issue with the decision by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and the nine other members of the commission to make no mention of promoting democracy as an American goal in the Middle East, and to drop any suggestion that "victory" was still possible in Iraq when they presented their findings to Mr. Bush and to the public on Wednesday.

"You saw that the president used the word 'victory' again the next day," said one of Mr. Bush's aides. "Believe me, that was no accident."

The administration's inclination to dismiss so many of the major findings of the bipartisan group sets the stage for what could become a titanic struggle over Iraq policy. Just two months ago, administration officials were saying that they believed the findings by the panel headed by Mr. Baker and Lee H. Hamilton, a former congressman, would be all but written in stone — and that Mr. Bush would have little choice but to carry out most of them. But in recent weeks, the White House sought to describe the panel's role as that of one advisory group among many.

Andrew H. Card Jr., the president's chief of staff until last spring, said that whatever Mr. Bush did in Iraq would probably fall short of many of the commission's recommendations, and that he was likely to continue making decisions that he believed were right even if unpopular. Referring to Mr. Bush's secret intelligence briefings, Mr. Card said, "The president by definition knows more than any of those people who are serving on these panels."

"The president's obligations sometimes require him to be very lonely," he said.

Mr. Bush has empowered the "Crouch Group," a small group of advisers being coordinated by Jack D. Crouch II, the deputy national security adviser, to assemble alternative proposals from the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department, the Treasury Department and staff of the National Security Council.

The administration's strategy appears to be: Adopt parts of the recommendations that are under way already, or that are considered minor modifications of those efforts, and pick away at those that the administration believes imply retreat or folly. For example, the administration is embracing a recommendation that it put energy into reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace talks. Ms. Rice is planning a trip to the region early next year, and the administration says it plans to build on a new initiative by Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert. Similarly, officials have described the report's call for the creation of an "Iraq International Support Group" as a natural expansion of two regional forums that Ms. Rice has already met with several times, an economic cooperation group called the "Compact for Iraq" and the "Gulf Plus Two" group, which includes the Gulf Cooperation Council, plus Egypt and Jordan.

But other recommendations are being cast as overly optimistic. For example, while White House and Pentagon officials note that they are already embedding additional trainers and advisers in Iraqi units, they expressed deep skepticism that the force of 4,000 advisers could be rapidly increased to the 10,000 to 20,000 envisioned in the report. As a result, they said, they doubted it would be possible to pull back all 15 American combat brigades from Iraq's streets and towns by the first quarter of 2008, the goal in the panel's report.

The primary author of the military section of the report, William J. Perry, who was defense secretary under President Clinton, said in an interview on Friday that the administration's resistance was baffling to him. "There are many ways in which the training goals can be achieved in a timely way," he said. "If there is a will to carry out the proposed embedding program, it can be done."

That argument appears to foreshadow the debate that will develop as Mr. Bush seeks advice at the State Department, the Pentagon and elsewhere next week. Members of the study group say they expect to be defending both their individual proposals and the need for an integrated diplomatic and military package. "Given the track record these guys in the White House have, you would think they would show a little humility about taking aboard some outside ideas," said one Republican member of the commission who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Dan Senor, a former administration spokesman for the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, said that in conversations with administration officials, they had dismissed many of the report's recommendations as "not terribly realistic from an operational standpoint."

He said former colleagues had told him they felt comforted by the recognition that there were no good options, because despite all of the intellect brought to the endeavor, the members of the panel had failed to make the leap from strategy to implementation. "It's easy to suggest these steps in theory, but we haven't been able to figure out the how," Mr. Senor said. "Now, neither have these 10 wise men and woman."

One of the continuing debates within the White House and the Pentagon is whether to temporarily "surge" the number of American forces in Baghdad, in an effort to regain control over Baghdad. But the Pentagon has said that most of the additional 30,000 forces should be Iraqis.

One foreign diplomat, who requested anonymity because he was discussing American deliberations, said one strategy being considered would include dividing the labor between American and Iraqi forces — with Americans focusing on hunting down elements of Al Qaeda, and the Iraqi forces focusing more on sectarian clashes. The Iraq Study Group report leaves open the possibility of a temporary increase in forces, and envisions a similar role for the United States in seeking out Al Qaeda.

An administration official said that such a division of labor could not be so black and white. And Vice President Dick Cheney is said to be urging caution in dealing with the Shiite and Sunni factions, concerned that the administration avoid signaling that the Shiites would be abandoned as they were at the end of the Persian Gulf war.

The report's authors say their strategy will work only if taken largely as a whole; Mr. Baker warned against treating it like a "fruit salad," picking the juiciest pieces. The White House, however, appears to be groping for the right fork to do exactly that.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said that in spite of Mr. Baker's public suggestion that the administration should follow its recommendations fully, "Members of the Baker-Hamilton commission made it clear that they don't expect everybody to agree with each and every jot and tittle."

"And the president as commander in chief," Mr. Snow said, "still has the obligation to take seriously every bit of analysis and advice he gets, and to make his own decisions."

White House Debating New Iraq Strategies (AP)

By Jennifer Loven,

AP, December 10, 2006

In a rush to chart a new course for the Iraq war, President Bush's national security team is debating whether additional troops are needed to secure Baghdad — a short-term force increase that could be made up of all Americans, a combination of U.S. and Iraqi forces, or all Iraqis, a senior administration official said Saturday.

Other options being debated for inclusion in what the president has said will be his "new way forward" include a revamped approach to procuring the help of other nations in calming Iraq; scaling back the military mission to focus almost exclusively on hunting al-Qaida terrorists; and a new strategy of outreach to all of Iraq's factions, whose disputes are fueling some of the worst bloodshed since the war began, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the disclosure of internal discussions had not been authorized.

The official would not disclose how the administration was leaning in each of these areas, or provide details of the many other options said to remain on the table. The source cautioned that although Bush is planning to present his plan to the nation in a speech in the next two weeks, the discussions remain fluid and no final decisions have been made.

However, military leaders have portrayed a surge of additional forces as an unattractive option, and the Iraq Study Group did not recommend one.

In his weekly radio address Saturday, the president praised the report by the independent, bipartisan panel on Iraq, heralding its support for his goal of a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself. While ignoring the sections of the Iraq Study Group's report that criticize his administration's handling of the war and recommend a radically different strategy, Bush said he was pleased the panel did not suggest a hasty withdrawal of U.S. troops.

"The group declared that such a withdrawal would `almost certainly produce greater sectarian violence' and lead to `a significant power vacuum, greater human suffering, regional destabilization and a threat to the global economy,'" the president said, quoting from the report.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was in Iraq Saturday on a surprise visit, a Pentagon spokesman said. "He's there to express his appreciation to the troops and to thank both the troops and their families for the sacrifices they are making," said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman.

Since Wednesday's release of the group's 79-recommendation prescription for change, which it said was needed quickly to turn around a "grave and deteriorating" situation, Bush has appeared to set the stage for going in his own direction.

The president has said he will consider all of the panel's recommendations while awaiting the conclusion of parallel Iraq policy reviews by the Pentagon, State Department and White House National Security Council.

But Bush has already been publicly cool to the panel's key proposals — which called for direct engagement with Iran and Syria as part of a new diplomatic initiative and a pullback of all American combat brigades by early 2008, barring unexpected developments, to shift the U.S. mission to training and advising.

The president's own due diligence on Iraq continues all week.

On Monday, he goes to the State Department for a presentation on diplomatic and political options, and then meets in the Oval Office with independent Iraq experts. On Tuesday, the president confers in a video conference with senior military commanders and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the top U.S. diplomat in Iraq. On Wednesday, he meets with senior defense officials at the Pentagon.

On the political front, some have argued for a tilt away from minority Sunni dissidents to Shiites, who dominate the government and the country's largest sect. But the administration's internal review may instead recommend a wholly revamped U.S. approach that focuses less on playing middleman between major Shiite and Sunni political factions in the government in Baghdad and more on identifying new moderate leaders from across Iraq's political spectrum.

Administration officials point to Bush's recent meetings as evidence he is getting involved in a different way in the political infighting among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. Earlier this week, Bush met with the leader of the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. On Tuesday, he meets with a Sunni leader, Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi.

Diplomatically, though Bush still objects to talks with Iran and Syria, a debate continues about which nations to try to engage and in what forum to approach them, the source said.

Democrats, meanwhile, continued to push for Bush to adopt the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group.

"Their report confirms what most of us have known for some time — President Bush's policy of stay the course is not working," Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, the incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, said in his party's weekly radio remarks. "We must launch a new diplomatic offensive to engage Iraq's neighbors and the international community in the process of stabilizing Iraq and that region. President Bush has not done this, but he must because our nation's security and the well-being of our 150,000 troops there depend on it."

Bush Says Report Shares His Primary Vision For Iraq (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0104658

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Although the bipartisan commission on Iraq endorsed actions that the White House firmly opposed, President Bush said Saturday that the panel's report shared his chief goal for the country.

Bush, trying to shift his course on the war in a way that will win public backing, said in his weekly radio address that the Iraq Study Group "explicitly endorses the strategic goal we've set in Iraq: an Iraq that can 'govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself.' "

Some conservatives have attacked the report as defeatist. But Bush said the bipartisan panel also shared his concern that a quick U.S. departure could ignite more violence across the region. "The Iraq Study Group understands the urgency of getting it right in Iraq," he said.

The release of the report Wednesday has amplified criticism of the administration's policies and lent new momentum to calls for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq. Bush is now scrambling to develop an alternate course that aides say is likely to contain some features of the panel's report while maintaining many of the current U.S. commitments for the indefinite future.

The president said the two parties should seek a bipartisan consensus on Iraq policy, and sought to portray himself as in step with many of the fundamental messages produced by the commission's five Democrats and five Republicans.

Though the report described the situation in Iraq in far more dire terms than he or his chief aides have used, Bush said it "provides a straightforward picture of the grave situation we face in Iraq." He said he agreed with the panel's findings that the goal should be "an Iraq with a broadly representative government that maintains its territorial integrity, is at peace with its neighbors, denies terrorism a sanctuary and doesn't brutalize its own people."

He cited its language that, "given the current situation in Iraq, achieving this goal will require much time and will depend primarily on the actions of the Iraqi people." Bush also highlighted the report's warning that a precipitate withdrawal would "almost certainly produce greater sectarian violence" and lead to "a significant power vacuum, greater human suffering, regional destabilization and a threat to the global economy."

Bush noted that he would hold highly visible meetings this week as he formulates a new approach that may be announced as early as next week. On Monday, Bush is to meet with academic and policy experts on Iraq, and hold a videoconference with military commanders.

Bush said he was confident that "we can move beyond our political differences and come together to achieve that victory."

He did not mention any differences in view between himself and the panel, which recommended withdrawal of nearly all 15 U.S. combat brigades by early 2008 and called for diplomatic initiatives with Iran and Syria.

But in a response to the radio address, the Democratic incoming chairman of the House Intelligence Committee said the group's report required an immediate shift of direction in Iraq.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) said the report "confirms what most of us have known for some time — that President Bush's policy of stay the course is not working. We need a new approach." He said the panel's report followed what some Democrats have been urging for months — shifting U.S. troops from combat to advisory roles.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the incoming Senate Democratic whip, noted that at a meeting with lawmakers Friday, Bush didn't endorse the panel's findings. Durbin said that led him to question whether Bush would support the conclusions.

In Bahrain on Saturday, Iran's foreign minister addressed the report's recommendation for U.S.-Iranian talks by saying Tehran would take part only if the United States first announced a troop withdrawal.

"The first and most essential step … is the United States announce they have decided to withdraw from Iraq," Manouchehr Mottaki told reporters at a security conference.

He said that if the United States declared plans to do so, "Iran is ready to help the administration to withdraw its troops from Iraq." But he added that Iraq so far did not see such "political will" in the United States.

Report On Iraq Exposes Divide Within G.O.P. (NYT)

By John M. Broder, Robin Toner

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104659

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — The release of the report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group this week exposed deep fissures among Republicans over how to manage a war that many fear will haunt their party — and the nation — for years to come.

A document that many in Washington had hoped would pave the way for a bipartisan compromise on Iraq instead drew sharp condemnation from the right, with hawks saying it was a wasted effort that advocated a shameful American retreat.

The Wall Street Journal's editorial page described the report as a "strategic muddle," Richard Perle called it "absurd," Rush Limbaugh labeled it "stupid," and The New York Post portrayed the leaders of the group, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic member of Congress, as "surrender monkeys."

Republican moderates clung to the report, mindful of the drubbing the party received in last month's midterm elections largely because of Iraq. They said they hoped President Bush would adopt the group's principal recommendations and begin the process of disengagement from the long and costly war. But White House officials who conducted a preliminary review of the report said they had concluded that many of the proposals were impractical or unrealistic. [Page 18.]

The divisions could make it more difficult for Republicans to coalesce on national security policy and avoid a bitter intraparty fight going into the 2008 campaign.

Senator John McCain of Arizona, a leading candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, rejected the major recommendations of the group because they did not present a formula for victory. Mr. McCain, hoping to claim the Republican mantle on national security issues, has staked out a muscular position on Iraq, calling for an immediate increase in American forces to try to bring order to Baghdad and crush the insurgency.

It is too early to say how the war will figure in Republican primary battles, as other potential candidates are still developing their positions and conditions on the ground in Iraq may change. Mr. McCain's chief early rival, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, has been in Asia all week and has not yet read the report, an aide said.

But the debate will go to the heart of the party's identity — and its image as the party of strength on national security — after Mr. Bush's aggressive post-Sept. 11 foreign policy brought electoral successes in 2002 and 2004 but was profoundly challenged by voters this year.

Mr. Bush has not yet tipped his hand on what course he intends to pursue, saying he will await parallel reviews of Iraq policy from the National Security Council, the State Department and the Pentagon before deciding on any major changes. But he has already signaled that he intends to make some adjustments, most notably by dismissing Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld immediately after the midterm elections.

Mr. Bush's choices will not only have profound effects on the conduct of the war, but will also resonate within his party and give shape to the foreign policy debate of the 2008 elections. Republicans are already engaged in soul-searching over the results of the recent election, trying to figure out how the party can regain the faith of the American people on questions of war and peace.

The ambivalence and introspection were summed up by Senator Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, who spoke at length in the Senate this week about the dangers of withdrawing from Iraq but said he could no longer support the status quo.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," Mr. Smith said. "That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore. I believe we need to figure out how to fight the war on terror and to do it right. So either we clear and hold and build, or let's go home."

The frustration was widespread among Congressional Republicans, some of whom were serving their final days in office this week after an election largely influenced by the public's unhappiness with the war.

"So what do we have?" asked Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, who supported the war, defended it throughout his re-election campaign and was defeated last month. "We have the Baker-Hamilton report, which is a prescription for surrender. It is just a matter of time."

But Mr. Bush is also facing a rising chorus of demands from moderates in his party, as well as from Democrats, for a plan to begin a withdrawal from Iraq. They see in the report a politically palatable way to achieve disengagement from Iraq and an end to the partisan warfare in Washington.

"To ignore the message sent in the last election is to do so at our political peril, because the message was a resounding repudiation of the status quo with respect to Iraq," said Senator Olympia J. Snowe, the moderate Republican from Maine. "The American people are essentially unified in their intense dissatisfaction with the way things have progressed in Iraq."

Bill Kristol, the neoconservative editor of The Weekly Standard and a leading advocate of the decision to invade Iraq, said: "In the real world, the Baker report is now the vehicle for those Republicans who want to extricate themselves from Iraq, while McCain is articulating the strategy for victory in Iraq. Bush will have to choose, and the Republican Party will have to choose, in the very near future between Baker and McCain."

The choice Mr. Kristol is describing reflects a longstanding Republican schism over policy and culture between ideological neoconservatives and so-called realists. Through most of the Bush administration, the neoconservatives' idea of using American military power to advance democracy around the world prevailed, pushed along by Vice President Dick Cheney and Mr. Rumsfeld.

But as the Iraq war spiraled downward, the realists began to speak out more forcefully. They were also heavily represented on the Iraq Study Group, including Mr. Baker, former Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger and Robert M. Gates, who stepped down from the panel last month when Mr. Bush named him to succeed Mr. Rumsfeld. All three served in the administration of Mr. Bush's father.

The Wall Street Journal's editorial page, one barometer of conservative thought, called the study group's report "a bipartisan strategic muddle ginned up for domestic political purposes." It welcomed the panel's plan to increase the number of American trainers embedded with Iraqi military units, but it scoffed at the group's recommendation of involving Jordan and Syria in talks to address problems in Iraq.

Mr. Perle, a prominent neoconservative and early advocate of invading Iraq, dismissed the panel as a "misadventure" that should be ignored.

"You don't outsource the responsibilities of the commander in chief," Mr. Perle said. "The whole thing is absurd."

Mr. Limbaugh, who commands a large conservative audience on talk radio, said the commission was peopled with out-of-touch weaklings who placed a higher value on bipartisan comity than on winning the war.

"You know, bipartisanship simply means Republicans cave on their core principles and agree with Democrats," Mr. Limbaugh said on his program this week. "That's why everybody is praising the stupid report. Because there's nothing in this about winning, there's nothing in this about victory. There isn't anything in this about moving forward in a positive way. This is cut and run, surrender without the words."

Representative Duncan Hunter, a California Republican who is the departing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and a 2008 presidential hopeful, said, "The policy-making decisions about Iraq should not be considered to be devolving to a nonelected group put together essentially for the purpose of advising the president."

Democrats, meanwhile, face divisions of their own, aware that they face high expectations from voters after running campaigns that promised change in Iraq.

Many leaders in the party indicated this week that they felt vindicated by the study group's findings, and they vowed to push ahead with their promise of aggressive oversight hearings on the management of the war when they take control of Congress in January.

But the party's liberal base is hungry for more forceful action, including voting against additional financing for the war. "It's difficult to talk about ending the war without showing you're willing to end the money," said Representative Maxine Waters, a California Democrat and leader of the antiwar caucus in the House.

Democratic leaders have opposed cutting off the money, although Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi said this week that Democrats would impose new standards and conditions in Iraq spending bills.

Representative Christopher Shays, the Connecticut Republican who survived a Democratic electoral sweep across New England last month, said, "I don't think there's a real consensus in Congress in general" on Iraq. But he added, "Having been to Iraq 15 times, staying the course would just be foolish."

No matter what positions they take today, all Republicans would prefer that the 2008 elections not be fought on the battleground of Iraq, said Douglas Foyle, professor of government at Wesleyan University.

DOJ_NMG_0104661

"They don't want the 2008 presidential and Congressional campaign to be about staying the course," Professor Foyle said. "That's where the calculus of Bush and the Republicans diverge very quickly. Everyone is thinking about the next election, and Bush doesn't have one."

GOP Alienation Marks Turnabout For Bush (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

President Bush, weakened by an unpopular war and the loss of Republican control in Congress, is now confronting disaffection within his own party that could complicate his attempt to set an agenda for his final two years in office.

As Republicans departed Capitol Hill this weekend, some who used to dismiss Democratic attempts to investigate the administration as political posturing are now lining up behind calls for greater oversight of the executive branch.

They are advertising attacks on Bush's foreign policy that they once kept largely private. Last week, Oregon Sen. Gordon H. Smith gave a speech calling the current war strategy "absurd" and sent out a news release with his remarks.

Some longtime Bush allies, such as Texas Sen. John Cornyn, are even adopting Democratic rhetoric to criticize the Iraq war.

And on other issues that will confront the new Congress in January — including trade and judicial appointments — Republican lawmakers have signaled an unwillingness to follow the White House.

"Frankly, I think there is a greater recognition and awareness of the necessity for us to exercise checks and balances," said Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine), noting how much the Nov. 7 election changed the climate on Capitol Hill.

"If there was a reluctance to express that in the past, there isn't anymore," Snowe said.

To be sure, no one is expecting Republicans to abandon the president. And the ideological gap between Democrats and Republicans in Congress remains large.

But Republican disaffection marks a remarkable turnabout for a president whose command of his party was once so supreme he virtually appointed the Senate majority leader and GOP lawmakers openly acknowledged taking orders from the White House.

And it suggests that the Bush administration may have as much work to do to repair ties with Republicans as it does to build links with Democrats who will assume control of the House and Senate in January.

"They need to have a better relationship with members on both sides of the aisle," said Rep. Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican whose early support for Bush's war policy nearly cost him his seat last month.

Not so long ago, it was Republican members of Congress who labored to stay close to the president.

The Bush administration's ability to win approval from a compliant legislative branch for everything from tax cuts to foreign invasions and other initiatives was a source of awe. In 2002, the president was widely seen as responsible for making Tennessee Republican Bill Frist the Senate majority leader.

That influence was slipping even before the November midterm election swept Republicans from power on Capitol Hill.

House Republicans abandoned Bush over immigration. And in the Senate, some of the chamber's most respected GOP members stood up to the White House on Iraq and the prosecution of terrorism suspects.

In the run-up to Nov. 7, Bush weathered more defections as some Republican congressional candidates tried to distance themselves from the president's war policies, calling for troop withdrawals and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

But since the pivotal election, dissent has mushroomed.

And as the House and Senate prepare for what many expect to be heated debates next year over the course of U.S. policy in the Middle East, Republican lawmakers have stepped up their critiques of the war, directly challenging the White House in ways that had been the province of Democrats.

Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Sen.-elect Bob Corker of Tennessee and others have explicitly called for more engagement with Syria and Iran, two states the Bush administration has treated as pariahs for most of the last six years.

DOJ_NMG_0104662

Even some of the president's most loyal allies, including Texas Sens. Cornyn and Kay Bailey Hutchison, are tacking away from the White House by calling for more troops in Iraq.

While the president tried to remain upbeat after the Iraq Study Group brought its grim assessment to the Capitol last week, Cornyn offered no more encouragement than Bush's toughest critics.

"What we're doing now is not working," Cornyn said, echoing a Democratic campaign slogan. "We need a change of course."

The change in climate on Capitol Hill has been remarkable, said Rep. Walter B. Jones, a North Carolina Republican who broke with his party to oppose the war last year.

"Many of my friends said to me [then], 'You know, Walter, you are beginning to be so independent that it may end up hurting you,' " Jones said. He added that a number of his colleagues told him that although they agreed with him, they feared being disloyal to the president.

"I haven't heard that recently," Jones said

The reason is simple, said Paul Begala, a Democratic consultant who worked in the White House when President Clinton was forced to confront congressional Democrats after the party lost its majorities in 1994.

"When you are in the White House, members of Congress respond to two things: what you can do for them and what you can do to them," Begala said. "Here's what [Bush] did to them: He cost them control.... Republicans are paying the political consequences for Bush's policy failures. They don't like that."

Beyond Iraq, that may spell trouble for the White House next year.

Already, GOP lawmakers are signaling their eagerness to join in the kind of congressional investigation that Democrats promised on the campaign trail this fall.

Last week, Republicans scrambled to express support for expanding the power of an independent agency to monitor spending on Iraq reconstruction, a move that House Republicans had quashed in an appropriations committee earlier this year.

On other issues too there were signs of dissent last week. Many GOP lawmakers bucked the White House over trade deals with Vietnam and Haiti, forcing a flurry of last-minute parliamentary maneuvering to get the agreements through Congress.

As the congressional session drew to a close, the president also couldn't get a hearing for a raft of conservative judges he renominated for positions on the federal bench.

Amid the growing signs of defiance, the president gave a nod to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue last week, inviting Democratic and Republican congressional leaders to the White House.

And the administration communicated a new willingness to talk with Congress about overhauling Social Security without insisting on setting up private accounts.

"We can't have talks if everyone doesn't start with a clean sheet of paper," said a White House official who asked not to be named because the talks had not been announced.

But lawmakers, congressional aides and political scholars say the White House has its work cut out for it.

Other weakened presidents, including Ronald Reagan, have had to deal with a sour Congress in their final two years, said John J. Pitney Jr., a former Republican National Committee staffer who teaches government at Claremont McKenna College.

But though Reagan was saddled with the Iran-Contra affair, Americans weren't dying overseas every day.

"Bush has low approval ratings. He has an unpopular war. And every day is one day closer to his exit," Pitney said. "That is not a recipe for legislative success."

Hawks Bolster Skeptical President (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Steady condemnation from conservatives for the Iraq Study Group report may be providing some cover to the Bush administration as it completes its own review of strategy in Iraq, apparently with little enthusiasm for the panel's prescription of U.S. troop withdrawal and dialogue with Syria and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0104663

The criticism of the panel, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), has burst forth from the leading institutions of the right: the National Review, the Wall Street Journal editorial page and the Weekly Standard; conservative talk radio; and scholars at some of Washington's top think tanks.

President Bush has spoken favorably of the panel's work as an opportunity to bring the country together, but he has been noncommittal on its key recommendations. Comments from the hawkish right, meanwhile, have often been an accurate gauge of the beliefs of key figures inside the Bush administration, especially Vice President Cheney.

Many Republican and Democratic lawmakers have embraced the panel's report, but the almost uniformly negative reaction from some of Bush's strongest conservative supporters means the president may have some political flexibility to depart from the group's major recommendations, according to some GOP operatives.

Notably fueling the skepticism has been Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has raised pointed questions about the Baker-Hamilton panel's unwillingness to prescribe more troops, as McCain has urged, and its embrace of a regional conference with Syria and Iran.

"It's sort of hard to suddenly say everyone agrees Baker is the way to go when the leading Republican candidate for '08 is saying no," said William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard.

Although it is clear that many Republicans regard the Iraq Study Group's report as a possible exit strategy from a war that they worry could drag the party down in 2008, such plans are colliding with clear anger from neoconservatives, who have been the most ardent supporters of the Bush administration since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"It's preposterous, period," said Kenneth R. Weinstein, chief executive of the conservative-leaning Hudson Institute, about the proposal for a new dialogue with Iran and Syria. "Talking to them is not going to bring anything but a perception of American weakness."

"The report is a monumental disappointment, for all the hype," said Richard Perle, a former Reagan-administration defense official who strongly supported the Iraq invasion. "The recommendations are either wrong or of no consequence. There is no magic bullet, but in their desire to find something, they found the wrong things."

Many of the conservatives have long distrusted Baker, viewing him as a figure of amoral, dealmaking diplomacy who unduly pressured Israel and coddled Syria when he was secretary of state.

And the Baker-Hamilton group, neoconservatives came to believe, was stacked against them from the beginning, both in the composition of the panel and in the panel's choices of experts to hear from. Neoconservatives also complained that the group sought out the views of Iran and Syria but did not speak to senior officials of such allies as Israel and Turkey.

Frank J. Gaffney Jr., a former Reagan administration hawk who heads the Center for Security Policy, said he believes the panel's output was "certainly driven" by Baker.

"It seems so transparently in keeping with his modus operandi: the quest for the deal without regard for the content or the repercussions," he said.

The full report was endorsed by each of the 10 panelists, including former attorney general Edwin Meese III, a hero of the conservative movement. Yet Baker has clearly been mindful of the criticism. He showed up Thursday for a group interview with print reporters laughingly brandishing a copy of the conservative New York Post from that morning, its headline blaring "Surrender Monkeys," in reference to him and Hamilton.

He proceeded with a robust defense of the panel's proposal for a broad-based U.S. diplomatic initiative in the Middle East and renewed engagement with Syria and Iran -- the clear focus of the conservative anger. Baker made plain his disdain for some of the neoconservative ideas, including the argument heard before the 2003 Iraq invasion that the road to Arab-Israeli peace lay in overthrowing Saddam Hussein's government in Baghdad.

"What we really are saying, the road to peace in Iraq lies through Baghdad. The road to Arab-Israeli peace runs through Jerusalem," he said. "We are not linking the two, but we are proposing a comprehensive strategy to improve our prospects in Iraq and improve our prospects in the Middle East."

He offered an impassioned plea for engaging Syria at a high level, something the Bush administration has refused to do, and said the administration does not know what can be achieved if it does not even try. Baker dismissed the whispers from the White House that he is out of touch with the new realities of the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0104664

"Talking to Syria gives us an excellent opportunity to revitalize the Arab-Israeli peace process," Baker said. "The Syrians are the transit point for arms shipments to Hezbollah, and if you can flip the Syrians, you will cure Israel's Hezbollah problem. "

Baker went on: "The Syrians will tell you, as they told us, that they do have the ability to convince Hamas to acknowledge Israel's right to exist. . . . If we accomplished that, that would give [Israeli Prime Minister] Ehud Olmert a negotiating partner on the Palestinian track."

Michael Rubin, a former Pentagon aide who resigned in protest from an Iraq Study Group expert panel, said he believes Baker's assessment is unrealistic. He said that Syrian President Bashar al-Assad gains strength from positioning himself as a rejectionist and foe of the United States, so it is wrong to believe that Syria would think it would gain from an alliance with Washington.

"Sometimes realists have to deal with reality," said Rubin, now a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "Iran and Syria will press to exploit every advantage they have."

He said the report, as a strategy document, was a "Cliff Notes high school paper."

Eliot A. Cohen, a Johns Hopkins University professor of military strategy, said the Baker-Hamilton recommendations reflect "preoccupations that go back to when [Baker] was secretary of state and are completely detached from today's reality. The idea that Sunni are putting power drills in the heads of Shia and vice versa because of the Arab-Israeli conflict is bizarre."

Iraq Study Group member Leon E. Panetta, a Democratic former congressman and White House chief of staff under Bill Clinton, said the criticism from hawks and conservatives is "the price of statesmanship" for Baker. "He's been through it," he added. "He understands it.

"I think the feeling was, how do you rescue this administration from the grip of ideology and force it to face the real world?" Panetta said. "That's where he was coming from: 'How can I help the president in a way protect his legacy and do the right thing?' "

Bush Seen Rejecting Iraq Lifeline (SFC)

By Carolyn Lochhead

San Francisco Chronicle, December 10, 2006

Washington -- Much of Washington is looking at President Bush as a man standing on quicksand in Iraq, refusing the branch offered by his father's friend to save his presidency and the country from a historic blunder.

Bush looks at history, too. A day after the release of a grim assessment of the war by the Iraq Study Group, headed by James Baker, a close friend of Bush's father who served as secretary of state for President George H.W. Bush, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, Bush conceded the need for tactical shifts, but he left it to those who follow him into the Oval Office to decide whether to leave Iraq.

"Will we have the resolve and confidence in liberty to prevail?" he asked. That question is "not going to face this government ... because we made up our mind. We've made that part clear. It'll face future governments. There will be future opportunities for people to say, 'Well, it's not worth it. Let's just retreat.' "

Standing at a point in history as fraught with consequence as his decision to invade Iraq nearly four years ago, Bush is in full flower of what he calls resolve and others call obduracy. The Baker-Hamilton report has left Bush isolated even within his own party.

"This is a president who really sees it as a weakness to admit error," said Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University. "But with Iraq it has reached such a point, it's like he's standing in the desert without anyone around him and refusing help."

It remains to be seen whether Bush is clinging to Cold War metaphors that he hopes history will vindicate or saving face before delivering a speech expected by Christmas. During it he would call for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq based on reviews he has ordered from his State Department, Pentagon and National Security Council.

He has scheduled an intense round of meetings this week with military commanders and Pentagon officials, the State Department, the vice president of Iraq and outside experts.

DOJ_NMG_0104665

Bush claimed Saturday that the bipartisan report of the Baker-Hamilton group endorsed his strategic goal of a stable Iraq and the danger of a precipitous withdrawal. The report did that, but it also called current policy a failure and talked of preventing catastrophe -- not spreading democracy as Bush declared again this past week -- in the Middle East.

Those who know Baker do not believe he was sent as an envoy from father to son. Although Baker is known as a master bail-out artist who helped Bush wrest the contested Florida recount away from Democrat Al Gore in the 2000 election, they say he is no longer playing family messenger.

Nor, they say, are any of the other Republican elders in the Iraq Study Group -- retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former Wyoming Sen. Alan Simpson and Ed Meese, the hard-charging attorney general for Ronald Reagan -- playing that role.

Baker "is someone who has devoted his life to policy and to the Bushes, and he has worked hard in the diplomatic world to try to advance America's interests," said Leon Panetta, a member of the Iraq Study Group who served as chief of staff to Democratic President Bill Clinton and a longtime House member from Monterey.

"I think there has been a tremendous amount of frustration, particularly among those who served in the first Bush administration -- and for that matter served with Ronald Reagan -- who felt that even though these presidents were Republicans and conservatives, that they were also pragmatists. ...

"There really has been an interest to try to say (to the president), 'Look, there is a way out of this. There is a way to deal with this in the real world that cannot only help save Iraq but protect your legacy as president.' "

Jim Pinkerton, a White House adviser to the first President Bush, said the former president kept Baker's group at arm's length.

"I think it's fair to say Baker is making his own bid for establishmentarian wise man," Pinkerton said. "I suspect that George H.W. Bush probably agrees with him, but it's almost as if he doesn't need to say much, because let's face it, Baker and (former national security adviser Brent) Scowcroft and the whole crowd think the same way on this."

The Baker-Hamilton report finished what voters began in November when they handed control of the House and Senate to Democrats, knocking out what little political support remained for Bush's Iraq policy. Calls for withdrawal now have a bipartisan imprimatur and set a standard against which Bush will be measured.

"Whatever he chooses will be graded against this report," said Rand Beers, a longtime Republican national security official who resigned from Bush's administration over its war policy.

Late Thursday, Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith, a Republican who voted for the war, became the latest member of the president's party to leave his side when he slammed the entire Iraq enterprise in a scathing Senate floor speech.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," Smith said. "That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore."

But the president continues to use the language he adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and lays the Iraq war squarely in the context of prior struggles against fascism and totalitarianism.

Should extremists succeed in "using terror to stop the spread of freedom," Bush said Thursday, "history will look back on our time with unforgiving clarity and demand to know, 'What happened? How come free nations did not act to preserve the peace?' "

Embattled British Prime Minister Tony Blair stood beside him, thanking Bush for "the clarity of your vision about ... the struggle between freedom and democracy," adding, "it's a noble mission, and it's the right mission."

Leaders find it easier to sustain a difficult policy if they believe their cause is noble, said George Edwards, chair of presidential studies at Texas A&M University. "Clearly, that's true for almost everyone -- 'I am here accepting the slings and arrows of my fellow man on behalf of advancing democracy in a region that has never known it,' " Edwards said. "That makes it a lot easier to persist."

Bush supporters draw parallels with Democratic President Harry Truman, who left office in shame over public disapproval of the Korean War but whose reputation was resurrected. Presidential historians are more tempted to look to Democratic

President Lyndon Johnson, who escalated the war in Vietnam to halt the spread of communism but faced a nationalist guerrilla insurgency that cost more than 57,000 American lives.

"It took Johnson a long time to change his mind and it isn't clear that there was ever a radical change," Edwards said. The public turned against the war and Johnson did not run for re-election in 1968.

Presidents may persist in such times "because they just become rigid and defensive," Edwards said. "But there's also the case that they believe in the policy. After all, they paid a heavy price to establish and maintain that policy, so it's easy to understand that it's difficult to then just reject it one day."

Panetta, who was brought to the White House by Clinton after Democrats lost their House and Senate majorities in 1994, said presidents often dig in when times get rough.

"Anybody who gets elected to the presidency is somebody who has had to take on a lot of criticism, a lot of problems, a lot of attacks, a lot of turmoil," Panetta said. "Because they're willing to persist and move on, they managed to succeed, only because they're so determined. ... And that normally works when the crisis passes by and you can then come out and do what you're supposed to do. Unfortunately here, this crisis is not going to just simply pass by."

Many in Washington, even those who supported the invasion, see the Iraq Study Group as a lifeline to Bush. "They did him a great favor politically," said Stephen Hess, a political scientist at George Washington University who worked in the Nixon administration. "My feeling is he's having a very hard time moving off his set positions, which were particularly fixed by the campaign, when he was out every day saying the same things about victory and democracy."

"This is the president's big chance, and I hope he takes it," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.

Many wonder why Bush doesn't look like he's falling apart under the stress.

The president may be in denial, or simply be a positive person, "whoever since he was a cheerleader at prep school and frat president at college, has been full of resilience and bounces back and just doesn't let these things in public life get him down," said Fred Greenstein, a presidential scholar at Princeton University.

Greenstein pointed to Bush as a 7-year-old child "jollying up his mother after she was in a deep depression when his sister died of leukemia. He's got this style of banter and outgoingness."

An Unlikely Offensive (WP)

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

THE IRAQ Study Group's recommendations for shifting U.S. military tactics in the war are specific, focused and aimed at incremental improvement over the next few months; they are also close to what the Pentagon and Iraqi government already were hoping to achieve. By contrast, the group's diplomatic strategy is sweeping -- and untethered to reality. The Bush administration could and should adopt some version of the military plan, though it would be right to ignore the unrealistic timetable attached to it. But to embrace the group's proposed "New Diplomatic Offensive" would be to suppose a Middle East very different from what's on the ground.

Start with the supposition that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is somehow central to ending the chaos in Iraq. In fact, even if the two-state solution sought by the Bush administration were achieved, it's difficult to imagine how or why that would cause Sunnis and Shiites to cease their sectarian war in Baghdad or the Baathist-al Qaeda insurgency to stand down. It's no doubt true, as study group chairmen James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton have said, that every Arab leader they met told them that an Israeli-Arab settlement must be the first priority. But the princes and dictators of Riyadh, Cairo and Amman have been delivering that tired line to American envoys for decades: It is their favorite excuse for failing to support U.S. initiatives and for refusing to reform their own moribund autocracies. In fact, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and other Iraqi neighbors have vital interests in the ongoing Iraqi power struggle. They can and should be moved to help stop the slide toward anarchy on their borders whether or not peace breaks out in Jerusalem.

Mr. Baker, who pursued a Mideast diplomatic strategy 15 years ago focused in large part on Syria, also conjectures that its regime can be "flipped," so that it abandons its current alliance with Iran and support for extremist movements in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories. The problem with his theory is that since 1991 Syria has acquired a new leader: Bashar al-Assad is very different from his father, Hafez, with whom Mr. Baker negotiated. Bashar al-Assad, along with several senior members of his retinue, has been personally implicated in a United Nations investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri. Judging from its recent actions, Syria's top diplomatic priority is not recovering the Golan Heights from Israel -- as Mr. Baker supposes -- but stopping the U.N. investigation and undermining Lebanon's pro-Western democratic government. European envoys who have met Mr. Assad in recent weeks dismiss the possibility of a dramatic reversal of his policies.

Parts of the Baker-Hamilton diplomatic agenda make good sense, including its suggestion for a contact group of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. The Iraqi government already has embraced the notion, by proposing a regional conference in Baghdad, and President Bush would be wise to get on board. Syria and Iran could remain adversaries of the United States across the region yet still play a role in a group where the pressing common interest is avoiding a regional sectarian war.

By the same token, the administration ought to continue its efforts to promote the creation of a Palestinian government capable of undertaking the peace negotiations that Israeli Prime Minster Ehud Olmert offered last month. It should also continue to press hard for U.N. sanctions against Iran's nuclear program and seek sanctions against Syria if it continues to flout U.N. resolutions calling for it to cease its meddling in Lebanon. All these steps could strengthen Arab moderates and U.S. allies around the region. But they won't solve the problems in Iraq.

About Those Other Problems (NYT)

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

No one could ever suggest that James Baker lacks ambition or self-confidence. So it is not surprising that along with its effort to salvage Iraq, the report from Mr. Baker's Iraq Study Group offers some strong advice on how to fix George W. Bush's dysfunctional Washington — and the president's dysfunctional relations with the rest of the world.

We were particularly drawn to Recommendations 46, 72 and 78. Under separate headings dealing with the military, the federal budget and the nation's intelligence agencies, they share one basic idea: Government officials should not lie to the public or each other, especially in matters of war.

One should not need a blue ribbon commission to know that. But the fact that it had to be said, and so often, in the report goes a long way toward explaining how Mr. Bush got the country into the Iraq mess and why it is proving so hard to dig out of it.

Consider Recommendation 46, which calls on the new secretary of defense to create "an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice" to civilian leaders, including the president. That is their sworn duty. But the back story is the Pentagon's prewar refusal to listen to the former Army chief of staff (and who knows how many other generals) who warned that it would take several hundred thousand troops to stabilize a post-invasion Iraq. The good news is that the new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, acknowledged as much in his confirmation hearings. The bad news is that Mr. Bush has not.

Recommendation 72 says that "costs for the war in Iraq should be included in the president's annual budget request." The report warns that the White House's habit of using emergency funding for the war has eroded both "budget discipline" and Congressional oversight. And just in case you were worrying that you hadn't been paying sufficient attention to the war's price tag, the report says the White House presents its requests in such a "confusing manner" that only detailed analyses by budget experts can answer "what should be a simple question: How much money is the president requesting for the war in Iraq?"

And finally, Recommendation 78 calls on the Pentagon and the intelligence community to "institute immediate changes" in how they collect data on violence in Iraq "to provide a more accurate picture of events on the ground." The report says that officials have used a standard for recording attacks (it notes that "a murder of an Iraqi is not necessarily counted") that systematically underreports Iraq's mayhem. It cites one day this past July when the government recorded 93 "attacks or significant acts of violence," while the Iraq Study Group's own analysis "brought to light 1,100 acts of violence."

Sprinkled among the recommendations, the report also has some homespun advice on how Mr. Bush might fix America's foreign relations. It suggests that the nature of diplomacy is to engage with adversaries as well as friends. And it warns that the United States does Israel "no favors" by refusing to try to broker peace in the Middle East, adding that it is "an axiom that when the political process breaks down there will be violence on the ground."

It is mind-boggling that this commission felt compelled to deliver Governing 101 lessons to the president of the United States. But that fits with the implicit message of the entire exercise — a rebuke of the ideologically blinkered way Mr. Bush operates. The report shows that there have always been plenty of alternatives to Mr. Bush's stubborn insistence on staying the course, and that if he were just willing to make an effort, it would be possible to forge a bipartisan consensus on the toughest issues.

It's tragic that Mr. Bush could not figure that out for himself. It is far past time for him to heed this new advice.

Rumsfeld Says Farewell To Troops In Iraq (AP)

By Pete Yost,

AP, December 10, 2006

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made a surprise trip to Iraq on Saturday, just days after a bipartisan commission called the situation there "grave and deteriorating" and said the administration's policy wasn't working.

"He's there to express his appreciation to the troops and to thank both the troops and their families for the sacrifices they are making," said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman.

It was Rumsfeld's 15th trip to Iraq since the war began; he was last there in July.

Rumsfeld's trip follows an emotional farewell Friday at the Pentagon, where the defense secretary defended his record on Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said Friday that the worst day of his nearly six years as secretary of defense occurred when he learned of the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse.

Rumsfeld's Pentagon appearance Friday and his trip to Iraq, where he was Saturday, were among the few public appearances he has made since President Bush announced on Nov. 8 that he was replacing the defense secretary. His last full day will be Dec. 17.

Rumsfeld's farewell tour follows a grim picture of the Iraq war that was presented this week by a bipartisan commission headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton.

The Iraq Study Group said its prescription for change is needed quickly to turn around a "grave and deteriorating" situation.

The commission called for direct engagement with Iran and Syria as part of a new diplomatic initiative and a pullback of all American combat brigades by early 2008, barring unexpected developments, to shift the U.S. mission to training and advising.

The report took direct aim at Rumsfeld. Saying there has been a long tradition of partnership between the military and civilian leaders, the group said the "tradition has frayed" and must be repaired. It urged the new defense secretary, former CIA director Robert Gates, to "make every effort" to encourage military officers to offer independent advice.

President Bush's national security team is debating whether additional troops are needed to secure Baghdad — a short-term force increase that could be made up of all Americans, a combination of U.S. and Iraqi forces, or all Iraqis, a senior administration official said Saturday.

Other options being debated for inclusion in what the president has said will be his "new way forward" include a revamped approach to procuring the help of other nations in calming Iraq; scaling back the military mission to focus almost exclusively on hunting al-Qaida terrorists; and a new strategy of outreach to all of Iraq's factions, whose disputes are fueling some of the worst bloodshed since the war began, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the disclosure of internal discussions had not been authorized.

Rumsfeld Makes Surprise Farewell Trip To Iraq (AFP)

AFP, December 10, 2006

US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has made a surprise visit to Iraq to thank US troops for their service just days before he steps down from his post, a Defense Department spokesman has said.

"The secretary is in Iraq to express appreciation to the troops for what they're doing as well as thanking the families for the sacrifices they make every day for all Americans," spokesman Todd Vician told AFP.

He said Rumsfeld had departed Friday for Iraq and offered no more details of the defense secretary's schedule.

Rumsfeld resigned in November, the day after President George W. Bush's Republicans lost control of the US Congress with voter frustration over the Iraq war dominating the election.

News of Rumsfeld's trip comes nine days before he is replaced by Robert Gates, former head of the Central Intelligence Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0104669

Rumsfeld has come under intense criticism at home and abroad over his handling of Iraq and US treatment of detained terror suspects. But he defended the American presence in Iraq on Friday in farewell remarks to Pentagon staff.

He said an early US withdrawal from Iraq would be a "terrible mistake," which would threaten the stability not only of Iraq but the region.

Rumsfeld urged Americans to show patience with the war in Iraq, saying there would be "dire consequences were we to fail here."

Iraq and Afghanistan have made considerable strides, he said, but "those countries are not there yet."

"To pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there in that country, and in that region, I think would be a terrible mistake," he said.

The outspoken defense secretary's visit coincided with more sectarian bloodshed in Iraq. A suspected Sunni suicide bomber on Saturday detonated his car near a revered Shiite shrine in the central city of Karbala, killing six civilians and wounding 47 more, medics said.

Another 10 Iraqis were killed in insurgent and sectarian attacks around the country and the bodies of 35 murder victims were found in Baghdad.

The US military also announced the deaths of two more marines, bringing its dead since the March 2003 invasion to 2,927.

The sectarian violence underlined the urgency of a planned National Reconciliation Conference on December 16, though some political groups were threatening to boycott the event.

Rumsfeld's farewell trip followed the release of a critical report by a high-level US panel, the Iraq Study Group, that described the situation in Iraq as "grave and deteriorating" and urged the US administration to shift course.

Headed by former secretary of state James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton, the panel said most US combat forces could be withdrawn from Iraq by early 2008 while shifting the US military's mission to one of training and advising Iraqis.

Rumsfeld did not comment on the report directly at his Friday appearance, but he spoke about Iraq as a largely political -- not military -- challenge.

Iraq, he said, "is in fact a microcosm of what is taking place in that region: power struggle -- partly religious, partly economic, certainly political, ... but in a very real sense not terribly military in its nature."

He said the US military was doing all it could, but the conflict in Iraq could only be "won" by Iraqis through political reconciliation.

Rumsfeld, a lightning rod for opponents of the war, also expressed concern about "impatience in the United States and in the Congress."

"We have every chance of the world of succeeding in both of those countries, but only if we have the patience, only if we have the staying power," he said.

Shiites Rout Sunni Families In Mixed Area Of Baghdad (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 9 — Bands of armed Shiite militiamen stormed through a neighborhood in north-central Baghdad on Saturday, driving hundreds of Sunni Arabs from their homes in what a Sunni colonel in the Iraqi Army described as one of the most flagrant episodes of sectarian warfare yet unleashed in the capital.

The officer, Lt. Col. Abdullah Ramadan al-Jabouri, said that more than 100 Sunni families, many with very young children, had left the Hurriya neighborhood aboard a convoy of trucks and cars under cover of the nightly curfew. Government officials tried to urge the families to return by promising army protection, but could not persuade them.

As the fighting in Hurriya broke out, the outgoing secretary of defense, Donald H. Rumsfeld, arrived in Baghdad on Saturday for what American military officials said was a farewell visit to the troops. Mr. Rumsfeld, who made a farewell speech at the Pentagon on Friday, went straight to the American military headquarters at Camp Victory, on the edge of Baghdad's international airport, and met there with United States commanders, an American military spokesman said. The spokesman said Mr. Rumsfeld was scheduled to travel to other bases outside Baghdad on Sunday before returning to Washington.

The fighting began around noon, when militiamen began rampaging through the only mixed district in Hurriya, a mostly Shiite neighborhood, and killed at least three Sunni Arabs. One family was shot as they left their home, with a 20-year-old man killed and his mother and younger brother wounded, according to an account given by the man's father, who was at work as a security guard elsewhere at the time. The man said the three were hit by automatic rifle fire as they finished loading possessions into their car and prepared to drive to a safer area.

Colonel Jabouri said that skirmishes set off by the militia attacks continued for about five hours, until sunset. Meanwhile, a large convoy of Sunni Arabs waited in their vehicles outside the fortified Muhaimin mosque, waiting to drive to neighboring Sunni districts while local leaders negotiated with militiamen for safe passage.

A Sunni cleric, Sayed Ahmed Muhammad, said the negotiations also involved appeals from top government officials, including Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite, for the Sunni families to return to their homes in Hurriya under promise of Iraqi Army protection. But the cleric said the assurances failed to persuade the Sunnis, whom he described as the last of more than 4,000 Sunnis to flee the area under Shiite militia threats in recent months. The convoy set out after dark.

Colonel Jabouri, the Iraqi military commander in the area, said his troops had tried to help groups of Sunnis protect themselves and their homes. But the large number of Shiite militiamen involved — whom he identified as belonging to the Mahdi Army, the most powerful Shiite militia — made that impossible. He described the fighting as the worst eruption of sectarian skirmishing so far experienced by the Iraqi Sixth Division, which shares responsibility for security in Baghdad with American troops.

"As an Iraqi, I'm against sectarianism of any kind," he said. "I'm against any group that that seeks to build barriers between people on the basis of their religion."

The role of American troops in the turmoil was unclear. The Sunni cleric, Sayed Muhammad, said appeals for assistance from the First Cavalry Division, its headquarters about three miles southwest of Hurriya, had gone unanswered. But Colonel Jabouri said Iraqi commanders had told the Americans there was no need for their help. A First Cavalry Division spokesman said American advisers with Iraqi troops in Hurriya had reported only one instance of sectarian trouble, when Iraqi troops assisted a Shiite family under threat from Sunnis.

That account appeared to reflect the cyclical nature of the sectarian violence that has soared in Baghdad in recent months, and has led to thousands of families fleeing mixed Sunni-Shiite areas for the safety of neighborhoods in which their own sect dominates. Hurriya lies in an area of western Baghdad where there has been a surge of attacks on Sunnis living in Shiite-majority areas, and vice versa. Just south of Hurriya lies Amariya, a Sunni Arab stronghold where scores of Shiite families have been driven out by attacks or threats from armed Sunnis.

Sayed Muhammad described the aim of the Shiite attacks on Saturday as creating a Sunni-free corridor across northern Baghdad that would run from the Shula district on the city's northwestern edge to Kadhimiya, a Shiite stronghold on the west bank of the Tigris river. The main area of Shiite strength in the capital lies on the east bank of the Tigris, principally in Sadr City, home to about 2.5 million Shiites, about 40 per cent of Baghdad's population.

"It's part of a much wider plan," the cleric said. "What we're experiencing here is the Shiite groundwork for a civil war."

One of the striking features of the violence Saturday was that it occurred in an area that lies less than three miles northwest of the heavily guarded Green Zone compound that doubles as the seat of the Iraqi government and as an American command post. American diplomats and military commanders have been pressing the Maliki government to take urgent action to begin to curb all militias, and particularly the Mahdi Army, which is under the nominal control of a radical Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, who is an important political ally of Mr. Maliki.

In other violence on Saturday, a car bomb killed four civilians and wounded 42 others on a street leading to the Imam al-Abbas shrine in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, about 70 miles southwest of Baghdad. The shrine is the resting place of the son of the founder of Shiite Islam, and has been the scene of numerous other attacks since the American-led invasion in 2003. Another car bomb, in the northern city of Mosul, killed at least three civilians.

A United States military statement said that two marines had died Thursday of "wounds sustained due to enemy action," one on Thursday and another on Saturday, in Anbar Province.

Angry residents of a village north of Baghdad fired weapons into the air as they buried victims of an American airstrike, [a news agency] reported. The American military said that the airstrike, on Friday in the village of Jalam eda, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, was against militants of Al Qaeda who had fought with troops. The military said 18 men and 2 women were killed. Local officials in the village said there were 17 killed, but that they included 6 women and 5 children.

Hundreds of chanting residents of Jalameda, a predominantly Sunni village, marched through nearby Ishaqi on Saturday firing shots and carrying banners that condemned "mass killing by the occupation forces," [a news agency] said.

Sunni Arabs Flee Homes In Baghdad (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan, Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 9 -- Gangs of roving Shiite Muslim gunmen stormed a west Baghdad neighborhood Saturday, burning houses and killing at least two people in broad daylight, authorities said. By evening, dozens of Sunni Arab families had fled their homes, carrying their belongings and furniture in trucks in one of the worst known incidents of sectarian cleansing to grip the capital in recent weeks.

According to a senior Iraqi commander and residents, Mahdi Army militiamen loyal to radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr launched the attack on a section of the mixed neighborhood of Hurriyah, which means freedom. The rampaging began at 2:30 p.m. and lasted an hour before Iraqi soldiers entered the neighborhood.

"They attacked the people, shooting at them," a senior Iraqi commander who was involved in the operation said of the militiamen. "They were threatening people. They were telling them to leave 'or else we will burn your house down and kill you.' "

Baghdad has been on edge since a series of car bombs, mortar shells and missiles killed more than 200 on Nov. 23 in the Shiite slum of Sadr City, the stronghold of Sadr and where many of his loyal followers reside. Since then, a spate of small-scale revenge attacks has erupted in various mixed neighborhoods. The attack on Hurriyah marks one of the more serious in this cycle of sectarian killings plaguing the capital.

The attack was apparently in retaliation for an attack on Shiite residents by Sunni gunmen, said the Iraqi commander, who spoke on condition that his name not be used because he was not authorized to speak to reporters. Saturday's attacks unfolded in Hurriyah Three, a section of the neighborhood filled mostly with Sunni families from the Mishahda tribe, witnesses and authorities said. Witnesses gave different accounts of what had occurred.

Hameed al-Dahabi, a construction worker, said that about a month ago the Mahdi Army threatened Sunnis to leave their homes in Hurriyah Three. Some of the Sunni families complied. In the past two or three days, other Sunnis had reclaimed the homes, he said.

They attacked the Mahdi Army members and occasionally shot randomly into the street, he said. The Mahdi Army fought back with AK-47 assault rifles and grenades, he said.

Dahabi, his wife and their four children stayed in their home as the fighting intensified. On Saturday morning, three more families fled their street in anticipation of more fighting, he said, taking clothing and beds. He decided to stay because he has lived there since 1959.

Dahabi said seven or eight Sunnis began shooting from one house Saturday morning. Some Mahdi Army fighters tried to climb to the roofs of neighboring houses to shoot back at them, but the occupants would not let them in, he said. Instead, the militiamen surrounded the house containing the Sunnis and shot into it. This continued until about 3 p.m., when the Sunnis fled the house. The Mahdi Army fighters then burned down the house.

In the aftermath of the fighting, Dahabi said he saw about 20 people lying on the street, some injured and some dead. He said he did not know how many people had been killed.

"It's a mess," he said. "I feel sad for what's going on. A lot of families are being hurt. They're terrified."

Abdul Ali, a Shiite who lives in Hurriyah Two, said the trouble started Friday night, when snipers began shooting from the roofs of houses.

DOJ_NMG_0104672

On Saturday morning, the Sunnis attacked Shiites in Hurriyah Three, he said his sister told him. He said there were many of them and they shot at people randomly. The Shiites fought back, he said, using AK-47s and other weapons. They burned two houses, he said.

"The people defended their families," he said. "Anyone who was able to carry a gun was on the street."

He said his sister left her home in Hurriyah Three at noon Saturday and is staying with him until the neighborhood calms down.

Sunni families phoned friends and relatives in other nearby neighborhoods seeking places to stay. "They told me there is no way to live again in Hurriyah," said Omar Mashadani, a Sunni who lives in the Ghazaliya neighborhood. "They told me neither the government nor the U.S. Army will help them."

Mashadani said he received several phone calls from friends in Hurriyah seeking to rent houses in his neighborhood. Dozens of families, he was told, planned to flee their homes Sunday morning, he said.

Mohammed Dulaimi said that on Friday night, threatening leaflets were distributed in Hurriyah Three, which is near the Muheaman mosque, a Sunni shrine. The notes ordered all Sunni families to leave. By the evening, he said he saw snipers on rooftops. On Saturday morning, he decided to leave.

"We had a sense of fear," he said. "We felt some of our Shiite neighbors were giving us evil looks."

With the help of a Shiite neighbor, he loaded his wife, four children and other relatives into a minibus already crammed with their best furniture and belongings. By 11:30 a.m., they had left and were headed toward nearby Ghazaliya. He had lived in Hurriyah since 1978, he said.

The Iraqi commander said he saw at least 30 families preparing to leave when his forces arrived in Hurriyah. There were at least 25 trucks filled with furniture, he said.

"We asked them, 'Why are you leaving? We are controlling the situation,' " he recalled. "The people said, 'We are very scared. We should leave now or they are going to kill us.' "

"I feel like a broken person. I don't have any power," Dulaimi said. "Only God can help us and tell us what to do."

In violence elsewhere, a suicide car bomb exploded outside the Shrine of Imam Abbas in the holy Shiite city of Karbala, 60 miles southwest of Baghdad.

Officials provided different death tolls for blast. Provincial Gov. Aqeel Khazaly said four people were killed, while Saleem Kadhim, spokesman for the Imam Hussein General Hospital, said the hospital had received 16 corpses.

Khazaly said late Saturday that security forces had detained about 20 suspects in the attack.

In the northern city of Mosul, a car bomb killed five people and injured three, police said.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two Marines in the western province of Anbar. Both were assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5. One died Thursday, and the other, on Saturday. No further details were disclosed.

Officials also announced that one of former president Saddam Hussein's nephews had escaped from a prison northwest of Mosul. Brig Gen. Wathiq al-Hamdani, the chief of police of Nineveh, said investigators believe insiders helped Aimen al-Sabbawi escape from the Badoush prison.

Meanwhile, two influential Sunni groups, the Iraqi Islamic Party and the Association of Muslim Scholars, condemned a U.S.-led raid at a village in Salahuddin province, northwest of Baghdad, on Friday.

The U.S. military said coalition forces were targeting suspected fighters from the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq and killed 20 suspected insurgents. Under machine-gun attack, the troops called for an airstrike. Amir Alwan, the mayor of nearby Ishaqi, said civilian women and children were killed in the strike.

News agencies released what they said were photos of dead children at the site. The military has denied that any civilians were killed in the airstrike.

Also Saturday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld visited Iraq "to express his appreciation to the troops," said Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman, according to the Associated Press.

President Bush announced Nov. 8 that he was replacing the defense secretary. Rumsfeld's last full day will be Dec. 17.

Saddam's Nephew Escapes Iraqi Prison (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0104673

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

A nephew of Saddam Hussein serving a life sentence for financing insurgents and possessing bombs escaped from prison Saturday in northern Iraq with the help of a police officer, authorities said.

Sectarian attacks killed at least 20 people, including five who died in a suicide car bombing outside a Shiite shrine in Karbala, police said. Officers also found 39 bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad that apparently were victims of revenge killings by Sunni Arabs and Shiites.

The escape by Saddam's nephew underlined one of the problems facing the U.S. military as it tries to train enough Iraqi security personnel so U.S. troops can go home: the ability of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militiamen to infiltrate Iraqi police forces.

Ayman Sabawi, son of Saddam's half brother Sabawi Ibrahim Hassan al-Tikriti, escaped from a prison 45 miles west of the northern city of Mosul in the afternoon with the help of a policeman, said a local police commander, Brig. Abdul Karim al-Jubouri.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, confirmed the escape but declined to discuss any details.

Sabawi, who was arrested in May 2005 by U.S. and Iraqi forces near Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, was convicted of illegally crossing the border from Syria and sentenced to 15 years in prison late last year by an Iraqi court. He was sentenced to life in prison in an earlier case for possession of illegal weapons and manufacture of bombs.

He "played a particularly active role in sustaining the terrorism by providing financial support, weapons and explosives to terrorist groups," Iraq's government said.

In July 2005, the United States froze Sabawi's assets along with those of five other Saddam nephews, accusing them of providing funds to Iraq's Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency.

Sabawi's father was captured in February 2005. Formerly the head of Saddam's intelligence service, al-Tikriti was No. 36 on a U.S. list of the 55 most-wanted members of Saddam's ousted regime.

The suicide bomb attack occurred near the Al-Abbas shrine in Karbala, a Shiite holy city 50 miles south of Baghdad.

The shrine's golden dome and minarets didn't appear damaged in video shown on Iraqi state TV, but the blast set many parked cars on fire in a nearby street. Two men with bloody faces could be seen running through heavy black smoke past the body of another victim.

A main goal of Sunni Arab insurgent groups such as al-Qaida in Iraq has been to spark sectarian violence by attacking sites revered by the country's Shiite majority.

In Baghdad, some of the worst violence was in a Sunni pocket of Hurriyah, a mixed neighborhood. Witnesses said Shiite militiamen entered the area after Sunnis warned the few Shiites living there to leave or be killed. Heavy machine gun fire was heard and three columns of black smoke rose into the sky, the witnesses said on condition of anonymity out of concern for their own safety.

Mohamed al-Askeri, a Defense Ministry spokesman, said some people were chased from their homes, but Iraqi security forces drove off the attackers, handed out food to displaced people and persuaded most to return to their homes. But "others are still frightened," he said.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, who heads a large Sunni bloc in Parliament, went on a Sunni-run TV station to demand protection for the district's Sunnis. "We appeal to the government and U.S. forces to rescue Sunni families in Hurriyah who are facing killings and displacement by militias."

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced that two Marines were killed in combat in Anbar province, raising to 42 the number of U.S. troops who have died in Iraq this month. At least 2,930 have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003.

Iraq's influential Association of Muslim Scholars and the country's largest Sunni Arab political party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, on Saturday condemned a deadly U.S. military attack the previous day in al-Ishaqi village in volatile Salahuddin province.

The U.S. command said a ground raid and airstrike killed 20 insurgents, but local officials claimed at least 19 civilians died, including seven women and eight children.

About 1,000 residents of the predominantly Sunni village of al-Ishaqi held a funeral for the 19 dead Saturday, shouting "Down with the occupiers," "Long live the resistance," and "There is no God but Allah."

DOJ_NMG_0104674

The Association of Muslim Scholars, a group of hard-line Sunnis that opposes the coalition, issued a statement alleging U.S. soldiers entered two Iraqi houses, shot 32 civilians to death, including women and children, and then blew up the buildings to make it look as if the victims died in a U.S. airstrike targeting insurgents.

The Iraqi Islamic Party, part of a Sunni bloc that controls 44 of parliament's 275 seats, made a similar claim, calling the attack "a new massacre by the American occupiers."

Last spring, a U.S. investigation cleared American soldiers of misconduct during a March 15 raid in al-Ishaqi in which Air Force planes destroyed a building believed to be hiding al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents. Villagers claimed soldiers killed 11 civilians before ordering for the airstrike.

Hussein Nephew Escapes From Iraqi Prison (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — A nephew of Saddam Hussein serving a life sentence in a northern Iraqi prison escaped Saturday in what authorities believe might have been an inside job.

Ayman Sabawi, the son of Hussein's half-brother, was captured last year during a raid near Tikrit, Hussein's hometown. He was convicted of possessing illegal weapons and manufacturing explosives for Sunni insurgents.

Police said Sabawi fled Saturday afternoon in a car that had been waiting outside the prison in Badush, about 45 miles west of the northern city of Mosul. Authorities are investigating whether night-shift guards helped him escape.

Sabawi's escape came as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made a trip to Iraq in his final days at the Pentagon. Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, confirmed that Rumsfeld left Washington on Friday for Iraq, saying, "He wanted to take this opportunity to express his thanks to the troops, and also let them know that he certainly appreciates the sacrifices they make every day."

Meanwhile, leaders from the western province of Al Anbar, the heartland of the Sunni insurgency, met with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in Baghdad to ask for help in rebuilding the local economy, arming police and securing the main highway from the Jordanian border to Baghdad, which runs through their province. They also asked him for a halt to U.S. bombings in the military's hunt for insurgents.

"Our goal is to bring Anbar to a safe shore, because any security failure or deterioration in Anbar would reflect poorly on all Iraq," Al Anbar Gov. Mamoun Sami Rasheed said.

Two U.S. soldiers were killed and three injured Saturday while patrolling Ramadi, Al Anbar's provincial capital, when a roadside bomb exploded near their Humvee, the military said in a statement. A Marine died Thursday in Al Anbar combat, the military said, raising the number of troops killed to 2,913. According to icasualties.org, more than a third of the U.S. and allied foreign troops killed in Iraq since the 2003 invasion have died in Al Anbar.

The delegation of provincial leaders asked Khalilzad for an Army brigade to patrol the highway and help recruit police officers, said Haqi Ferhan, who identified himself as a lawyer representing tribal leaders opposed to the insurgents.

Police in the province have already recruited 11,000 officers, Ferhan said, but are struggling to outfit them.

He said Khalilzad promised to review the matter with the Iraqi government and commanders of the U.S.-led foreign military force.

In a statement, Khalilzad welcomed Al Anbar officials' efforts to stabilize the province.

The Iraq Study Group report released Wednesday in Washington cited Al Anbar as one of four provinces that remain "highly insecure."

In a report last week to the U.N. Security Council, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan cited fighting in Al Anbar as evidence that Iraq's violence is spiraling out of control.

U.S. forces are attempting to shift responsibility for local security to Iraqi troops. In a series of raids across Al Anbar on Friday and Saturday, U.S. troops followed the lead of Iraqi army divisions, exchanging fire with insurgents, taking into custody 19 suspects and recovering weapon caches in several towns, according to military statements.

DOJ_NMG_0104675

The military said some of those detained are suspected in assaults on U.S. soldiers and on Iraqi police, soldiers and civilians, including planting roadside bombs and attacking an elementary school before national elections last year.

Across Iraq on Saturday, at least 16 people were killed.

The Ministry of Interior also reported that 40 bodies were found in Baghdad in a day, 10 of them handcuffed, blindfolded and showing signs of torture.

An Interior Ministry official said that among those killed Saturday was a young man who was shot along with his parents as they fled their burning house in the mostly Shiite Hurriya neighborhood of Baghdad. The official said the Shiite Al Mahdi militia had set the home on fire after distributing fliers to Sunni families in the neighborhood urging them to move out.

The parents survived, the official said.

Police said a car bomb killed four people and injured 40 Saturday morning on a market street in Karbala, home to the country's second-holiest Shiite shrine. Police blockaded the city center after the bombing, detained several suspects and dismantled remaining explosives, Karbala Gov. Akeel Mahmoud Qazali told state-run Al Iraqiya television.

Another car bomb killed three people in Mosul, local police said.

Late Saturday, a burst of automatic gunfire that could be heard across Baghdad was a rare sign of unity instead of strife: Soccer fans were celebrating Iraq's 2-1 victory over Uzbekistan in the semifinals of the Asian Games in Qatar.

Iran Ties Role In Iraq Talks To U.S. Exit (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah, Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

MANAMA, Bahrain, Dec. 9 — Just days after the Iraq Study Group recommended opening a dialogue with Tehran, Iran's foreign minister said his country would enter discussions on stabilizing Iraq only if the United States commits to a troop withdrawal.

Speaking to a security conference in Manama, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Iran was open to dialogue as long as the United States "changes its attitude," and he asserted that the Americans were "50 percent to blame" for Iraq's violence.

In a defiant presentation, he also insisted that the United States stop campaigning against Iran's nuclear program.

"The Islamic republic of Iran, in case the U.S. changes its attitude, is ready to help the administration to withdraw its troops from Iraq," Mr. Mottaki said. He then took a triumphant tone, saying, "The time of threats is over; the period of unilateralism is over."

The event, which drew diplomatic and security officials from throughout the Persian Gulf and the West was organized by the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

Iran's activities in Iraq have been of concern to Washington because American intelligence says Iran is providing explosives and triggering devices and possibly other military support to militant fighters in Iraq.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended in a report released Wednesday that the United States establish an Iraq International Support Group, which would involve Iraq's neighbors, including Iran, other Middle East states, the United States and other permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, among others.

At the same time, the panel expressed concerns that Iran might not be willing to join such a diplomatic effort.

"Our limited contacts with Iran's government lead us to believe that its leaders are likely to say they will not participate in diplomatic efforts to support stability in Iraq," the report said. "They attribute this reluctance to their belief that the United States seeks regime change in Iran."

The Bush administration has been very skeptical of the idea of opening a full-scale dialogue with Tehran. David M. Satterfield, the State Department's coordinator for Iraq, suggested to the Senate Armed Service Committee last month that the United States was prepared "in principle'' for limited discussions.

"We are prepared in principle to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq,'' Mr. Satterfield said at the time. "The timing of such a direct dialogue is one that we still have under review.''

DOJ_NMG_0104676

When asked whether Iran would join such a diplomatic effort, Mr. Mottaki signaled that his nation would only do so as part of an arrangement in which the United States began to withdraw its forces.

"The United States should help itself before anyone else," he told reporters after his presentation. "The first step is they have to say that they will be ready to leave Iraq."

American officials at the meeting doubted that Iran could improve the situation in Iraq, dismissing Mr. Mottaki's speech as posturing to put Iran's Arab neighbors at ease about the chances of a confrontation between Iran and the United States.

They emphasized that they had made no contact with the Iranians during the meeting.

"They don't want to appear to be begging for a dialogue when we don't seem too eager in doing so ourselves," said one United States official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment. "But they do seem pretty confident that things are going their way."

Senior American officials were invited to the meeting, and Stephen J. Hadley, President Bush's national security adviser, had been expected to attend. But he and other top-level officials did not participate. The administration is conducting a policy review on the issue, and analysts said it would have been awkward for the officials to defend a policy that had not been decided.

At the meeting, Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister, expressed concerns about the Iraqi Study Group report. He objected to the threat in the report to withhold American economic and military support if Iraq's government did not make steady process toward reconciliation, asserting that the study did not give Iraqis enough credit for holding elections and other steps to build a new state.

"This is most about U.S. policies, less about Iraqi concerns. In fact, we in Iraq have some serious concerns about this report."

Mr. Mottaki, the Iranian official, reiterated calls for a new regional cooperation effort that included Iran and cut out the United States. He suggested establishing a common understanding on what security is, identifying the obstacles to security, offering gulf states a guarantee of their security in addition to increasing cooperation on economic and security issues and holding a continuous dialogue to reduce foreign influence in the region.

Iran Offers To Help U.S. Exit From Iraq (AP)

By Jim Krane, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

Iran's foreign minister delivered a blunt challenge to the United States on Saturday, saying Tehran is willing to help U.S. troops withdraw from neighboring Iraq but only if Washington makes some tough policy changes.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki claimed U.S. troops were responsible for at least half the violence tearing apart Iraq and that their departure would pay security dividends for the entire region.

"If the United States changes its attitude, the Islamic Republic of Iran is ready to help with the withdrawal from Iraq," Mottaki told the International Institute of Strategic Studies conference here. "Fifty percent of the problem of insecurity in Iraq is the presence of foreign troops."

Mottaki echoed calls made last week by Iran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, for Gulf Arab countries to eject American bases in their countries and establish a regional security pact with Iran. Mottaki went further and offered deeper cooperation with the six Gulf Arab states on energy, tourism, business and counter-narcotics.

Iran's offers do not seem to have tempted Gulf neighbors who are apparently more worried about the dangers of living near Iran's nuclear facilities, especially amid threats by Washington and Israel to use military force to destroy them.

Mottaki's forceful speech was a challenge to U.S. interests in the Gulf and a strong display of the country's rising assertiveness in the face of U.S failures in the region.

At one point, Mottaki addressed an international audience that included U.S. Vice Adm. David Nichols, the deputy chief of U.S. Central Command, and said the regional chaos sparked by the Bush administration's twin wars demonstrated that U.S. military force was no longer a realistic policy option in the Middle East.

"Today the time of threats is over. The period of unilateralism is over," Mottaki said. "Look at Iraq. Look at Afghanistan. That gives us a very important lesson."

DOJ_NMG_0104677

Iran's proposal for a Gulf security alliance shows no sign of gaining traction among the region's Arab leaders. Bahraini Foreign Minister Sheik Khalid bin Ahmed Al Khalifa said security of the energy-rich region depends on the United States, the European Union and other major oil-importing countries.

Much of the discussion at this security conference centered on the U.S. Iraq Study Group report, and its recommendation that Washington seek Iran's help in steering Iraq away from civil war.

William Cohen, defense secretary under President Clinton, urged Iran to push for talks with Washington.

"If you forgo aspirations for nuclear weapons and cut off funding for radical elements and support the Mideast peace process, then yes, you'd be welcomed into the international community. We'd have billions of dollars going into your economy," Cohen told the Iranians among 250 delegates from 22 countries.

"If Iran is simply interested in pursuing a nuclear energy program and not weapons, that's something the U.S. wouldn't object to and would support."

What Motivates Syria? (WP)

By Imad Moustapha

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

U.S. engagement -- or rather reengagement -- with Syria has become a salient topic in almost every political debate on U.S. policy in the Middle East, particularly regarding Iraq.

But while commentators argue over whether the United States should engage Syria and whether Syria has the will to cooperate or even the capability to deliver intended outcomes, it appears that the Bush administration remains incapable of searching for a comprehensive approach to the strife in Iraq.

According to top officials in the Bush administration, engagement with Syria would yield no benefits. What is Syria's reaction to this viewpoint? Well, we believe that if U.S. officials continue to regard a dialogue with Syria as a matter of "dictating" -- that is, telling Syria what it ought and ought not to do -- then their predictions are correct.

Given such a "dialogue," Syria would have to agree with the Bush administration officials who say that nothing can be achieved by such engagement. It would be a waste of valuable time for both sides, and in the meantime the situation in Iraq would continue to spiral downward from disastrous to catastrophic.

But if the Bush administration comes to realize that truly engaging consists of an honest dialogue in which all parties are involved, then positive results will be possible -- for Iraq, the United States, Syria and the entire region.

Contrary to what many in Washington believe, past Syrian-American collaboration has yielded many beneficial outcomes, a fact that several former U.S. officials could confirm. These include, among other things, Syrian cooperation on the Middle East peace process, on al-Qaeda and, yes, on Iraq.

What motivates Syria to engage on Iraq? Let us be clear: Syria is not looking for a "deal" with the U.S. administration on any issue. The situation in Iraq is a matter of paramount concern to Syria, particularly the unprecedented levels of death and destruction and the possibility of Iraq's disintegrating, which would have terrible repercussions for the entire Middle East.

Thus Syria has the will and the capacity to assist in Iraq. This help is imperative to Syrian national interests. Syria can cooperate on security issues with the Iraqis and can give considerable support to their political process. The visit of our foreign minister to Baghdad, and the resumption of diplomatic ties between Damascus and Baghdad after a 25-year lapse, clearly illustrates our commitment to a free, peaceful and unified Iraq.

But Syria recognizes that no magical solution exists to instantaneously achieve the desired objectives. A rigorous and comprehensive approach is required. This approach should include a reconsideration of U.S. policy in Iraq, starting with the recognition of the necessity to include all parties involved: neighboring countries and all factions of the Iraqi political and social spectrum.

No party should feel defeated or excluded. All stakeholders in the future of Iraq should feel that it is in their own interest to help stabilize the situation.

DOJ_NMG_0104678

A solution should also include U.S. acknowledgment that the majority of Iraqis regard the occupation as only exacerbating the situation and causing further violence and instability. A U.S. plan for withdrawal should be on the table. Only such a step will prove to the various parties involved that the United States genuinely plans to return Iraq to the Iraqis.

Syria believes that engagement of all parties will ultimately become inevitable and the only route forward. Until this happens, all parties will continue to lose. Above all, if it does not happen, Iraq will continue to pay the terrible price for such lack of vision.

Training Iraqis May Pose Risks For U.S. (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

The newest program for training Iraqi security forces, embedding 11- to 15-member U.S. transition teams in Iraqi battalions, represents a "high-risk assignment" for the American officers and men involved, according to top military training officials.

The concept is considered so dangerous that a group of potential replacements stand ready at Fort Riley, the U.S. Army base directing the program, for immediate shipment to Iraq if members of a deployed team are killed or wounded, Maj. Gen. Carter F. Ham, who runs the training program, told House members last week.

While the U.S. training of Iraqis is considered key in determining the future of the American presence in Iraq, it remains a work in progress three years after it began, according to present and former senior U.S. Army and Marine officers involved in the process.

The disbanding of Saddam Hussein's army in May 2003 and the disappearance of local police units compelled the United States and coalition allies to rebuild almost from scratch a variety of Iraqi security forces, including a national army, local national guard units, special commando teams, a national police force, border police, local police and a facilities protection service.

Complicating matters was a desire among coalition officials in 2003 and 2004 to keep the new Iraqi army lightly armed, in part so it could not threaten any democratic government established in Baghdad. As part of that approach, former senior officers from Hussein's army initially were excluded from service, and the first national police units developed were not trained or equipped to deal with either insurgency or serious security threats.

The result of the hesitant U.S. training effort, the Iraq Study Group reported Wednesday, is that Iraqi army units are of questionable loyalty to the Baghdad government, the police units cannot control crime, and some, according to the report, "routinely engage in sectarian violence." The facilities protection service is "incompetent, dysfunctional or subversive."

Lt. Gen. James J. Lovelace Jr., the Army's deputy chief of staff for personnel, told the House Armed Services Committee on Thursday that the current goal is to train 325,000 Iraqis, with 134,000 in the army and at least 180,000 as police officers.

The latest enhancement to the training task is the embedding of transition teams whose job is to "advise, coach, teach and mentor Iraqi security forces and provide direct access to coalition . . . air support, artillery, medical evacuation and intelligence-gathering," Lovelace said.

The teams, made up of highly qualified senior commissioned and noncommissioned officers, have specialties that include combat operations, intelligence, communications and logistics. Because they live with the Iraqi units, it is a "high-risk assignment," Marine Maj. Gen. George J. Flynn, commander of the Marine Corps training and education command, told the panel.

"In many ways, these individuals are out there alone and unafraid," and this speaks "to the quality of the men and women who are in uniform," Flynn added.

During a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Thursday, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) questioned the program and focused on the risk factor in opposing the idea of reducing U.S. combat troops in Iraq by early 2008.

To "withdraw the troops and then still have thousands of American soldiers embedded in Iraqi units that are of questionable value or loyalty, I think, puts at risk a large number of American military advisers," McCain said.

DOJ_NMG_0104679

The training plan, however, contemplates the continued presence in Iraq of rapid-response U.S. combat units with helicopters and aircraft that could be quickly called in for support should embedded teams come under fire.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the top U.S. field commander in Iraq, told Pentagon reporters Friday that no decision had yet been made on how many of the new teams will be requested.

The Iraq Study Group described training of the Iraqi army as "a primary mission of U.S. military strategy," despite problems such as the sectarian nature of the Iraqi forces and the manner in which personnel were recruited. The latter has contributed, the group reported, to forces resisting deployment to other parts of the country and refusing to carry out missions.

Pulling Out Combat Troops Would Still Leave Most Forces In Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — Frontline combat troops in the 15 brigades carrying out the American fight in Iraq — which the Iraq Study Group says could be largely withdrawn in just over a year — represent about 23 percent of the 140,000 military personnel committed to the overall war effort there.

On any given day, according to military officers in Baghdad, only about 11 percent of the Army and Marine Corps personnel in Iraq are carrying out purely offensive operations. Even counting others, whose main job is defensive or who perform security missions to stabilize the country for economic reconstruction and political development, only half of the American force might be considered combat troops.

Even if all of the group's proposals were carried out, it is not possible to predict exactly how many Americans will stay, or for how long. Decisions will hinge on military conditions on the ground and political conditions in Washington.

But an analysis of the current numbers and tasks of American forces suggests that it will prove difficult to drop far below 100,000 by early 2008, and that 70,000 or more troops might have to stay for a considerable time.

The bipartisan report, which acknowledged that a sustained and "considerable" troop presence would be necessary, called urgently for increasing the 4,000 American trainers now with Iraqis to as many as 20,000. That shift has been endorsed in general terms by President Bush. And commanders in Iraq, on their own accord, are already moving troops from their combat ranks to the training teams. So members of American brigade combat teams will stay for some time, in any case.

Americans assigned to join Iraqi units as advisers and trainers — fighting alongside the Iraqis when necessary, with other combat forces on call in case of emergency — must be backed up by the full array of drivers, cooks, guards, planners, intelligence analysts, communications teams, helicopter crews, mechanics and medical units without which no military operation can be mounted. And as long as the violence in Iraq persists, they must be protected from attack.

According to Pentagon statistics, about 23 percent of the troops currently assigned to the Iraq mission conduct primarily combat jobs. The 15 combat brigades — each with an official roster of about 3,500 and totaling about 52,500 soldiers and marines in Iraq — make up well over a third of the overall force. But each brigade includes units that provide support, logistics and security for those troops conducting direct combat operations.

Electricians and mechanics make up 20 percent of the overall American mission, with "functional support/administrative" personnel and "service and supply handlers" each contributing another 11 percent, according to Pentagon personnel statistics.

Other major categories include communications and intelligence troops — 8 percent — and health service providers, including such critical missions as medical evacuation teams, at 4 percent of the force. Craftsmen account for just under 4 percent. Those statistics do not includes their officers.

These statistics were drawn from an unclassified Pentagon report dated Sept. 30, 2006, which listed American deployments in the Middle East to carry out and support what the Pentagon classifies as "The Global War on Terror." Three senior officers who served yearlong deployments in Iraq at the headquarters level reviewed the Pentagon statistics on regional deployments and said they provide an accurate if somewhat rough picture of how American troops are assigned military tasks in Iraq today.

But that is just one set of statistics describing troop deployments. Those statistics listing official military occupations in the region do not tell the full story of how the force deployed on the ground carries out the mission each day, according to officers in Baghdad.

Lt. Col. Michelle L. Martin-Hing, spokeswoman for the Multinational Corps-Iraq, offered different statistics that show that during day-to-day operations, about 40 percent of the troops conduct combat missions while about 60 percent carry out support missions.

She provided statistics compiled by the military's operational headquarters in Iraq that list 11 percent of the force as assigned to offensive operations on any given day, and another 22 percent of the troops assigned to force protection and another 22 percent to security operations. About 35 percent carry out tasks that sustain the mission.

Iraqi security forces are not able to gather and analyze sufficient intelligence to carry out all of their missions, nor even to plan them. Likewise, the Iraqis do not have the infrastructure to buy, transport and distribute all of the ammunition, food and fuel that those indigenous forces require, nor to maintain all of their equipment.

Those logistical tasks fall to Americans, and, given the time it will take to build up Iraq's capabilities, are likely to continue to for years to come, even long after the Baghdad government has assumed full military command.

The Iraq mission is not especially top-heavy, according to Pentagon statistics. Generals and their executive staffs amount to one-tenth of one percent of the force.

Other categories in the Pentagon personnel statistics include tactical operations officers, at 6 percent; engineering and maintenance officers, at 2 percent; supply and procurement officers, at 1.7 percent; and health care officers, at 1.5 percent.

Despite increased agility and speed in how it carries out its combat operations, the American military's ratio of combat to support troops has remained in Iraq at levels seen throughout modern history, mostly because the insurgency eliminated the concept of safe and comfortable rear areas that existed in previous wars, making every supply and planning and convoy job more difficult and dangerous.

Andrew F. Krepinevich Jr., executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments here, said militaries traditionally require three to five soldiers to support every fighter, and in the case of Iraq some of that support is elsewhere in the Persian Gulf region.

"In the time of Alexander the Great, everyone on the battlefield carried a spear," Mr. Krepinevich said. "But over the great sweep of history, the tail has increased faster than the tooth." In America's most recent sustained conflict, in Vietnam, "when we had roughly half a million soldiers on the ground, less than 100,000 were actually combat troops, carrying rifles around," he said.

Black-Market Weapon Prices Surge In Iraq Chaos (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

SULAIMANIYA, Iraq, Dec. 8 — The Kurdish security contractor placed the black plastic box on the table. Inside was a new Glock 19, one of the 9-millimeter pistols that the United States issued by the tens of thousands to the Iraqi Army and police.

This pistol was no longer in the custody of the Iraqi Army or police. It had been stolen or sold, and it found its way to an open-air grocery stand that does a lively black-market business in police and infantry arms. The contractor bought it there.

He displayed other purchases, including a short-barreled Kalashnikov assault rifle with a collapsible stock that makes it easy to conceal under a coat or fire from a car. "I bought this for $450 last year," he said of the rifle. "Now it costs $650. The prices keep going up."

The market for this American-issued pistol and the ubiquitous assault rifle illustrated how fear, mismanagement and malfeasance are shaping the small-arms market in Iraq.

Weapon prices are soaring along with an expanding sectarian war, as more buyers push prices several times higher than those that existed at the time of the American-led invasion nearly four years ago. Rising prices, in turn, have encouraged an insidious form of Iraqi corruption — the migration of army and police weapons from Iraqi state armories to black-market sales.

All manner of infantry arms, from rocket-propelled grenade launchers to weathered and dented Kalashnikovs, have circulated within Iraq for decades.

DOJ_NMG_0104681

But three types of American-issued weapons are now readily visible in shops and bazaars here as well: Glock and Walther 9-millimeter pistols, and pristine, unused Kalashnikovs from post-Soviet Eastern European countries. These are three of the principal types of the 370,000 weapons purchased by the United States for Iraq's security forces, a program that was criticized by a special inspector general this fall for, among other things, failing to properly account for the arms.

The weapons are easy to find, resting among others in the semihidden street markets here, where weapons are sold in tea houses, the back rooms of grocery kiosks, cosmetics stores and rug shops, or from the trunks of cars. Proprietors show samples for immediate purchase and offer to take orders — 10 guns can be had in two hours, they say, and 100 or more the next day.

"Every type of gun that the Americans give comes to the market," said Brig. Hassan Nouri, chief of the political investigations bureau for the Sulaimaniya district. "They go from the U.S. Army to the Iraqi Army to the smugglers. I have captured many of these guns that the terrorists bought."

The forces propelling the trade can be seen in the price fluctuations of the country's most abundant firearm, the Kalashnikov.

In early 2003, a Kalashnikov in northern Iraq typically cost from $75 to $150, depending on its condition, origin and style. Immediately after the invasion, as fleeing soldiers abandoned their rifles and armories were looted, prices fell, pushed down by a glut and a brief sense of optimism.

Today, the same weapons typically cost $210 to $650, according to interviews with seven arms dealers, two senior Kurdish security officials and several customers. In other areas of Iraq, prices have climbed as high as $800, according to Phillip Killicoat, a researcher who has been assembling data on Kalashnikov prices worldwide for the Small Arms Survey, a Geneva-based organization.

The price ranges reflect not only a weapon's condition but its model. A Kalashnikov made in a former Soviet-bloc factory costs more than a Kalashnikov made in China, North Korea or Iraq. Collapsible-stock models have become disproportionately expensive. The price ranges do not include the most compact Kalashnikovs, like those Osama bin Laden has been photographed with, which now have a collector's value in Iraq and can cost as much as $2,000.

In many ways, weapon prices provide a condensed history of Iraq's slide into chaos.

Prices began moving upward in the summer of 2003 as several classes of customers entered the market together, Iraqi security officials and the arms dealers said. Western security contractors, Sunni insurgent groups, Shiite paramilitary units and criminals who were released from prison by Saddam Hussein before the war all sought the same weapons at once.

Kalashnikov prices quickly reached $200, they said. Since late last year, prices have been moving up again, as sectarian war has spread. Militias have been growing at the same time that more civilians have been seeking weapons for self-defense — twin demand pressures that pushed prices to new heights this fall.

"Now the Sunni want the weapons because they fear the Shia, and the Shia want the weapons because they fear the Sunni," said Brig. Sarkawt Hassan Jalal, the chief of security in the Sulaimaniya district. "So prices go up."

Mr. Killicoat put it another way. "When households start entering the market, that's a free-for-all," he said.

The surge is evident across a spectrum of arms. Pistol prices have nearly tripled since 2003. Western 9-millimeter pistols now sell for $1,100 to $1,800 in the bazaars of this city. Sniper rifles cost $1,100 to $2,000, the dealers said. In the West, similar pistols sell for $400 to $600.

Arms dealers say that rising prices have led to more extensive pilfering from state armories, including the widespread theft of weapons the United States had issued to Iraq's police officers and soldiers.

"In the south, if the Americans give the Iraqis weapons, the next day you can buy them here," said one dealer, who sold groceries in the front of his kiosk and offered weapons in the back. "The Iraqi Army, the Iraqi police — they all sell them right away."

No weapons were displayed when two visitors arrived. But when asked, the owner and a friend swiftly retrieved six pistols, a rocket-propelled grenade launcher and three Kalashnikovs from a car and another room.

The rifles and the grenade launcher were wrapped in rice sacks. He slipped two of the rifles out of the cloth. They were spotless and unworn, inside and out, and appeared never to have been used. They had folding stocks and were priced at $560 each.

DOJ_NMG_0104682

The dealer said they had recently been taken from an Iraqi armory. "Almost all of the weapons come from the Iraqi police and army," he said. "They are our best suppliers."

One pistol was a new Walther P99, a 9-millimeter pistol that the dealer said had been issued by the Americans to the Iraqi police. It was still in its box.

Glock pistols were also easy to find. One young Iraqi man, Rebwar Mustafa, showed a Glock 19 he had bought at the bazaar in Kirkuk last year for $900. Five of his friends have bought identical models, he said.

When asked if he was surprised that the Iraqi police and soldiers sold their own guns, he scoffed.

"Everything goes to the bazaar," he said.

He added: "It is not only pistols. A lot of police cars are being sold. The smugglers brought us three cars and asked if we wanted to buy them. Their doors were still blue, and police labels were on them. The lights were still on top."

Although the scale of weapons sales is unmistakably large, it is impossible to measure precisely. Sales are almost always hidden and unrecorded.

Tracing American-issued weapons back to Iraqi units that sell them is especially difficult because the United States did not register serial numbers for almost all of the 370,000 small arms purchased for Iraqi security forces, according to a report by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction.

The weapons were paid for with $133 million from the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund. Among them were at least 138,000 new Glock pistols and at least 165,000 Kalashnikov assault rifles that had not previously been used, according to the report.

Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq, agreed that weapons provided by the United States had slipped from custody.

"I certainly concede that there are weapons that have been lost, stolen and misappropriated," General Dempsey said. He noted that the inspector general had estimated that 4 percent, or about 14,000 weapons, were lost between arriving in Iraq and being transferred to Iraqi forces. Most of the weapons were pistols.

The general said that he thought the estimate was high and that accountability was improving. A weapons registry was being created, he said. "Serial numbers are being registered," he said.

But the estimate of a 4 percent loss did not include weapons that were lost or stolen after being issued to Iraqi units. The arms dealers said this was the main source of their goods.

The arms dealers described several factors that kept weapons flowing from state custody.

Some have been taken by insurgents in ambushes or raids. Defections and resignations have also been common in Iraqi police and army units, they said, and often departing soldiers and officers leave with their weapons, which are worth more than several months of pay.

Aaron Karp, a small-arms researcher at Old Dominion University, said Iraq resembled African countries that had had extraordinary difficulties with the police selling off their guns. "The gun becomes the most valuable thing in the household," he said.

"If anything happens to a police officer's family and he needs money, he walks into work the next day and says, 'Hey, my gun got stolen.' "

Another weapons dealer, who Kurdish officials said had been providing them with weapons since 1991, said the latest black-market sales followed an old pattern precisely.

Throughout Mr. Hussein's rule, Iraqi Army officers were in the arms trade, he said, selling weapons to smugglers. This was how the Kurdish guerrillas kept themselves supplied.

Now, he said, the smugglers remain in business, and their trade is made easier because the units often do not have inventories. "I am surprised sometimes by the numbers," he said. "Sometimes they come by the hundreds."

Like The Nation, Military Families Divided On Iraq (WP)

By Christian Davenport, Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104683

Nancy Hecker hasn't read the Iraq Study Group's report. She doesn't need to. She knows her son, Army Maj. William F. Hecker III, died at 37 for a just cause, no matter what the antiwar crowd thinks.

If she "can stand firm in support of our country and the mission, is it too much to ask the rest of the country to do so as well?" she asked.

Beverly Fabri also doesn't need the report to help her make up her mind on Iraq. "We are not going to win this war," she said. "And we shouldn't have gotten involved with it in the first place."

Almost three years after her 19-year-old son, Army Pvt. Bryan Nicholas Spry, was killed, she said: "I'm beginning to feel like he just died in vain, I really am."

As the country debates what's next for Iraq, many family members who have lost loved ones in the war are torn about what should happen and how the legacy of those who have died there will be affected.

When the war began nearly four years ago, there was virtually unanimous support for it among military families. But as the country's belief in it has deteriorated, cracks have also begun to show among those who were its staunchest backers. And now, as the death toll mounts, many are struggling to reconcile bad news that seems to keep getting worse with the mission their loved ones believed in and died fighting for.

In Kathy Petty's opinion, the report "is not going to change much." But she's not clear about what should be done in the war that claimed her son, Army Capt. Christopher P. Petty, 33.

On the one hand: "I want the Iraqi people to be free. I want them to have their democracy. That's what Chris died fighting for."

On the other: "You've got almost a civil war. . . . And I'm not sure what we could do better. I'm not sure sending more troops would work."

Her son believed in what he was doing there. She remembers how he talked about building schools for Iraqis, and how the soldiers were treated like heroes by the townspeople.

That's why Petty, of Vienna, doesn't think her son died in vain. But that doesn't mean there are any easy answers to what's happening in Iraq.

"I do want Chris's death to have been meaningful, but I don't know," she said. "It's very hard to see a light at the end of the tunnel, if you know what I mean. It just seems to keep getting worse."

On Wednesday, the day the Iraq Study Group report was released, at least 11 U.S. service members were killed. So far this month, more than 30 have died.

A poll conducted last week by the Associated Press found that 63 percent of respondents did not expect a stable, democratic government to take root in Iraq, up from 54 percent in June.

All the talk of changing course in Iraq by people who have never taken up arms there has worn on Malia Fry, whose husband, Marine Gunnery Sgt. John Fry, 28, was killed while disarming a bomb in March.

"I don't want him to have died for nothing," said Fry, who has three young children and lives near Waco, Tex. "I want us to finish the job."

Marine Lance Cpl. Eric W. Herzberg's faith in the war, like that of much of the country, waned as the conflict dragged on, said his mother, Gina Barnhurst. But when his unit was called, Herzberg, 20, of Severna Park, went without complaint, because "Marines are not political," Barnhurst said. "They do what they're asked to do. They do it for their country. They do it for us."

And that's why she believes political leaders should think about the death of her son -- and the deaths of others -- as they decide what to do next in Iraq.

It has been nearly a year since Hecker's son, a West Point graduate and father of four, was killed south of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded next to his Humvee. She still keeps a tissue handy to blot away the tears that so often rise when she thinks about him: how he was a soldier and a scholar, a student of warfare and literature who had developed a taste for fine wine and rich coffee. But her loss does not mean American forces should leave Iraq, she said. Her son wouldn't want that.

Hecker, of Vienna, worries that the good things happening in Iraq are being suppressed by the media or buried under the din of politicians seeking office.

DOJ_NMG_0104684

"If we had all stood firm on this, it would have sent a message to the terrorists," she said. "The more divided that we were, the more opportunity they saw to be successful by destroying our national will."

What Hecker sees as harmful dissent, Yvonne Green of Baltimore believes is democracy at work. The Iraq Study Group recommendation to draw down combat troops was long overdue, to her mind. And she thinks it doesn't go far enough.

"They still aren't bringing the troops home immediately," she said. "If you're going to pull them out, do it immediately."

Still, the report boosted her belief that Iraq is a lost cause, and when she heard about it on the news, she thought: "What took you so long?"

Now she wonders how the debate at home affects the soldiers who served with her daughter -- Army Spec. Toccara R. Green, 23, who was killed last year -- and the other service members still in Iraq.

"I really feel bad for the troops, because it's like they are constantly getting told mixed messages," she said. "They are being told different things all the time. They don't know. Are we leaving? Are we staying?"

Command Sgt. Major Jeff Krausse, 51, of the Washington National Guard, said the country never should have invaded Iraq. He spent a year there, ending in 2005. About three weeks after he got home, his daughter, Army 1st Lt. Jaime Campbell, 25, died when the helicopter she was co-piloting crashed in northern Iraq.

Asked about the war, Krausse said: "First of all, I believe that we were lied to." He denounced the "propaganda" about weapons of mass destruction that justified the invasion and described the war now as a "no-win situation" that is "costing the taxpayers billions of dollars."

Still, he said, he'd go back if called.

"Unfortunately, now that we're there, we've got to finish what we've started," Krausse said from his home in Washington state. "This country is going to lose its credibility if we don't stay and do the right thing."

Jason Scott also has a big stake in how the war turns out. He lost an arm and an eye there and spent more than a year recovering at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Now he can understand how Vietnam veterans felt coming home to a country that didn't support the war. And he worries about the effect it could have on the country's resolve.

"Public opinion has become so negative," he said. "So rather than make the hard decision to continue on to do the hard work to fix the situation, we're going to cut out and take the easy path."

If that happened, it would undercut the sacrifices so many soldiers made, he said. But it wouldn't diminish their service.

"That legacy of us being professional soldiers who answered the call can't be taken away from us no matter what happens," said Scott, 29, who now lives in Orlando. "I'll always be proud to be an American soldier. That's not going to change if we leave Iraq."

David Hartman's daughter, Army Sgt. Jennifer M. Hartman, 21, died in September. Since then her father, of New Ringgold, Pa., said he has stopped watching the news about Iraq.

He hadn't hard much about the Iraq Study Group or read its report. And he doesn't much care what it said about the future of Iraq.

"It's not going to bring her back."

The Sunshine Boys Can't Save Iraq (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

IN America we like quick fixes, closure and an uplifting show. Such were the high hopes for the Iraq Study Group, and on one of the three it delivered.

The report of the 10 Washington elders was rolled out like a heartwarming Hollywood holiday release. There was a feel-good title, "The Way Forward," unfortunately chosen as well by Ford Motor to promote its last-ditch plan to stave off bankruptcy. There was a months-long buildup, with titillating sneak previews to whip up anticipation. There was the gala publicity tour on opening day, starting with a President Bush cameo timed for morning television and building to a "Sunshine Boys" curtain call by James Baker and Lee Hamilton on "Larry King Live."

DOJ_NMG_0104685

The wizard behind it all was the public relations giant Edelman, which has lately been recruited by Wal-Mart to put down the populist insurgency threatening its bottom line. Edelman's vice chairman is Michael Deaver, the imagineer extraordinaire of the Reagan presidency, and "The Way Forward" had a nostalgic dash of that old Morning-in-America vibe. In The Washington Post, David Broder gushingly quoted one member of the group, Alan Simpson, musing that "immigration, Social Security and all those other things that have been hung up for so long" might benefit from similar ex-officio bipartisanship. Only in Washington could an unelected panel of retirees pass for public-policy Viagra.

Mr. Simpson notwithstanding, the former senator who most comes to mind is Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York. In the early 1990's he famously coined the phrase "defining deviancy down" to describe the erosion of civic standards for what constitutes criminal behavior. In 2006, our governmental ailment is defining reality down. "The Way Forward" is its apotheosis.

This syndrome begins at the top, with the president, who has cut and run from reality in Iraq for nearly four years. His case is extreme but hardly unique. Take Robert Gates, the next defense secretary, who was hailed as a paragon of realism by Washington last week simply for agreeing with his Senate questioners that we're "not winning" in Iraq. While that may be a step closer to candor than Mr. Bush's "absolutely, we're winning" of late October, it's hardly the whole truth and nothing but. The actual reality is that we have lost in Iraq.

That's what Donald Rumsfeld at long last acknowledged, between the lines, as he fled the Pentagon to make way for Mr. Gates. The most revealing passage in his parting memo listing possible options for the war was his suggestion that public expectations for success be downsized so we would "therefore not 'lose.' " By putting the word lose in quotes, Mr. Rumsfeld revealed his hand: the administration must not utter that L word even though lose is exactly what we've done. The illusion of not losing must be preserved no matter what the price in blood.

The Iraq Study Group takes a similarly disingenuous tack. Its account of how the country Mr. Bush called a "grave and gathering danger" in September 2002 has devolved into a "grave and deteriorating" catastrophe today is unsparing and accurate. But everyone except the president knew this already, and that patina of realism evaporates once the report moves from diagnosis to prescription.

Its recommendations are bogus because the few that have any teeth are completely unattainable. Of course, it would be fantastic if additional Iraqi troops would stand up en masse after an infusion of new American military advisers. And if reconciliation among the country's warring ethnicities could be mandated on a tight schedule. And if the Bush White House could be persuaded to persuade Iran and Syria to "influence events" for America's benefit. It would also be nice if we could all break the bank in Vegas.

The group's coulda-woulda recommendations are either nonstarters, equivocations (it endorses withdrawal of combat troops by 2008 but is averse to timelines) or contradictions of its own findings of fact. To take just one example: Even if we could wave a magic wand and quickly create thousands more military advisers (and Arabic-speaking ones at that), there's no reason to believe they could build a crack Iraqi army and police force where all those who came before have failed. As the report points out, the loyalties and capabilities of the existing units are suspect as it is.

By prescribing such placebos, the Iraq Study Group isn't plotting a way forward but delaying the recognition of our defeat. Its real aim is to enact a charade of progress to pacify the public while Washington waits, no doubt in vain, for Mr. Bush to return to the real world. The tip-off to the cynical game can be found in a single sentence: "We agree with the goal of U.S. policy in Iraq, as stated by the president: 'an Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself.' " This studious group knows that even that modest goal, a radical devaluation of the administration's ambition to spread democracy throughout the Middle East, has long been proven a mirage. The Iraqi government's ability to defend anything is so inoperative that the group's members visited the country but once, with just one (Chuck Robb) daring to leave the Green Zone. The Bush-Maliki rendezvous 10 days ago was at the Four Seasons hotel in Amman.

The only recommendations that might alter that reality, however evanescently, come not from "The Way Forward" but from its critics on the right who want significantly more troops and no withdrawal timetables whatsoever. But a Pentagon review leaked to The Washington Post three weeks ago estimates that a true counterinsurgency campaign would "require several hundred thousand additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers as well as heavily armed Iraqi police," not the 20,000 or so envisioned as a short-term booster shot by John McCain.

Since these troops don't exist and there is no public support in either America or Iraq for mobilizing them, the president can't satisfy the hawks even if he chooses to do so. Since he's also dead set against a prompt withdrawal, we already know what his policy will be, no matter how many "reviews" he conducts. He will stay the course, with various fake-outs along the way to keep us from thinking we've "lost," until the whole mess is deposited in the lap of the next president.

But as Chuck Hagel said last week, "The impending disaster in Iraq is unwinding at a rate that we can't quite calibrate." It is yet another, even more reckless flight from reality to suppose that the world will stand still while we dally. The Iraq Study Group's insistence on dragging out its deliberations until after Election Day for the sake of domestic politics mocked and undermined the urgency of its own mission. Meanwhile the violence metastasized. Eleven more of our soldiers were killed on the day the group finally put on its show. The antagonists in Iraq are not about to take a recess while we celebrate Christmas. The mass exodus of Iraqis, some 100,000 per month, was labeled "the fastest-growing refugee crisis in the world" by Refugees International last week and might soon rival Darfur's.

THE Iraq-Vietnam parallels at this juncture are striking. In January 1968, L.B.J. replaced his arrogant failed defense secretary, Robert McNamara, with a practiced Washington hand, Clark Clifford. The war's violence boiled over soon after (Tet), prompting a downturn in American public opinion. Allies in our coalition of the willing — Thailand, the Philippines, Australia — had balked at tossing in new troops. Clifford commissioned a re-evaluation of American policy that churned up such ideas as a troop pullback, increased training of South Vietnamese forces and a warning to the South Vietnamese government that American assistance would depend on its performance. In March, a bipartisan group of wise men (from Dean Acheson to Omar Bradley) was summoned to the White House, where it seconded the notion of disengagement.

But there the stories of Vietnam and Iraq diverge. Those wise men, unlike the Iraq Study Group, were clear in their verdict. And that Texan president, unlike ours, paid more than lip service to changing course. He abruptly announced he would abjure re-election, restrict American bombing and entertain the idea of peace talks. But as Stanley Karnow recounts in "Vietnam: A History," it was already too late, after some 20,000 casualties and three years of all-out war, for an easy escape: "The frustrating talks were to drag on for another five years. More Americans would be killed in Vietnam than had died there previously. And the United States itself would be torn apart by the worst internal upheavals in a century."

The lesson in that is clear and sobering: As bad as things may seem now, they can yet become worse, and not just in Iraq. The longer we pretend that we have not lost there, the more we risk losing other wars we still may salvage, starting with Afghanistan.

The members of the Iraq Study Group are all good Americans of proven service to their country. But to the extent that their report forestalls reality and promotes pipe dreams of one last chance for success in this fiasco, it will be remembered as just one more delusional milestone in the tragedy of our age.

The Great Divide Over Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

On the 65th anniversary of the attack on Pearl Harbor, the pieces moved into place for a foreign policy and national security debate as consequential as any this nation and its allies have faced since the start of World War II.

The Iraq Study Group -- 10 senior statesmen, equally divided between the political parties -- threw down the challenge in a unanimous report that showed no signs of being compromised or softened in the interests of bipartisan comity. This was not a happy-talk report.

The next day, President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, heirs to the roles of Roosevelt and Churchill, responded in equally forceful tones -- and the debate was on.

Bush and Blair described the government they are trying to save in Baghdad as a democratic reflection of the essentially moderate mainstream of Iraqi society, weak in military strength and beset by extremist Shiite and Sunni forces that are financed and armed by neighboring dictators in Syria and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0104687

Bush approvingly quoted Blair as saying, "The violence is not an accident or a result of faulty planning. It is a deliberate strategy. It is the direct result of outside extremists teaming up with internal extremists -- al-Qaeda with the Sunni insurgents and Iran with the Shia militia."

The Iraq Study Group -- a self-selected group of longtime pre-Bush officials -- came right back to insist that this view was a fundamental mischaracterization of the situation. The problem in Iraq, according to an interview Thursday with the panel's co-chairmen, James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic chairman of the House Foreign Relations Committee, is something almost entirely different. They contend that the Iraqi politicians, chosen from religious communities, have been unwilling to make the political trade-offs necessary to build support among the public and in the army and security services for the secular state promised by the Iraqi constitution. The Iraqi politicians procrastinate on dividing up the oil revenue to include the Sunni minority, and they drag their feet on setting up regional governments.

These widely different diagnoses of what ails Iraq, plagues the Iraqi people and vexes the American and British forces lead to very different conclusions. Bush wants to step up the training and assistance for the nascent Iraqi army. The Iraq Study Group would offer more help -- economic, military and diplomatic -- only if the government in Baghdad began soon to repair its factional fights. Otherwise, it would gradually reduce that aid and, in any case, redeploy most allied combat brigades by the first quarter of 2008.

The different strategies appear most vividly when it comes to Iran and Syria. In a passionate response to a question about the ISG suggestion that those two nations be invited to participate in seeking a settlement in Iraq and the broader Middle East, Bush said, "In Iraq, they support terrorists and death squads who are fomenting sectarian violence . . . . In Lebanon, they're supporting Hezbollah . . . . In Afghanistan, they're supporting remnants of the Taliban . . . . In the Palestinian territories, they are working to stop moderate leaders . . . . In each of these places, radicals and extremists are using terror to stop the spread of freedom. And they do so because they want to spread their ideologies -- their ideologies of hate -- and impose their rule on this vital part of the world . . . . And should they succeed, history will look back on our time with unforgiving clarity and demand to know, what happened?"

Agree with Bush's policy or not, there is a theory of history -- and of political science -- behind it. You may label it as neoconservative, but that does not denigrate it.

Baker, who was running diplomacy when this Bush was still part owner of the Texas Rangers baseball club, looks at Syria and sees a country that wanted to be helpful to the West and that aided us in Afghanistan. He looks at Iran and sees a complex society, with nothing to be lost by reaching out to any moderate elements in its government.

The Iraq Study Group report has been embraced by most congressional Democrats. It has been greeted warily by most congressional Republicans. The president has asked for -- and deserves -- time to take in all its recommendations and absorb its chilling picture of what faces us in Iraq.

But one thing is clear. As Baker and Hamilton say, there is no other bipartisan blueprint for the future. Bush will reject it at his peril.

The Bubble Boy In The Oval Office (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, December 10, 2006

THERE IS a famous "Twilight Zone" episode about a little boy in a small town who has fantastical powers. Through the misuse of his powers, the little boy has ruined the lives of everybody in the town — for instance, teleporting them into a cornfield, or summoning a snowstorm that destroys their crops. Because anyone who thinks an unhappy thought will be banished, the adults around him can do nothing but cheerfully praise his decisions while they try to nudge him in a less destructive direction.

This episode kept popping into my head when I was reading about President Bush and the Baker-Hamilton commission. Bush is the president of the United States, which therefore gives him enormous power, but he is treated by everybody around him as if he were a child.

Consider a story in the latest Time magazine, recounting the efforts — before the commission was approved by Congress — of three supporters to enlist Condoleezza Rice to win the administration's approval for the panel. Here is how Time reports it:

"As the trio departed, a Rice aide asked one of her suitors not to inform anyone at the Pentagon that chairmen had been chosen and the study group was moving forward. If Rumsfeld was alerted to the study group's potential impact, the aide said, he would quickly tell Cheney, who could, with a few words, scuttle the whole thing. Rice got through to Bush the next day, arguing that the thing was going to happen anyway, so he might as well get on board. To his credit, the President agreed."

The article treats this exchange in a matter-of-fact way, but, what it suggests is completely horrifying. Rice apparently believed that Bush would simply follow the advice of whoever he spoke with. Therefore the one factor determining whether Bush would support the commission was whether Cheney or Rice managed to get to him first.

And now that the Baker-Hamilton report is out, the commissioners are carefully patronizing the commander in chief. As this newspaper reported, "Members of the commission said they were pleased that Bush gave them as much attention as he did, a full hour's worth. 'He could have scheduled us for 20 minutes plus 10 minutes for the cameras,' said former Atty. Gen. Edwin M. Meese III." Wow, a commission devoted hundreds or thousands of man-hours to addressing the central conundrum of U.S. foreign policy, and the president gave them a whole hour of his time!

In return for these considerations, the commission generously avoided revisiting the whole question of who got us into this fiasco and how. As the Washington Post put it, "The panel appeared to steer away from language that might inflame the Bush administration." Of course, "inflame" is a word typically associated with street mobs or other irrational actors. The fact that the president can be "inflamed" is no longer considered surprising enough to merit comment.

Indeed, everybody seems to understand that if you want to help amend the disaster in Iraq, the No. 1 rule is that you can't acknowledge it's a disaster in Bush's presence. Weekly Standard Executive Editor Fred Barnes, the court stenographer of the Bush administration, recently reported that this was a key factor in the hiring of Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Now, I would bet every dollar I own that Gates thinks the war was a mistake. But you can't say that to Bush. "Before hiring him," Barnes wrote, "Bush had to make sure Gates didn't think America's intervention in Iraq was a mistake."

Yes, Mr. President, it's good that you turned Iraq into a Hobbesian inferno of Al Qaeda terrorists and Islamist death squads. It's really, really good!

After The Fall (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

In fall 2007, the United States began to withdraw troops from Iraq, and so began the Second Thirty Years' War. This war was a bewildering array of small and vast conflicts, which flared and receded and flared again across the entire Middle East, but which were joined by a common theme.

The essence of all this disorder was that the Arab nation-states lost control. Subnational groups — like Hezbollah and the Mahdi Army — and supranational groups — like loosely connected terror networks, the new Sunni and Shiite Leagues and the satellite television networks — went from strength to strength while central national governments toppled and fell. The collapse of national governments led to a power vacuum that the more authentic and deeply rooted social groups sought to fill.

This war had several stages. The first was the disintegration of Iraq. No national institutions could survive the onslaught: there was no impartial justice, no effective law enforcement, no political organization that put loyalty to nation above loyalty to sect or tribe. Absent a government of laws, government by death squads emerged. Militias — with their own hospitals, schools and indoctrination systems — sought to impose order through assassination and revenge.

The Muslim world watched the Sunni-Shiite bloodletting on satellite television and became enraged. Militias, seminaries and terror organizations developed transnational alliances. Shiite uprisings occurred in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Pakistan. Furious Sunnis rallied in places like Egypt, demanding that their leaders preserve Sunni supremacy.

The environment was ripe for new sorts of radical leaders, influenced by Moktada al-Sadr and Sheik Hassan Nasrallah. These leaders were hot, charismatic and divisive. They had no intellectual ties to the old 20th-century Arab nationalism, which was scorned as the model that failed.

Chaos spread as governments in Lebanon and Jordan collapsed. The Palestinian Authority fell into complete dysfunction as Hamas and Fatah waged a low-boiling civil war. Al Qaeda reveled in the bloodshed and spread it with rapturous fury. The spreading disorder vindicated an observation that the historian Michael Oren had once made: that there are really only three nations in the Muslim Middle East: Iran, Turkey and Egypt. The other nations are make-believe. The borders are arbitrary and the governments are artificial.

The surviving governments scrambled to stay in front of their radicalized populations and meddled ceaselessly in the wars around them. Turkey meddled in Kurdistan. Iran meddled everywhere through Hezbollah and a legion of mini-Hezbollahs. The Saudis tried to buy their enemies off, but only ended up financing them. Egyptians spread out everywhere as foot soldiers and assassins, especially after the end of the Mubarak era.

Westerners had a great deal of trouble understanding the ever-shifting conflicts among sects they didn't understand and tribes they'd never heard of. Early in the war, Americans engaged in a moronic debate about whether Iraq was in civil war, which illustrated that American vocabularies were trapped in the nation-state paradigm, and how unprepared Americans were to understand the non-nation-state world.

Parallels were made, some apt, some inapt, to the first Thirty Years' War, which decimated Europe in the 17th century. That, too, was a spasmodic constellation of conflicts not among nation-states, but among faiths, tribes and local groupings.

This second version of that war produced a Middle East that looked medieval and postmodern at the same time. The core weakness of Middle Eastern nations was that over centuries Arab society had developed intricate social organizations based on family, tribe and faith. Loyalty to these superseded national bonds. Notions of federalism, subsidiarity and impersonal administration — the underpinnings of the nation-state — had trouble flourishing in these sands.

The Middle East's weak national ties were ripped apart by the rising forces of the 21st century: religious fundamentalism, global terrorism, economic globalization and transnational communications networks. Efforts to do nation-building without security faced long odds. Efforts to exhort Iraqi and other leaders to behave "responsibly" — as defined by Western nationalist categories — were doomed to failure. The American defeat sealed the deal.

It was a terrible era for those brave patriots fighting for national unity. There was horrific turmoil, and the emergence of sociopolitical organizations whose likes the world had never seen.

Meanwhile, Reality In Iraq (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

LONDON -- President Bush has finally heard some realistic, even brutal, ideas about finding a path out of Iraq. But few of them came from the politically interesting but strategically flawed Iraq Study Group's report.

The future of Iraq came calling at the White House three times during an extraordinary 72-hour period last week. History (or perhaps White House chief of staff and visit-scheduler Josh Bolten) was taking no chances: It was announcing clearly to Bush a last chance to salvage some advantage and honor out of this administration's error-riddled occupation of Iraq.

As often occurs when history-warping moments compete for attention, the most important event was the least conspicuous one. A visit to the White House on Monday by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the single most powerful Shiite political leader in Iraq, was quickly eclipsed by the manufactured drama of the release of the policy study headed by Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton on Wednesday.

Their 79 recommendations turned out to be a mixed bag of good intentions (Hamilton's strength) and profound, manipulative cynicism (a Baker talent) that Bush cannot find congenial. By blanketing a withering silence over the concept and term, the report even rejects Bush's contention that Iraq is the central front in the "global war on terrorism."

The value of the report lies not in what it says about Iraq and certainly not in the insincere scheme the group hatched -- without seriously consulting Israel -- to have Israel hand the Golan Heights back to Syria as part of an American-led "New Diplomatic Offensive." Instead, the report's value lies in what it says about, and to, America. It makes pertinent recommendations on reorganizing key activities and relationships of the Pentagon, the State Department and Congress that should be pursued.

But on Iraq, the study group repeats the fundamental error that this administration has made since overthrowing Saddam Hussein. That is to refuse to anticipate and then accept the logical -- in fact, inescapable -- consequences of U.S. actions.

Having empowered the formerly persecuted Shiite majority in Iraq through regime change and democratic elections, Bush repeatedly has found its exercise of power suspect or unacceptable, primarily because of Shiite links to Iran.

And both the commission and Bush shrink from directly acknowledging that the struggle in Iraq is now the center of a much broader civil war -- a civil war within Islam that pits Shiites against Sunnis and moderates against extremists in both sects. American actions are not designed to give one religious group advantage over another. But they inevitably do and inevitably are judged in that light by the Iraqis and their neighbors. Again, the United States seems oblivious to the consequences for others of American choices.

This broader context made Hakim's soft words on Iraq's harsh realities the most important suggestions the president heard last week. As offered by the black-turbaned cleric in a series of public appearances in Washington and as supplemented by his aides, his view goes like this:

U.S. forces and the feeble central government do too little to protect Shiites. We can do that job ourselves if your troops get out of the way. That will clear the way for U.S. withdrawals while leading to the informal division of Iraq into three distinct autonomous regions. That is the only acceptable alternative to a strong central government controlled by the Shiites, which may no longer be in reach.

The Baker-Hamilton study group ruled out partition in any form. But the report trails events on the ground, as Bush is likely to have heard in his third high-level meeting on Iraq when he hosted British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Thursday.

In recent weeks British commanders have reported to London that Hakim's Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, has completed a gradual takeover of Iraq's south. That leaves British forces with little ability to influence events -- or reason to stay on much longer in any large numbers -- the commanders add pointedly.

Nationally, Hakim has watched patiently as his Shiite rivals in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa party and in Moqtada al-Sadr's organization have been chewed up in the meat grinder of Baghdad's barbaric sectarian conflicts, rampant corruption and U.S. inconsistency.

Hakim gave the impression in Washington of a man riding a wave carrying him inexorably toward where he wants to go. No one could say that about Bush during his crucible week.

Our "Messianic Impulse" (WP)

By Robert Kagan

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

As Americans struggle to find an answer to the serious problems in Iraq, larger and broader questions beckon. How did we wind up in Iraq in the first place? Some argue that we were too aggressive and self-righteous in promoting our principles, too meddlesome, too arrogant in seeking to transform the world, too quick to intervene militarily in crises far from our shores and remote from our interests. If the United States would only change its approach to the world, if it understood the virtues of limits, modesty and humility, we could avoid foreign policy debacles and the world would be a safer place.

This is actually a very old debate, which Americans have thrashed out in every generation. The expansive, idealistic, interventionist approach to the world has deep roots in the American character, going back to the nation's founding and the universal principles of liberalism embedded in the Declaration of Independence. As George Will once put it, the "messianic impulse" has been "a constant of America's national character, and a component of American patriotism."

But no less constant has been opposition to this grand vision, which critics since the nation's founding era have regarded as a recipe for endless war abroad and the undoing of American democracy at home.

The fight began at the beginning, in the ratification debates over the Constitution. Supporters such as George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, Benjamin Franklin and James Madison insisted that a strong central government was vital if the United States was to become a world power capable of shouldering its international responsibilities. The young United States was the "embryo of a great empire," Hamilton proclaimed. Patrick Henry, in turn, accused supporters of the Constitution of trying to "convert this country into a powerful and mighty empire," thereby betraying the nation's purpose. "When the American spirit was in its youth, the language of America was different: liberty, sir, was then the primary object."

John Quincy Adams took both sides of the struggle, warning in 1821 against idealistic ventures abroad "in search of monsters to destroy" but a few years later insisting Americans had a duty "to take a conspicuous and leading" role in the world on behalf of their "principles and morals."

In the last decades of the 19th century, Lincoln's Republican Party widened this expansive and interventionist view, celebrating "the future greatness and destiny of the United States" and its pivotal role "in the improvement of the world." Democrat Grover Cleveland's secretary of state, Walter Q. Gresham, in response, warned against the nation's natural "impulse to rush into difficulties that do not concern it, except in a highly imaginary way." To restrain this "indulgence" was "a duty we owe to the world as an example of the strength, the moderation, and the beneficence of popular government."

Robert A. Taft continued the battle against the ambitious, world-transforming policies of FDR, Harry Truman and Dean Acheson. "We should not undertake to defend the ideals of democracy in foreign countries," the influential Republican senator cautioned, lest the United States become a "meddlesome Mattie" with "our fingers in every pie." He warned against the arrogance and temptations of dominant power, for such power "over other nations, however benevolent its purpose, leads inevitably to imperialism." Truman and Acheson rejected this advice and instead pursued a preponderance of global power, "situations of strength" around the globe, and an ideology-laden strategy of containment that theoretically could lead America to war anywhere on the planet, as it did in Vietnam.

Today Taft is in bad odor in polite society, but his arguments against American overseas adventurism have been picked up again by the latest critics of our expansive foreign policy tradition. The old argument continues.

The problem for those who have tried to steer the United States away from its long history of expansiveness, then and now, is that Americans' belief in the possibility of global transformation -- the "messianic" impulse -- is and always has been the more dominant strain in the nation's character. It is rooted in the nation's founding principles and is the hearty offspring of the marriage between Americans' driving ambitions and their overpowering sense of righteousness.

Critics have occasionally succeeded in checking these tendencies, temporarily. Failures of world-transforming efforts overseas have also had their effect, but only briefly. Five years after the end of the Vietnam War, which seemed to many to presage the rejection of Achesonian principles of power and ideological triumphalism, Americans elected Ronald Reagan, who took up those principles again with a vengeance.

Today many hope and believe that the difficulties in Iraq will turn Americans once and for all against ambition and messianism in the world. History is not on their side.

Robert Kagan writes a monthly column for The Post. His most recent book is "Dangerous Nation," a history of American foreign policy.

Iraq's Biggest Failing: There Is No Iraq (NYT)

By Roger Cohen

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

WAR spews words. They make up its fog. Washington was awash in them last week as the damage control exercise called the Iraq Study Group culminated with a proposal to extract all American combat brigades by early 2008, leaving a few tens of thousands of troops to train the Iraqi Army or protect the trainers. As befits a bipartisan report on what looks like a lose-lose situation, it was a fudge.

But beyond the words — from President Bush's chagrin at "the pace of success" to the report's "grave and deteriorating" situation — lie people, the millions of Iraqis who have to get their kids up in the morning, those dimly discernible objects of the myriad political contortions. One of them, a 32-year-old Iraqi engineer encountered earlier this year in Baghdad, had this to say in a desperate e-mail message:

"I am facing the most difficult times of my life here in Baghdad. Since I am a Sunni, I became a target to be killed. You know that our army and police are Shia, so every checkpoint represents a serious threat to Sunnis. During the last three weeks, two of my friends were killed at check points belonging to the police. They first asked to show IDs and when they saw the Sunni family name, they killed them."

DOJ_NMG_0104692

There, in plain enough English, you have it. The Iraqi Army and police whose proposed reinforcement lies at the center of the Iraq Study Group's plan for American extraction are often less neutral institutions supporting the nation than a flimsy camouflage for Shia to settle accounts with Sunnis, while the Kurds bide their time and hope the child of chaos will be an independent Kurdistan.

The Iraqi Army and police are indeed overwhelmingly — but not exclusively — Shia. Most recruitment took place at a time when Sunnis had opted out of the new Iraq. Much has been made of the American error in disbanding Saddam Hussein's army. More might have been made of the errors committed in creating the new force.

Contacted in Baghdad, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, who commands American forces in Iraq, described the Iraqi Army as "fragile." He said Sunni officers and soldiers "have to believe the government is using force in a fair and evenhanded manner." As for the police, he said, "it is clear there are some sectarian elements," but "forceful action" by the Interior Ministry was now addressing the problem.

Are these the bulwarks of an Iraq that can "govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself" within 15 months, letting the bulk of American troops go home? Perhaps, the report seems to say, as it urges Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to get with the program — through rapid provincial elections, fairer distribution of oil revenue, the reintegration of Baathists and constitutional reform.

But it's hard to escape the conclusion that the report treats Iraq as an existing country needing a quick fix in the name of resurgent American realism, rather than a still-to-be-born country that needs to be ushered into being in the name of American idealism.

Iraq, in short, needs Iraqis — citizens of a nation rather than of a tribe — and that, after decades of disorienting dictatorship, is a generational undertaking scarcely amenable to American electoral timetables.

Right now, Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds see "freedom" more as the opportunity to be free of one another than to forge a liberal democracy. That's how subjugated peoples, from the Soviet Union to Yugoslavia, tend to react to the lifting of tyranny. Iraqi behavior is not especially strange.

But it has been hugely destructive — an estimated 3,000 Iraqi civilians are dying every month — and it presents President Bush with a choice between the stick-with-it idealism that has been the mainstay of his narrative of Iraqi freedom catalyzing a Middle Eastern transformation, and the ease-out realism thrust in his face by his father's secretary of state, James A. Baker III.

"The report is a devastating critique and an official certification of a failed policy, but its recommendations are a weak compromise," said Richard Holbrooke, the former United States ambassador to the United Nations. "So the question remains: what will the president do? Most people want an exit timetable, a few want a troop increase and Bush appears unready for either. He seems likely to pass this mess on to his successor."

Certainly Mr. Bush's instincts, and his post-report language, suggest he will not embrace a 15-month timetable for large-scale withdrawal, even as a figure weakened by his party's midterm electoral defeat. The realists, and the angry left, would then be further incensed. There's no doubt that the administration's ideology and scant planning, sold as idealism, have done great damage in Iraq. But realism too has its limits.

It was realism, Mr. Baker would say, that made him urge Yugoslavia to stick together days before its disintegration, and realism that later led him to wave away the Balkans with the lapidary phrase: "We don't have a dog in that fight." That was before the avenging dog of Bosnian mass killing finally outraged American moral principles and drew the country in.

The fact is Iraq was unmade while Mr. Baker was back in Texas, unmade in pursuit of a new Middle Eastern beginning. A state that had known only despotic rule, inhabited by disoriented victims of terror, was asked to govern itself through some form of democracy.

Remaking the unmade, in this case the fragmenting state of Iraq, is time-consuming, and, as Miroslav Hroch, the Czech political theorist, has observed, ethnic or religious nationalism easily becomes the "substitute for factors of integration in a disintegrating society."

Adel is the name of the young engineer who has been writing to me; to give his full name would put his life and that of his family at risk. He knows all about the death of the old Iraq and the agony of the new.

In 2004 he got a job with Washington Group International, a building contractor.

DOJ_NMG_0104693

"Now," he writes, "I am working at a WGI site and live there because it is safe inside but when I go to my home the danger surrounds me. The police sometimes search the houses, and now the Shia militia force the Sunnis to leave their houses. The majority of the area is Shia. They want it to be completely Shia."

He concedes that the same abuses "took place in the Sunni areas too." But, he says, "the Sunnis are 20 percent only while the Shia are 70 percent and the police and army are Shia, so they are able to carry weapons officially."

The study group lists all sorts of things the Iraqi Army lacks — leadership, equipment, personnel, logistical support. But it does not identify the most fundamental: absence of sufficient belief in the nation.

It seems highly improbable that this can be forged in 15 months. An American officer, Col. Mark Meadows, told me earlier this year in Baghdad that the Iraqi brigade he was training was overwhelmingly Shia, which was a problem.

"They're where we were in early World War II," Colonel Meadows said. "We went from the black-only units of that time to Truman's integrated Army of the 1950s. The Army led the way in the breakthrough from a divided society. That has to happen here, too."

But, the colonel added, "If we try to go too fast, if we take a short-sighted view, if we expect instant gratification, it won't work."

As for the police, it is, in the view of General Chiarelli, in far worse shape than the army. "The year of the police," as 2006 was billed, has turned into the year of police abuse. The report suggests transferring a large part of the police from the Interior Ministry control to the Defense Ministry to improve discipline.

Quite what that would achieve is unclear. Both ministries have been infested with sectarianism and corruption. The Interior Ministry is now led by a Shiite, Defense by a Sunni, but both forces, police and military are still overwhelmingly Shiite, which is where the fundamental difficulty lies.

Adel, as a Sunni, has suffered directly from that. Now, even as he seeks ways to leave, he believes "that we are not completely lost."

"If the invasion was the only solution to make Saddam quit," he writes, "so it was the right choice."

The problem, he adds, is "not with the invasion itself" but with "how to select the suitable men to take the responsibility of ruling Iraq, because most of those we have now are not devoted to this country."

Iraq has to survive, not because it's lovely, or within sight of peace, but because it's the least bad solution. Its breakup would entail unfathomable horror: one quarter of the population is in mixed Baghdad, and Sunni Anbar province is an oil-free desert suitable only for Al Qaeda central. To have a future, Iraq almost certainly needs a broad federalism of a kind not endorsed in the report, and it needs the likes of Adel.

He's scared, but not without a frail hope: the hope that Iraq can inspire love of itself in its citizens, beyond religious and ethnic lines. To that lingering aspiration, after the loss of almost 3,000 American lives and the spending of $400 billion in treasure, the United States appears to have an enduring responsibility.

Even If We Leave Now, We'll Be Back (WP)

By David Rothkopf

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

Strategic redeployment. Phased drawdown. Exit strategy. However one phrases it, Washington seems to be turning a page in the story of Iraq. The midterm elections, the subsequent resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the release of the Iraq Study Group's report last week all suggest that the transformational objectives that led U.S. forces into Iraq are being supplanted by an unmistakable and bipartisan desire to bring troops home, end this mess and move on.

That impulse, while understandable, reflects the national narcissism that dogs much of U.S. foreign policy. We think Iraq is about us. We made it happen and we can undo it. But one-sided solutions for ending the Iraq war are as unrealistic as the one-sided impulses that started it. Even as we seek to remake history, it is remaking us.

The economic and political forces that drew the United States into Iraq -- quite different from the reasons the Bush administration gave for the invasion -- remain powerful, exerting a pull that will be hard to resist. Oil, of course, is foremost among them. But also important are the threats and tensions linked to oil: Washington's decades-old rivalry with Iran, the growing dangers posed by the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and the fear that the Middle East's simmering conflicts will erupt into a broader, bloodier and far more costly war.

To its credit, the Iraq Study Group recognized many of these dimensions. But, however we may try to extricate ourselves from Iraq today, the best we can hope for is an end to only this latest chapter of U.S. military involvement in the region. There is no getting out of the Middle East. Even if we leave now, we'll be back.

In future history books, this war may be known as the Second Gulf War, or perhaps this period will be remembered as the era of The Gulf Wars. Just as today we look back on extended and episodic conflicts such as the Thirty Years' War or the Hundred Years' War, historians may regard today's clash as only another battle in a much longer war. U.S. actions in this Gulf war have dramatically increased the likelihood of future conflicts. We have inflamed tensions in the Middle East, undercut our regional influence and eroded the nation's political will to remain actively engaged in this critical part of the world.

The forces pulling us back are so strong that it doesn't matter which party controls Congress or occupies the White House. In fact, given the political shifts that this increasingly unpopular conflict has triggered, it seems quite possible that a Democratic president may be the one compelled to wage the Third Gulf War.

The United States's interests in the Middle East date to the post-World War I years, around the time when the British redrew the Middle East map and created nation-states, such as Iraq, cobbled together from disparate Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish pieces. A rising industrial power, the United States could not ignore the promise of oil identified in the Persian Gulf in the 1920s. With the drilling contracts awarded to Standard Oil of California and Texaco in 1933 and 1936, respectively, the United States in effect committed itself to an ever growing involvement in (and dependence on) this region.

But it was after World War II, when an energy-hungry United States took on the task of forging a new global order, that the Middle East became a central priority for U.S. foreign policy. Not only did the demand for oil grow precipitously, but Washington was entering a Cold War against a Soviet adversary that also coveted the Middle East's energy resources. Immediately after the war, the Russians refused to leave Iran as they had promised at the Yalta Conference in 1945; it took action by the U.N. Security Council to force their withdrawal. This ultimately led the United States to seek a reliable ally in Tehran, in turn leading presidents from Dwight D. Eisenhower to Jimmy Carter to embrace the shah.

At the same time, the situation in the region was immeasurably complicated by the creation of the state of Israel in 1948 and President Harry S. Truman's support for the new entity. This new U.S.-Israeli bond created an instant tension with the countries upon which the United States depended for oil, thus defining a balancing act that to this day remains the trickiest in U.S. foreign policy.

Over time, this picture grew even more complex, as much the result of the United States' victories as its fumbles and defeats. The abuses of the shah's regime led to popular rebellion in Iran and the rise of Ayatollah Khomeini's theocracy -- a geopolitical defeat compounded by a humiliating hostage crisis. And after the Soviet Union pushed into Afghanistan in 1979, the United States responded on two fronts: It attempted to push back against Soviet forces in Afghanistan by supporting mujaheddin resistance fighters led by the likes of Osama bin Laden, and sought to offset Iran's influence by supporting the leadership bid of Iraqi military strongman Saddam Hussein. In both cases, the results would prove haunting.

The fall of the Soviet enemy eliminated a certain coherence and organizing principle to U.S. interests in the Middle East, one that had seemed above and beyond mere oil interests. But then that former U.S. ally, Hussein, apparently estimating that Washington needed him more than he needed Washington, invaded Kuwait in 1990, threatening U.S. allies in the Gulf region. With Saudi cooperation, the administration of President George H.W. Bush and its allies turned him back. But Bush resisted marching on Baghdad to depose him, perhaps fearing a new power vacuum in the Middle East, one that could have been filled by Iran, which had supplanted the Soviet Union as the United States's chief regional rival. As one prominent Arab political scientist observed to me, "The secret most Americans won't admit is that this most recent war is not about terrorism. It is part of a quarter-century-old geopolitical tug of war with Iran for regional hegemony."

Today, as King Abdullah of Jordan has observed, the region is verging on three civil wars -- in Iraq, in Lebanon and in the Palestinian territories -- all of which somehow involve Iran, the United States or their proxies. Embroiled in Gulf War II, the United States faces a growing roster of additional threats: Iran's acquisition of nuclear weapons technology; a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan; increasing anti-American radicalism across the Muslim world and the threat that such passions pose to moderate leaders atop potentially fragile regimes in Egypt, Jordan, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia; and Washington's growing alienation from allies who would normally share U.S. interests. Sadly, the invasion of Iraq in this most recent Gulf war has only exacerbated these situations.

What plausible scenarios could draw even a war-weary United States back into the Middle East, into a Gulf War III?

Clearly, the confrontation with Iran -- over its regional policies, support of terrorists and desire to acquire nuclear weapons -- tops the list. One need only recall the prewar debate over Iraq to understand that the international community considers the proliferation of WMD an acceptable justification for war. The Iranian threat is magnified because it could trigger an arms race for a "Sunni bomb" to offset the "Shiite bomb." Meanwhile, Israel is unlikely to long tolerate a nuclear capability in a government that has called for its destruction, and in the Arab world, any action by Israel would be regarded as an action on behalf of the United States.

As the Iraq Study Group has recommended, this or a future administration might seek to stabilize Iraq by reaching out to regional players such as Iran and Syria -- two nations traditionally hostile to Israel. In so doing, Washington might also push for an accelerated transfer of the Golan Heights or the accelerated establishment of a sustainable Palestinian state, as the commission's report also suggests. While such diplomatic overtures may prove sensible, they could also be interpreted as a weakening of U.S. support for Israel. This could tempt more radical elements, such as the military wing of Hamas or Hezbollah, to push harder against Israel in an attempt to win further concessions or test the viability of an Israeli government operating with a less supportive U.S. ally. In all such scenarios, Washington must avoid the appearance of weakness or the perception that it has wavered from its core commitments in the region; any concessions by the United States or its allies must always be perceived as flowing from positions of strength.

Other developments in the Middle East could elicit a U.S. military response, even if a reluctant one. What if Jordan, Pakistan or Saudi Arabia fell into fundamentalist hands? The perception of the threat, the impact on world energy prices, the reaction of regional rivals -- these elements could quickly put the U.S. military on alert, especially if U.S. troops, citizens or bases in the region came under threat. Or what if Iranian troops entered Iraq? Or if another terrorist attack against the American homeland (or U.S. assets anywhere in the world) could be traced to forces in the region? The response probably would not be a Rumsfeldian "shock and awe" affair. Instead, given the scope and interconnectedness of these threats and the desire to avoid the mistakes made this time around, a Third Gulf War probably would be larger, in terms of troop commitments, than the second.

Now, as Gulf War II enters a new phase, the Vietnam War offers an important lesson, as well as an important distinction. The lesson is that leaving a country is often much more complicated than entering it. After the U.S. election of 1968 confirmed the public's desire to withdraw from Vietnam, the war dragged on for seven more years and claimed as many lives as it had during the period of escalation. The distinction, however, is that even leaving Vietnam probably will prove much simpler than leaving Iraq or the surrounding region.

The Middle East today is infinitely more dangerous than at the start of Gulf War II. Now, the Bush administration must do what it did not do before invading Iraq: Plan for the likely and possible futures, not just the one it hopes to face. While a long-term U.S. military presence in the region may further stoke anti-American passions, it may also make good and prudent strategic sense. The American people will need to assess such options based on the country's overarching interests -- which include reducing the likelihood of yet another war in the region -- rather than the short-term, feel-good option of bringing the troops home and retreating into a state of semi-isolationism.

Only the Iraqis can resolve their political troubles and sectarian violence. The United States can help by empowering Iraqi soldiers and police -- not with weapons that may one day be used against U.S. troops, but with body armor, transport vehicles, crowd-control tools, information technology, training and the other assets that can help them assume greater responsibility for their own security in the months ahead. The United States must also restore its own hollowed-out military and determine how a war such as the one in Iraq could ever have stretched U.S. forces so thin.

Over the long-term, one reasonable approach in the Middle East could be called "parallel containment:" The United States must contain the complex threats it faces in the region, and at the same time try to limit our vital interests there. On the first score, Hezbollah and Hamas must know that the United States is present and stands ready to take action. Iran must know that it will not be allowed to develop nuclear weapons, period. Moderates in the region must know that we will stand by them, with economic aid and political support, helping to restore U.S. moral authority in the Middle East. And everyone must know that an attack against Israel will always be considered an attack against America. On the second score, we must embark on the long-term but critical task of reducing our energy dependence on the Middle East. No strategy in any Gulf war could produce more lasting change in the region than a prolonged fall in oil prices. The only dependable formula for ultimate victory in the Gulf wars will come through innovation and conservation right here at home.

Iraq 2013 (NYT)

By James Traub

The New York Times Magazine, December 10, 2006

Scholars and diplomats who have closely studied civil wars describe them almost as forces of nature, grinding on until the parties exhaust themselves, shredding bonds that cannot be stitched back together even long years after the killing stops. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, the United Nations and other international actors have spent a decade trying to undo the psychic as well as the physical destruction of four years of intramural mayhem. There's not a great deal to show for it. David Harland, the head of a small policy team inside the U.N. peacekeeping department, points out that "on the eve of the war, Sarajevo was 40 percent Muslim and 60 percent everything else. Now it's 90 percent Muslim, and of the remaining 10 percent, most are mixed marriages or the elderly. You can't reverse ethnic cleansing."

And you generally can't stop it either, as we are now learning in Iraq. The question of whether Iraq has descended into civil war has, of course, become an obsessive issue, if basically a semantic one. President Bush insists that it has not, though American military officials concede that sectarian violence now poses a greater threat to Iraq than does the (largely Sunni) insurgency. In October, according to a U.N. report, Iraqi civilian deaths reached a record 3,709, though the real number is almost certainly higher. One hundred thousand Iraqis are now fleeing abroad every month, in addition to vast numbers internally displaced. Experts have no trouble describing what they're seeing. In Congressional testimony this past September, James D. Fearon, an expert on civil conflict at Stanford University, said that "by any reasonable definition, Iraq is in the midst of a civil war."

The White House's steadfast refusal to call this conflict a civil war feels more like denial than delusion; President Bush understands that using the term would force him to concede that the defining act of his presidency had ended in ruin. Americans will not continue to send their sons and daughters into the Iraqi maelstrom in order to defend Iraqi factions from one another. What's more, civil wars rarely have the kind of equitable conclusion that the Bush administration has envisioned in Iraq. Fearon testified that the 54 such conflicts he studied typically lasted more than 10 years and normally ended with decisive military victory rather than power-sharing agreements. History, he said, indicates that the current administration strategy "is highly unlikely to succeed, whether the U.S. stays in Iraq for six more months or six more years (or more)."

In many respects, Iraq feels less like Bosnia than like Lebanon, where militias representing Christians, Shiites, Sunnis and secular leftists fought one another from 1975 to 1990, killing or wounding 5 percent of the country's population and uprooting half. Paul Salem, an authority on Lebanon at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, points out that in the early part of the war, the various parties kept fighting so long as they believed they could tip the existing balance of power. By 1984 or so, he says, "the domestic players got tired and realized that none of them would win" and only then prepared to negotiate. In Iraq, Salem laments, the "pent-up rage" from decades of repression seems to have scarcely spent itself.

Lebanon typifies the fundamentally sectarian or ethnic character of modern civil wars. In his recently published "War of the World," the historian Niall Ferguson argues that the collapse of multiethnic empires in the late 19th and early 20th centuries gave free rein to rivalries that had been constrained by imperial power. Ferguson observes that many nation-states that emerged out of the wreckage of the Ottoman Empire, from Yugoslavia to Iraq, were able to contain those conflicts by ruthless repression. Centripetal energies often exploded once the dictator died or was toppled. Lacking, in most cases, any tradition of power sharing, such states prove "far too multiethnic to function as democracies," Ferguson maintains. Minority groups are bound to conclude that they have more to gain by fighting than by submitting to the will of an unleashed majority. Ferguson, a onetime supporter of the Iraq war, has argued that "trying to get democracy in a rush in conditions of economic and political instability" is a formula for disaster.

For this administration, so ready to deploy the tools of American power, the conclusion that it is helpless to stem the avalanche it has set off may be even harder to accept than the fact that it has made a terrible mistake. If only for that reason, President Bush may grudgingly accept at least some of the advice he receives from the panel headed by James Baker, the family consigliere, and the former representative Lee Hamilton. But it may already be too late for some of the measures that Baker and others propose to do much good.

When the sectarian combatants finally do exhaust themselves, Iraq will need a great deal of outside help, though not the kind it has received so far. Civil wars liquidate the trust among parties that makes settlements possible; outsiders must act as guarantors and, usually, peacekeepers. And they have to be prepared to make a major commitment: NATO put 60,000 troops in Bosnia, with a population less than one-sixth that of Iraq, to police the Dayton Accords that ended the war. Today 1,900 soldiers from the European Union are sufficient to do the job. Croats, Serbs and Muslims have reached a wary standoff, which leads David Harland to posit a second world-weary hypothesis: "If you apply enough force, you can get people to live adjacent to one another." That's a long, long way from the trailblazing Middle Eastern democracy around which the Bush administration wove such glittering fantasies. Still, the Bosnians are not killing one another and don't seem likely to start. And in today's Iraq, that would be a consummation devoutly to be wished.

79 Steps To Victory In Iraq? (NYT)

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

President Bush says the Iraq Study Group report "did a good job of showing what is possible." Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain said, "It offers a strong way forward." The New York Post called it the work of "surrender monkeys." There is no shortage of opinions. Here are a dozen worth considering.

Democracy Defeated (NYT)

By Richard Perle

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THINGS that start badly seldom end well. And the Baker-Hamilton findings start badly, with the commission's wholly unproven assertion that Iran and Syria have an "interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq."

It is astonishing that not a shred of evidence is advanced to support this seminal statement. That may be because all the evidence is to the contrary: from the beginning, Iran and Syria have been undermining American and Iraqi efforts to bring order and stability to Iraq.

The matter is important, because an approach to the dictators in Iran and Syria would be seen throughout the region, and especially in Iraq itself, as a sign of American weakness and resignation. A hat-in-hand plea for help from our adversaries will only confirm their belief that a policy of fueling the insurgency with weapons, money, intelligence and foreign fighters is working.

Missing from the report is any serious reflection on the president's goal of encouraging the development of representative government in the despotic Arab world, an objective that would be scuttled by the report's proposed "diplomatic offensive."

President Bush has said to the world, "If you stand for freedom, we stand with you." In pushing for deals with the dictators in Iran and Syria, the study group has said to Mr. Bush, as James Baker once shamefully said to those pleading for intervention in Bosnia to stop the genocide of defenseless Muslims, "We don't have a dog in that fight."

The Last War (NYT)

By Fouad Ajami

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

AND the mountain brought forth mice: We should have known that James Baker and Lee Hamilton would take us back to the past, for they are men of the past. Consider this, the oldest of Middle Eastern props: "The United States cannot achieve its goals in the Middle East unless it deals directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict and regional instability."

DOJ_NMG_0104698

The ground burns in Iraq, the center of gravity in Arab life has shifted away from the Mediterranean and toward the Persian Gulf. But Mr. Baker knows his old brief, where he was steward of American diplomacy when he left office in 1992. A big war had been fought against Saddam Hussein in 1991, the Shiites and Kurds had been abandoned to the tender mercy of the despot. But Mr. Baker headed straight to the Madrid peace conference to use the prestige won in Iraq and the gulf to force concessions out of Israel.

Mr. Baker returns untutored in the ways of that region. A new, deadly struggle has erupted between American power and the forces of terrorism in the Islamic world. A "wise man" who proposes to fix Iraq by returning the Golan Heights to Syria has missed the meaning of Iraq. This report describes a long-vanished Arab world: Its poverty is given away in its banal language, in that familiar assertion that all of history yields to the fixer's touch. — FOUAD AJAMI, professor of Middle Eastern studies at Johns Hopkins and the author of "The Foreigner's Gift."

Why Play A Weak Hand? (NYT)

By Josef Joffe

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

JAMES BAKER is a consummate diplomatist; recall how he rounded up dozens of allies in the first war against Saddam Hussein. But his panel's suggestion to "engage" Iran and Syria to extricate the United States from the current Iraqi morass reflects a grievous misreading of those nations' ambitions and America's options.

Rule No. 1: Never negotiate from weakness, unless you intend to capitulate. Back in April 2003, Iran was quaking, and Syria's Bashar al-Assad was a living corpse. Now, both are on a roll while the Bush administration is looking at a triple rout: in Iraq, in Afghanistan and in Congress. So the mightiest nation on earth has no sticks — be it a doubling of the troops in Iraq or a strike against Iran's nuclear installations.

What about carrots? Washington can hold out only two deals that might elicit cooperation on Iraq. One is to accept precisely what America has fought for decades: Damascus's rule over that part of "Greater Syria" we call Lebanon. As for Tehran, the price would be higher still: a tacit "yes" to the bomb, and Iran's hegemony over much of the Middle East. If that is the price of engagement, Washington might just as well skip the tedium of talking and disengage from the world's most critical strategic arena here and now.

Invite The Neighbors (NYT)

By Jeremy Greenstock

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE Iraq Study Group's recommendations set a formidable but necessary agenda for the coalition in Iraq. Restoring internal stability will not be possible without outside help. The report points to Washington's failure to confront the neighbors of Iraq with the consequences of a complete breakdown of the rule of law there. The risk of regional destabilization is very real. With a continuing stalemate in the Middle East peace process and the potential for miscalculation by Iran over the nuclear question, the dangers for the whole region look greater than at any stage since the 1940's.

We cannot turn things around in Iraq without involving the entire region. Iran would be foolish to risk the emergence of a new autocracy in Iraq. Syria, only a secondary player in Iraq, has other priorities: the return of the Golan Heights within a decade.

America need not address either nation directly if the right conference format is designed. Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Jordan and Kuwait all need a unified Iraq as one of the foundations of their national security.

This set of compelling interests requires a table to talk around and where superpower diplomacy is properly brought to bear. What we need now is not a staged retreat, but a move into a higher gear. Under the guidance of the study group's commendable recommendations, the driving force must be diplomatic, not military. It's worth the inevitable cost.

Don't Get Sectarian (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0104699

By Madeleine Albright

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

IN the spirit of the Iraq Study Group recommendations, the administration should make clear to Muslims throughout the Middle East that America will not take sides in the millennium-old Sunni-Shiite split. American forces are not in Iraq to engage in sectarian warfare; our policy in Lebanon is not based on a preference for the adherents of one faith over any other; our concerns about Iran are unrelated to that country's status as a leader of Shiite Islam.

The conventional wisdom is not to take sides in a civil war, but when you do, to pick the winner. In Iraq, there are some who say we should back the Shiites because they are the majority. But they are not the majority in the persian gulf. It would be an error to align ourselves with the Shiites (because Al Qaeda is Sunni) or the Sunnis (because Iraq's worst militias and Hezbollah are Shiite). We must be mindful of the interests of all factions and willing to talk to all sides, but our message should not vary.

We should promise help to all — Sunni, Shiite, Christian, Druze, Jew, Arab, Kurd, Persian — who observe territorial borders, honor human rights, obey the rule of law, respect holy places and seek to live in peace.

— MADELEINE ALBRIGHT, former secretary of state.

Find New Allies (NYT)

By Leslie H. Gelb

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

FOR all its deftness and honesty, the Iraq Study Group report flees the hardest choices and leaves us without a credible strategy. It calls for getting American troops out of Iraq, but says we'll be there for a long time. It calls for more training of Iraqi forces, but doesn't explain how to make it happen this time. It insists on reconciliation among warring sects, but offers no realistic political power-sharing plan to achieve it. Instead, the group's gloomy assessment of the situation should have led it to a clear strategy aimed at limiting damage:

First, try for a federal or decentralized Iraq with oil-revenue sharing, as its Constitution provides. Only federalism can prevent partition, though everything's a long shot now.

Second, provide means, protection and funds for Iraqis wanting to relocate for safety. It's the only way to stop ethnic cleansing.

Third, make common cause with Iraqi Sunni Baathists, Saudis and others to crush the terrorists in central Iraq. Once our troops start to leave, we can establish this clear common interest, and the Baathists will do a better job than we.

Fourth, ally diplomatically and economically with Iraqi Shiites, who are, after all, Iraqis and Arabs, not Iranians and Persians, and who don't want to be ruled from Teheran.

This damage-limiting approach fits the facts on the ground described by the group, and may be the only way to avoid a failed Bush policy becoming a strategic defeat.

Have Faith In Maliki (NYT)

By Rory Stewart

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE Baker report is refreshingly honest in its description of Iraq. But its recommendations are less reliable and in some cases dangerous. It states, "If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security and governance, the United States should reduce its political, military or economic support."

This is back to front. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki will fail to meet those milestones, but we should support him nonetheless. He is the democratically elected head of a sovereign state, with a better understanding of his own country than the coalition. Our attempts to manipulate and control Iraqi politicians have historically undermined their authority, frustrated their political compromises and strengthened opposition. Empowering Mr. Maliki, though necessary, will be unpleasant: the militias and Iran will remain strong and the security forces weak.

But progress will come only if we provide almost unconditional economic and political support to the elected president and allow him to rebuild his state in his own way.

Police States (NYT)

By Bing West

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE Iraq report recommended the withdrawal of American troops by the spring of 2008, balanced in part by the infusion of 20,000 advisers. Without advisers, the Iraqi forces will pull out of the tough areas. With advisers, the army and police — a mix of Sunnis and Shiites — may hold the country together.

But the police are in wretched shape, intimidated and poorly led. More police advisers are essential, together with tough leaders from local tribes. The police, who can identify the killers hiding among the people, must be allowed to imprison extremists. The Abu Ghraib abuses led to such kid-glove handling of killers that our troops refer to "the catch and release program." If that continues, stability is doomed.

Sadly, Iraqi soldiers trust American advisers more than their own government. The advisers demand steady performance, and in exchange extract pay and logistics from recalcitrant ministries in Baghdad. Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki has demanded operational control of all Iraqi forces. To prevent the appointment of sectarian loyalists, President Bush must insist upon a joint American-Iraqi military board that will approve all key Iraqi military and police assignments. Without this board, we must not commit a single adviser.

Endangered Advisers (NYT)

By Andrew Exum

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

T HE fates of 26 million Iraqis and the 141,000 American troops in Iraq have long been intertwined. Wednesday, their shared fate was inexorably altered by the report put out by the Iraq Study Group, a panel made up of nine lawyers and a mathematician.

Some of the recommendations are sensible, but a few of the military suggestions could spell disaster.

The recommendation to increase the number of soldiers training the Iraqi military is, in general, a good one. Officers serving in Iraq have told me in recent days that the efforts to train and equip the Iraqi Army have not proceeded with the sense of urgency they deserve. The military understands this and last summer established a school in Fort Riley, Kan., where the Army's foremost counterinsurgency expert is training more advisers to be sent to Iraq.

But to increase the number of advisers while simultaneously decreasing the number of combat brigades is a recipe for disaster. The adviser teams embedded with Iraqi units will become increasingly vulnerable, and a smaller force left behind in Iraq will find itself called upon to fight the inevitable worsening of violence with far fewer troops.

Given that the panel consulted with five times as many politicians as military officers, such oversights shouldn't come as a surprise. But the mathematician on the panel, former Secretary of Defense William Perry, should have known better.

We Can Watch Iraq From The Sea (NYT)

By Robert Pape

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

GETTING American combat forces out of Iraq is imperative. From Lebanon to Sri Lanka to the West Bank to New York, more than 95 percent of all suicide terrorist attacks around the world since 1980 have been caused by the presence of foreign combat forces on territory the terrorists value. Since 9/11, American combat soldiers stationed on the Arabian Peninsula have increased from 12,000 to more than 150,000. And suicide terrorism both in Iraq and by Al Qaeda has escalated simultaneously.

But leaving is not enough. If Iraq explodes while Americans withdraw, the resulting chaos would be a strategic and humanitarian nightmare. To contain violence, the Iraq Study Group suggests expanding the role of American advisers embedded in the Iraqi security forces. The value of this idea, however, is contradicted by the group itself, which reports only "fitful progress" building the Iraqi Army with embedded advisers. More embeds only means more potential hostages.

Here's a better idea: Move a large fraction of all American forces into staging areas outside Baghdad so that, within hours, tremendous air and ground power could suppress any major escalation in attacks against civilians. Over the next year, American ground troops should gradually pull back and their mission should evolve into a longer term, off-shore balancing strategy using naval and air forces and allies.

This would not end violence in Iraq. But it would head off the worst and buy time for international economic and political assistance to help stabilize the Iraqi government.

Close The Bases (NYT)

By Larry Diamond

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

AMONG the 79 recommendations of the report is one addressed explicitly to President Bush: He "should state that the United States does not seek permanent military bases in Iraq." Why is this so important? Since May 2003, a growing number of Iraqis and most of the Sunni minority have felt their country was under American occupation. This has been one of two factors driving the vicious Sunni insurgency.

To arrest the slide to civil war, international mediators must negotiate directly with the elements of the Sunni insurgency (secular nationalists and more tactical Islamists) that have been seeking talks with the United States for three years. If we press all the components of the study group's approach to "national reconciliation" — like amnesty, a rollback of de-Baathification and a new bargain on oil and federalism — while renouncing permanent military bases and clearly signaling our intent to withdraw militarily from Iraq over the next few years, it is possible that a deal can be had with a critical mass of the insurgency. — LARRY DIAMOND, senior fellow at the Hoover Institution and the author of "Squandered Victory."

Give Amnesty, But Not To All (NYT)

By Nathaniel Fick

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

THE Iraq Study Group report points to a lack of national reconciliation as the "fundamental cause of violence in Iraq." It concludes that the Iraqi government must find "ways and means to reconcile with former bitter enemies" and that "Iraqi amnesty proposals must not be undercut in Washington."

Amnesty is a hard sell in Iraq, where the Shiite-dominated government is loath to forgive its Sunni opposition, and also in the United States, where many view it as condoning attacks on American troops. I fought against some of those who would be pardoned. They killed my comrades. But stubborn opposition to reconciliation will only harm more Americans, Iraqis and the cause we're fighting for. There's no sense in fighting to the finish against anyone who might otherwise be coerced into quitting. That said, three conditions must be enforced:

Amnesty must be offered only after United States forces have shifted their priority from conventional operations to an advisory role. It cannot occur with 141,000 potential targets in Iraq.

Amnesty must forgive only past attacks, and cannot appear to sanction or legitimize future ones.

Amnesty applies only to Iraqis. Foreign fighters, with no legal standing in Iraq, cannot be eligible.

New Taliban Rules Target Afghan Teachers (AP)

By Jason Straziuso, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 10, 2006

The Taliban gunmen who murdered two teachers in eastern Afghanistan early Saturday were only following their rules: Teachers receive a warning, then a beating, and if they continue to teach must be killed.

DOJ_NMG_0104702

The new list of 30 rules, decided on during a high Taliban meeting in September or October and since circulated over the Internet, span from the organizational — no jihad equipment may be used for personal means — to the health conscious — militants are not supposed to smoke.

They also contain a grave warning for aid workers and educators.

Rule No. 24 forbids anyone to work as a teacher "under the current puppet regime, because this strengthens the system of the infidels." One rule later, No. 25, says teachers who ignore Taliban warnings will be killed.

Taliban militants early Saturday broke into a house in the eastern province of Kunar, killing a family of five, including two sisters who were teachers.

The women had been warned in a letter to quit teaching, said Gulam Ullah Wekar, the provincial education director. Their mother, grandmother and a male relative were also slain in the attack.

The two sisters brought to 20 the number of teachers killed in Taliban attacks this year, said Education Ministry spokesman Zuhur Afghan. He said 198 schools have been burned down this year, up from about 150 last year.

The 30 Taliban rules also spell out opposition to development projects from aid organizations, including clinics, roads and schools.

"If a school fails a warning to close, it must be burned. But all religious books must be secured beforehand," rule No. 26 says.

An addendum to the rules said they were distributed initially at a meeting of top Taliban leaders during Ramadan this year. The rules were signed by Mullah Omar, the fugitive Taliban leader and "the highest leader of the Islamic Emirates of Afghanistan," according to the document.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmadi, confirmed the authenticity of the rules. He said aid organizations were not working for the Afghan people but for the policies of occupying countries. "If they won't stop their work we will target them, like we've targeted them in the past," he said.

Mohammad Hashim Mayar, the deputy direct of ACBAR — the Agency Coordinating Body for Afghan Relief — an oversight body for almost 100 aid organizations in Afghanistan, said the rules are no surprise.

"They've been practicing this in the past," Mayar said. "We already knew when they were burning schools, when they were killing people, we said that they were against education, and they are well aware of the importance of education."

The rules confirm a Taliban policy of undermining all forms of development that benefit ordinary Afghans and seem to sanction the targeting of civilians, said Maj. Luke Knittig, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

"The rules likely represent an attempt at indirect leadership by the Taliban in the face of increasingly hindered ability to lead directly and visibly," said Knittig, who said officials had no reason to doubt the authenticity of the rules, which are being circulated on various Web sites.

Other edicts focus inward on the Taliban command structure:

• No. 9: Taliban may not use jihad equipment or property for personal ends.

• No. 10: Every Talib is accountable to his superiors in matters of money spending and equipment usage.

• No. 12: A group of mujahedeen may not take in mujahedeen from another group to increase their own power.

Other rules appear focused on not having ordinary Afghans turn against the Taliban. Rule No. 16 says it is "strictly forbidden" to search houses or confiscate weapons without a commander's permission. No. 17 says militants have no right to confiscate money or possessions from civilians.

No. 18 says fighters "should refrain from smoking cigarettes."

Rule 19 says that mujahedeen may not take young boys without facial hair onto the battlefield — or into their private quarters, an attempt to stamp out the sexual abuse of young boys, a problem that is widely known in southern Afghanistan but seldom discussed.

"The rule regarding behavior toward young boys shows this has been a problem," Knittig said.

Associated Press reporter Nimatullah Karyab in Ghwando, Afghanistan, contributed to this report.

Senate Confirms U.S. Attorney For Minnesota (AP)

AP, December 10, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - The U.S. Senate unanimously confirmed Rachel Paulose as the U.S. Attorney for Minnesota early Saturday.

The 33-year-old Paulose, of Eagan, had been acting U.S. attorney for about nine months. President Bush nominated her for the permanent job about four months ago.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said in a news release that he urged the Senate Judiciary Committee to allow full a Senate vote on Paulose before the Senate adjourned early Saturday.

Paulose met Wednesday with outgoing Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minn., and got his support. However, it appeared that the Senate session would end before it took up her confirmation.

"It would have been a shame to see such a capable, experienced nominee fail to get a chance for confirmation, and I am very excited we were able to get her nomination through the Senate before adjournment," Coleman said a news release.

The U.S. Attorney's office did not respond to messages left there Saturday.

Paulose was a federal prosecutor in Minnesota from 1999 to 2002 and then worked in private practice for the Dorsey & Whitney law firm in Minneapolis.

Before 1999, she worked in the Justice Department as an attorney general's honors program trial attorney for the Civil Rights Division.

Paulose succeeds Tom Heffelfinger. She is the youngest current U.S. attorney and Minnesota's first woman confirmed to the post.

She's also a graduate of Yale Law School and the University of Minnesota.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Poisoned By Scandal, Craving An Antidote (NYT)

By Charles Duhigg

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

NEAR midnight on a Friday in 2000, William E. Morgenstern, the chief executive of Rent-Way, one of the nation's largest rent-to-own retailers, was preparing for bed when a woman called to warn him that the company he had built from scratch was about to fall apart.

In the days before that call, Mr. Morgenstern had been scrambling to reconcile discrepancies he had discovered in Rent-Way's books. He had much at stake. Since its founding in 1981 in Erie, Pa., Rent-Way had grown into a national powerhouse by renting furniture and electronics to low-income consumers through more than 1,100 stores.

The stock price had tripled since its initial offering in 1993, making Mr. Morgenstern a Wall Street darling and propelling dozens of Erie families who had invested in the company to sudden wealth.

When he discovered the accounting problems, Mr. Morgenstern initially hoped for a quick explanation. But interviews with executives led to more questions. Then came the midnight phone call: a weeping employee told him that for three years Mr. Morgenstern's top deputies had forced her to cook Rent-Way's books.

Mr. Morgenstern then called the company's lawyer in a panic. What, he asked, should they do?

Over the following years, similar dilemmas would arise at Enron, WorldCom, Tyco and dozens of other companies. Today, hundreds of executives are anxiously discussing how hard they should look for evidence of options backdating or other accounting problems.

At companies where far lesser frauds or malfeasance emerge, executives face an even more ticklish quandary: Should they reveal everything, and then confront the hazards of bad publicity and outside investigations, or clean things up and hope that the problems will evaporate unnoticed? Rent-Way's own journey, which came to a head last month, offers a chilling lesson: Even the most virtuous decisions have unforeseen, often damaging, consequences, and full disclosure may create as many problems as it solves.

"It was the darkest moment of my life," said Mr. Morgenstern, who stepped down as Rent-Way's chief executive last year, retaining the chairman's post. "I started this company at 22 after three years of college. It represented all of my wealth. I tried to make the right decision at every juncture, but we had to pay a terrible price."

Rent-Way's board made a decision within days of detecting the fraud — Mr. Morgenstern called the Securities and Exchange Commission and revealed everything. The company would turn over documents typically protected by attorney-client privilege, he said. He then invited the S.E.C. to set up an office at Rent-Way's headquarters to conduct an on-site investigation.

"There was a stunned silence from the regulators," said one participant in the call. "Then the S.E.C. attorney said, 'Can you say that again?' "

The S.E.C. had good reason for surprise. Rent-Way's openness was unusual, especially in an era when other companies actively masked glaring frauds or covered up problems to avoid the legal and financial complications they might incur.

"There's a huge amount of pressure to fight," said Lanny J. Davis, a lawyer who has advised many besieged executives, including the HealthSouth founder Richard M. Scrushy, the former White House occupant Bill Clinton, and, for a period, Mr. Morgenstern. "If you let regulators in, you lose control of everything. Suddenly, they start exposing problems you didn't know existed. Some say the safest route is to fight and hope regulators won't be able to make their case."

Enron, WorldCom and Tyco, for instance, battled regulators and investors when accounting questions arose. More recently, during the options backdating scandals, companies such as UnitedHealth Group, Altera, CNet Networks and Affiliated Computer Services have tried to complete internal investigations before opening their books to outsiders. Such resistance is understandable, some say.

"People get scared, and that makes them crave control," said Roderick M. Hills, a former S.E.C. chairman who helped clean up fraud-damaged organizations as a director at Waste Management, Sunbeam-Oster and Drexel Burnham Lambert. "There's an instinct to hope your crimes will just slip through the cracks. When you hand everything over, it can feel like you're handing your enemies a gun."

But at Rent-Way, executives hoped that openness would contain the damage. The company had experience confronting criticism. For years, consumer advocates had attacked the rent-to-own industry as predatory, complaining that the business's rough-and-tumble practices focused on low-income, unsophisticated customers and included exorbitant fees to rent appliances.

The board fired three executives who had overseen the fraud, and hired an outside investigator. Everything was shared with regulators and investors as soon as it was compiled.

"We were committed to not letting this company be brought down by a small group of people engaged in criminal activity," said William Lerner, a Rent-Way director and former S.E.C. official. "We were determined to do everything as morally and ethically as we could."

Initially, Rent-Way's open-door strategy had little effect. When its stock began trading after the fraud was revealed, shares plummeted 75 percent within hours. Law firms began encouraging investors to file class-action suits. The company eventually issued a $127 million financial restatement — turning a cumulative $45 million profit from 1998 to 2000 into a $35 million loss.

Although the adjustment represented only 8 percent of Rent-Way's revenue and primarily involved arcana like depreciation rates, the news pushed Rent-Way's stock into a free fall. By December, just over a month after the fraud's detection, the stock price bottomed at $3.25 a share, down from more than $30 two months before.

Some board members raised the possibility of the company's declaring bankruptcy, a tack taken later by larger and more infamous companies such as WorldCom, Refco and Adelphia Communications. Others suggested selling the company to a private equity group, an option that had allowed other scandal-plagued companies to escape public scrutiny and quietly rebuild.

Those paths became more attractive as anger mounted in Erie toward Rent-Way. Walking through a local supermarket, a shopper confronted Mr. Morgenstern and shouted that he could not afford groceries because his portfolio had disappeared. Anonymous callers made threatening phone calls to Mr. Morgenstern's home. His children asked to stay home from school because teachers told them that their father was a crook, he said. Mr. Morgenstern and his wife, meanwhile, spent most of their time locked in their home, afraid to venture outside.

"Bill was a basket case," Mr. Davis said. "He ceased to have a life outside of his office. We sat down for dinner one night and he broke into tears just describing what each day was like."

EVEN so, Mr. Morgenstern fought suggestions to sell.

"Our employees had invested their entire life savings and would have been wiped out," he said in an interview. "If I ran away, I would have regretted it for the rest of my life."

And small glimmers of hope were beginning to emerge. At Rent-Way's annual convention in Las Vegas, four months after the fraud was revealed, Mr. Morgenstern appeared before thousands of employees and told them that he knew they were concerned. He knew that they read the newspapers and were worried that their paychecks would disappear. Alone on the stage, he promised that the company would survive and would emerge stronger than ever. The room erupted into cheers.

"Most of our managers aren't college graduates," said Mr. Lerner, who attended the speech. "We count on people who live paycheck to paycheck to make these stores work. So when Bill told them that everything was fine, it was like a wave of electricity moved through the room. Everybody believed in him."

Indeed, most of the company's stores were still profitable. From a revenue perspective, Rent-Way was stronger than ever. Unlike scandals at Enron and Tyco, where fraud disguised huge losses, Rent-Way's deceptions exaggerated growth. Real expansion continued after the Internet bubble popped and more consumers started renting rather than buying appliances. A year after the fraud emerged, revenue had rebounded, increasing by 10 percent.

Little of that showed up in the company's stock price, however. The taint of scandal had frightened away stockbrokers and individual investors, and institutional shareholders were leery of trusting its books.

More threatening were the company's debt woes. The fraud had caused Rent-Way to violate covenants with many lenders, requiring the company to refinance. But banks looked at the restated earnings and pending lawsuits and demanded interest rates up to six percentage points higher than the norm.

Even as revenue grew, Rent-Way had to use more and more income to pay interest. In the two years after the fraud's detection, the company paid down over $100 million in debt, leaving $215 million outstanding, but interest still consumed an amount roughly equal to 40 cents a share.

Executives hoped that the additional costs would be temporary: If the stock's price rebounded, it would allow them to erase debt more quickly by selling rising shares.

So Rent-Way executives issued glowing press releases announcing that investigations had ended and that auditors had given the company a clean bill. The board found Mr. Morgenstern innocent of any wrongdoing. The S.E.C., citing Rent-Way's cooperation, said the company would escape without sanction or fine.

The United States attorney's office in Erie, which successfully prosecuted three Rent-Way executives for criminal fraud, commended Mr. Morgenstern's openness as "a good example of how a company can alleviate" the consequences of misconduct "by fully and openly cooperating with the government."

Despite the good words from the law enforcement authorities, the financial markets continued to batter Rent-Way. Its interest payments consumed more and more cash, and the stock price refused to budge.

According to board members and advisers, some directors began wondering whether they should replace Mr. Morgenstern as chairman and chief executive. Some argued that he was responsible for allowing a culture of fraud to flourish, regardless of his lack of involvement.

They said Mr. Morgenstern — who had attended church alongside the corrupt executives — was too trusting of his deputies. Mr. Morgenstern himself often wondered aloud if his staff had mistakenly construed his relentless cheerleading about beating stock market expectations as encouragement to break the law.

A new chief executive — such as a high-profile business leader from outside — would give Rent-Way a new image, some board members said. Indeed, crisis experts say a leadership change is essential at any company where fraud is exposed.

"You have to get new people in place right away, and recruit outsiders who Wall Street respects to show that the company has changed," said Mr. Hills, the former S.E.C. chairman. "If the same faces represent the company before and after the fraud, you have to wonder how they've fixed the problem."

Many companies caught up in the current options backdating scandals have replaced senior executives, even when it has been unclear how much they knew. Leaders at Affiliated Computer Services, Altera, the Apollo Group, the Boston Communications Group, McAfee, CNet Networks, Cyberonics, Trident Microsystems and dozens of other companies have resigned in the last year, despite assertions that many were unaware backdating had occurred.

Nonetheless, Rent-Way's board, which had united to confront the crisis, ultimately could not bring itself to oust Mr. Morgenstern. "We should have recruited someone who could send a message to Wall Street," Mr. Lerner said. "We knew it at the time. But it would have hurt Bill so much, after he had put so much into saving the company. It just seemed impossibly cruel."

In 2003, when two of the Rent-Way executives responsible for the fraud were sentenced to prison, the company began selling stores to reduce its crippling debt. Almost 300 locations were sold to Rent-A-Center, its biggest rival. Rent-Way announced a $25 million settlement of lawsuits stemming from the fraud, but still the stock price did not improve.

SO, in 2004, four years after the fraud was detected, Rent-Way revealed a new strategy: the company would open one new store a week over two years. Although the plan would require more debt, executives hoped that investors would rediscover Rent-Way and treat it like a growth company deserving a higher stock price. As the stock's value increased, the company could refinance its debt at better rates.

The plan worked. Rent-Way opened 54 new stores in 2005, and income grew. The stock price began to inch higher; it would climb 18 percent in six months. Mr. Morgenstern appointed a new chief executive from within the company while retaining his position as chairman.

Then, outside forces intervened. Hurricane damage temporarily closed 25 percent of Rent-Way's stores in the Southeast. An increase in gas prices made it harder for low-income customers to spend on televisions and sofas. The overall economy began to slow, and Rent-Way's stock began to slide again.

"We were finally getting out of survival mode, and then it all came apart," said William Short, who replaced Mr. Morgenstern as the C.E.O. "If everything had held out for just one more year, the company would have survived. But because of a relatively small mistake five years earlier, we had no margin of error."

This year, despite increasing its operating revenue by more than 300 percent since the fraud was revealed, Rent-Way discreetly put out word that the company was for sale.

In November, Rent-A-Center acquired Rent-Way for $567 million, or $10.65 a share. Any investor who bought Rent-Way stock one day before the accounting fraud was announced received just 35 cents for every dollar of shares held six years later — despite the company's hauling in $2.5 billion in revenue during the same period. An investor who bought Rent-A-Center stock six years ago would have nearly doubled his money by today.

The sale, the stock losses, the damaged reputations and the shattered careers and lives, Rent-Way insiders say, can be traced to the accounting scandal despite everything that has happened since.

"We were never able to get over the taint of damaged goods," said Mr. Lerner, who said the board had a fiduciary duty to accept the 31 percent premium to its stock price that Rent-A-Center offered. "There's a real sadness over this sale."

Crisis consultants say the lessons from Rent-Way's experiences are troubling.

"This company did the right thing in letting the S.E.C. and the public know about the fraud as quickly as possible," said Ron Hartwig, a crisis communications expert now with the J. Paul Getty Trust. "But when you're besieged by lawyers and reporters and shareholders, it's easy to lose control. If executives don't appear to have a plan, if they don't seem to know all the answers, everything begins to slip away. Sometimes being honest and forthright isn't enough."

For Mr. Morgenstern, who now lives in North Carolina and is seeking new business opportunities, that has been the hardest lesson of all.

"I did everything that I thought was right, but in some ways it didn't matter," he said. "This wasn't a broken company. And when I found illegal activity, I exposed it. But that shouldn't have ended a great company. I don't know what else we should have done."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Study: Fewer Inmates On Death Row In '05 (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Fewer prison inmates were moved to death row in 2005, according to a federal study that shows one more person was executed than in the year before.

Four states — California, Texas, Florida and Pennsylvania — held half of the 3,254 inmates awaiting execution at the end of 2005, the study by the Bureau of Justice Statistics showed. There were 37 death row inmates in federal prisons at that time.

Sixteen states executed 60 prisoners last year, one more inmate than in 2004

Overall, however, the number of inmates on death row on Dec. 31, 2005, or the number of inmates moved there during the year dipped.

Among the findings by the Justice Department agency:

•128 inmates were moved to death row in 2005, the third consecutive year with a decline in year-long totals. It was the lowest number of prisoners put on death row since 1973.

•Sixty-six fewer inmates were on death row at the end of 2005 than in 2004. That was a decrease for the fifth straight year and about a 10% drop since Dec. 31, 2000, when there were 3,601 death row prisoners nationwide.

The Justice Department data, the most recent available, confirmed similar trends over the past five years as identified by Amnesty International USA, which opposes the death penalty.

Sue Gunawardena-Vaughn, director of the group's Program to Abolish the Death Penalty, said the drop in part reflects the public's squeamishness in approving executions for people who ultimately may be found innocent.

Since 1973, when watchdog groups began keeping track, 123 death row inmates have been cleared of crimes that had earned them death sentences.

Juries "don't want to be culpable for possibly putting an innocent person to death," Gunawardena-Vaughn said.

Moreover, because of lengthy trials and inevitable years of appeals in capital murder cases, the death penalty is expensive and "dilutes very, very crucial resources — many of which could be put toward more policing or mental health programs," she said.

As of the beginning of this month, 52 inmates have been executed so far in 2006, according to data provided by the Washington-based Death Penalty Information Center.

Thirty-eight states and the federal government allow juries to consider the death penalty in the most heinous criminal cases. All states except Nebraska allow lethal injection in executions. Inmates in Nebraska and eight other states can be electrocuted. Additionally, three states allow death by hanging, another three by firing squad and four by lethal gas.

At the end of last year, 56% of death row inmates were white and 42% were black, the Justice Department study reported. Women accounted for 2% of those people facing execution.

Witnessing Execution A Matter Of Duty, Choice (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux

The Washington Post, December 10, 2006

They couldn't take their eyes off the electric chair. They took it in piece by piece as they filed into the witness room: The leather restraints on the giant oak armrests. A long electrical cord coiling from the bottom across the slate gray death chamber floor.

The candle shop owner grabbed one of the white plastic lawn chairs in front of the plate glass window that would soon separate the living from the dead. Next to her, the social worker nervously smoothed her hair as she took a seat with a direct view of the chair. The investigator climbed the wood risers and took a seat behind them.

The clock's second hand swept over the 12. It was 9 p.m. -- time for the execution to begin.

DOJ_NMG_0104708

Later, they would remember how the air in the room seemed to compress at that moment. How the electric chair seemed to dwarf everything else. How the condemned man, one of the rare few to choose electrocution, looked right through them before he died. But at that moment, all they could think was that they were about to watch a man die.

It's been 70 years since executions in the United States were open to the public. But in Virginia, there is always someone watching, turning what is for most people a distinctly private moment into a very public end. One of more than a dozen death penalty states that require ordinary citizens to witness executions, Virginia has enlisted hundreds of volunteers for the task.

They come from every corner and every quarter: A Richmond school bus driver, a South Hill bookkeeper, a Prince William County police officer, an Ashburn computer specialist, a Lynchburg brass works fabricator. All have visited the Greensville Correctional Center in Jarratt.

Candy Couch, the candle shop owner, had seen other men put to death, but they had been flat on their backs, feet facing her, arms splayed on a gurney, waiting for the needle. She rarely saw their eyes before the life drained out of them. But this man, her fourth, stared her down as he walked to the electric chair.

"He's staring at me," Couch said. "Oh my God, he's looking right at me."

For nearly 100 years, broad public support for capital punishment has helped the Virginia Department of Corrections maintain a rotating list of about 20 to 30 volunteers, although only six are required to witness each execution. Some come only once. Others repeatedly return. One man, a paint store salesman from Emporia, has seen 15 men executed.

Witnesses aren't paid. No special skills are needed. The death house doesn't require much from volunteers beyond state residency, a basic criminal background check and an ability to sum up in three lines or less on a written application why they want to watch convicted killers die. Some say it's their civic duty to watch; that it's no different than sitting on a jury or voting. Others say they're just curious to see whether death equals justice.

Couch, 36, doesn't remember what reason she gave on her application. When she first signed up, she told friends she wanted to see whether watching someone be executed is anything like in the movies. A retired sheriff's deputy, she never knew any of the men she saw executed. But when she volunteered for her first death-by-lethal-injection three years ago, she vowed she would keep going back until she saw an electrocution.

Couch snorts when she reads about defense lawyers who claim lethal injection is cruel and unusual punishment. She is not religious, but she believes in God and Old Testament eye-for-an-eye justice.

"I think they need to feel some kind of pain. I know it's horrible to say, but they did horrible things to people," Couch said.The Decision to Watch Emily Rosson was jittery all day. A few hours before she arrived at the death chamber for Brandon Hedrick's electrocution, she had scoured her closet looking for the right outfit. She had dressed casually that day for her job as a social worker at a jail in Stafford County. At the last minute, she decided to go home and change. She thought she should wear something respectful, the kind of thing you'd wear to church or a big day at work.

"I was like, 'What the hell do you wear to someone's execution?' " said Rosson, 27.

She settled on a conservative button-down linen shirt, khaki capri pants and a pair of dressy sandals. After an hour-long road trip from her home in Glen Allen, her brief fashion crisis was long forgotten. As she pulled up to the meeting point for witnesses in Emporia, she remembered instead her father's warning about the intensity of what she was about to see. Years ago, he had visited the death house to witness an electrocution, at the time the sole method of execution in Virginia. It was, her father said, a matter of civic duty and a chance to witness history.

"I was like, 'Eeew, gross. Why would you ever want to do that?' " Rosson said. "He said, now is a good time to go because the electric chair was on the way out. Afterward, he always told me it was something I would never forget seeing."

Before she volunteered, Rosson talked it over with her husband. She had mixed feelings about the death penalty; maybe this would help her decide, she said. He said he wouldn't have the stomach for it, but he could understand why she wanted to go.

Rosson has never been a crime victim, but she's learned a lot about criminals as a jailhouse social worker. Most of the inmates are often short on intelligence and long on bad deeds -- a lot, she said, like Hedrick.

It made her "a little uneasy" when she heard that Hedrick had an IQ of 76, Rosson said. That meant that he was right on the line of being mentally retarded (and ineligible for execution). He might not know what was coming next, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0104709

She felt even more unsettled when she first caught sight of the death chamber. The huge oak chair looked as big as a throne and seemed to swallow the whole room.

"It takes a lot of courage to watch people die," she said. "It's not for the weak of heart. It takes a lot of courage to actually go and keep your eyes open the whole time. I think there were some people in that room who closed their eyes."Witness With a Purpose

Steve Corbally peered impatiently out of the van window as it pulled toward the prison entrance. He tried to tune out the chatter of the other witnesses on the ride to the prison. In no mood to talk, he kept silent. He wasn't eager to tell anyone why he was there.

When Corbally had looked Hedrick's case up earlier that day, he thought there might be a chance the execution would be halted. Hedrick, 27, was convicted of the abduction, rape and killing of a young single mother, who begged for her life before Hedrick shot her with a 12-gauge shotgun.

Corbally, 47, had encountered worse cases during his two years as an investigator for the Regional Capital Defender Office in Manassas. After spending day after day chasing down alibis and witnesses that might keep his clients off death row, Corbally figured he knew a good case for clemency when he saw one.

Corbally volunteered to be a witness despite his boss's objection. A few days earlier, a Harrisonburg jury had sent a 27-year-old client of Corbally's to death row for his role in a murder-for-hire scheme. But Corbally, now a first-year law student in New Orleans, reasoned that seeing someone put to death would enable him to give future clients a first-hand account of what they might face if they're sentenced to death.

"Now I can sit them down and say: 'Let me tell you something. It is not pretty, what happens in there. If you get a chance to plead guilty and save your life, you should do it,' " Corbally said.An Execution Expert David Bass began looking for signs of fear the moment the witnesses arrived. He had seen it many times before. Bass, a regional manager with the Virginia Department of Corrections, had escorted scores of witnesses to more than 80 executions in his 15 years as the de facto death-house tour guide.

"I spend more time watching witnesses than I do the actual executions," Bass said.

The night Hedrick, the first death row inmate to be electrocuted in the United States in more than two years, was to be executed, Bass constantly sized up his witnesses for signs of distress. A former high school math teacher, he understood well the power of group psychology and the way one little thing could set off a chain reaction. His job was to make sure nothing disrupted the process.

The July breeze was cool and light as dusk fell over the sprawling prison grounds, but Bass could feel a sticky kind of tension in the air. Normally, witnesses keep to themselves, he said. But as they lined up for the ride, they seemed to be chattier than usual.

"There seems to be more nervousness, more questions," Bass said. "I can't say what they're thinking, but there is a difference, and there is definitely electricity in the air."

Bass greeted each witness with a warm handshake. He checked their names off on his clipboard, then handed each of them a square, orange I.D. badge.

"I try to make things as low-key as possible and as casual as possible," he said. "I try to keep them talking. If you let things get real quiet, then things tend to tense up."

Bass rattled off facts and figures with the ease of a game show host: More than 330 executions in Virginia since 1908. Virginia, second only to Texas in the number of executions since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976, lets inmates choose between the chair and lethal injection. Only three, including Hedrick, have chosen electrocution in the past decade.

Bass warned the witnesses that they might hear some shouting from other inmates as they enter the death chamber. The condemned man might drool as about 2,000 volts of electricity arced across his body. There could be a little blood. They might notice an odor of burning flesh.

The inmate's body, he explained, forms a circuit. Small sponges dipped in briny water affixed to the inmate's shaved right leg and head help ensure that the electricity flows. After the condemned man's last words, the warden inserts a key to activate the system.

DOJ_NMG_0104710

"It's like turning the ignition key in your car," Bass said.'The Worst Part'

The witness room looked like a black box theater. Inside, a dozen white plastic chairs were neatly arranged on battleship-gray risers. Couch grabbed a front-row seat next to Rosson with a perfect view of the electric chair. Corbally settled into the row behind them.

A microphone in the witness room crackled to life as prison officials approached Hedrick with a hand-held tape recorder. He clenched his fists tighter until his knuckles turned white. He fixed his look hard on the people who had come to watch him die. Then his muffled voice sputtered and echoed in the tiny witness room.

"I pray for the people who believe in Jesus Christ in heaven, and I pray for the unsaved, for they know not what they do," Hedrick said. "I'm ready to go now and be free."

The brown leather hood came down over his eyes and nose. There was a dull thud as the first wave of electricity passed through his body, then another. Then came the interminable five-minute wait before a doctor verified that Hedrick was dead.

"That was the worst part," Rosson said. "We all have to sit here waiting five minutes so the man can finish dying. You think of dying as something personal, and it was just a really horrible, public and invasive way to die. I would not want to see that again."

No one in the witness room said a word as they stood to exit. The guard at the door thanked them for coming and bid them goodnight. One by one, the witnesses climbed back into the van.

Rosson heard someone in the van sobbing as it pulled away. Someone in the front asked Bass if inmates are given sedatives before the execution. Yes, he said, but it's not something corrections officials like to publicize. A man in the back, one of the death house regulars, piped up. That's not fair, he said. After all, he said, Hedrick hadn't given his victim a sedative before he shot her in the face.

Everyone fell silent.

DNA Gatherers Hit Snag: Tribes Don't Trust Them (NYT)

By Amy Harmon

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

SOUTH NAKNEK, Alaska — The National Geographic Society's multimillion-dollar research project to collect DNA from indigenous groups around the world in the hopes of reconstructing humanity's ancient migrations has come to a standstill on its home turf in North America.

Billed as the "moon shot of anthropology," the Genographic Project intends to collect 100,000 indigenous DNA samples. But for four months, the project has been on hold here as it scrambles to address questions raised by a group that oversees research involving Alaska natives.

At issue is whether scientists who need DNA from aboriginal populations to fashion a window on the past are underselling the risks to present-day donors. Geographic origin stories told by DNA can clash with long-held beliefs, threatening a world view some indigenous leaders see as vital to preserving their culture.

They argue that genetic ancestry information could also jeopardize land rights and other benefits that are based on the notion that their people have lived in a place since the beginning of time.

"What if it turns out you're really Siberian and then, oops, your health care is gone?" said Dr. David Barrett, a co-chairman of the Alaska Area Institutional Review Board, which is sponsored by the Indian Health Service, a federal agency. "Did anyone explain that to them?"

Such situations have not come up, and officials with the Genographic Project discount them as unlikely. Spencer Wells, the population geneticist who directs the project, says it is paternalistic to imply that indigenous groups need to be kept from the knowledge that genetics might offer.

"I don't think humans at their core are ostriches," Dr. Wells said. "Everyone has an interest in where they came from, and indigenous people have more of an interest in their ancestry because it is so important to them."

But indigenous leaders point to centuries of broken promises to explain why they believe their fears are not far-fetched. Scientific evidence that American Indians or other aboriginal groups came from elsewhere, they say, could undermine their moral basis for sovereignty and chip away at their collective legal claims.

DOJ_NMG_0104711

"It's a benefit to science, probably," said Dr. Mic LaRoque, the Alaska board's other co-chairman and a member of the Turtle Mountain Chippewa Tribe of North Dakota. "But I'm not convinced it's a benefit to the tribes."

The pursuit of indigenous DNA is driven by a desire to shed light on questions for which the archeological evidence is scant. How did descendants of the hunter-gatherers who first left humanity's birthplace in east Africa some 65,000 years ago come to inhabit every corner of the Earth? What routes did they take? Who got where, and when?

As early humans split off in different directions, distinct mutations accumulated in the DNA of each population. Like bread crumbs, these genetic markers, passed on intact for millennia, can reveal the trail of the original pioneers. All non-Africans share a mutation that arose in the ancestors of the first people to leave the continent, for instance. But the descendants of those who headed north and lingered in the Middle East carry a different marker from those who went southeast toward Asia.

Most of the world's six billion people, however, are too far removed from wherever their ancestors originally put down roots to be useful to population geneticists. The Genographic Project is focusing on DNA from people still living in their ancestral homelands because they provide the crucial geographic link between genetic markers found today and routes traveled long ago.

In its first 18 months, the project's scientists have had considerable success, persuading more than 18,000 people in off-the-grid places like the east African island of Pemba and the Tibesti Mountains of Chad to donate their DNA. When the North American team arrived in southwestern Alaska, they found volunteers offering cheek swabs and family histories for all sorts of reasons.

The council members of the Native Village of Georgetown, for instance, thought the project could bolster a sense of cultural pride.

Glenn Fredericks, president of the Georgetown tribe, was eager for proof of an ancient unity between his people and American Indians elsewhere that might create greater political power. "They practice the same stuff, the lower-48 natives, as we do," Mr. Fredericks said. "Did we exchange people? It would be good to know."

Others said the test would finally force an acknowledgment that they were here first, undermining those who see the government as having "given" them their land.

Still others were interested in the mechanics of migration: "Were the lands all combined? Did they get here by boat?" For many nonindigenous Americans who feel disconnected from their roots, the project has also struck a chord: nearly 150,000 have scraped cells from their cheek and sent them to the society with $100 to learn what scientists know so far about how and where their individual forebears lived beyond the mists of prehistory.

By giving the broader public a way to participate, though it is likely to generate little scientific payoff, the project has created an unusual set of stakeholders with a personal interest in its success. More details, the project explains in the ancestral sketches it gives individuals, will come only with more indigenous DNA.

"I think you have to be sensitive to these cultures," said Jesse R. Sweeney, 32, a bankruptcy lawyer in Detroit who hopes the millennia-size gaps in his own ancestors' story will eventually be filled in. "But hopefully they will change their mind and contribute to the research."

Mr. Sweeney's DNA places his maternal ancestors in the Middle East about 50,000 year ago. After that, they may have gone north. Or maybe south: "This is where the genetic clues get murky and your DNA trail goes cold," read the conclusion to his test results on the project's Web site. "By working together with indigenous peoples around the globe, we are learning more about these ancient migrations."

The first large effort to collect indigenous DNA since federal financing was withdrawn from a similar proposal amid indigenous opposition in the mid-1990s, the Genographic Project has drawn quiet applause from many geneticists for resurrecting scientific ambitions that have grown more pressing. As indigenous groups intermarry and disperse at an ever-accelerating pace, many scientists believe the chance to capture human history is fast disappearing.

"Everyone else had given up," said Mark Stoneking, a professor at the Max Planck Institute for Evolutionary Anthropology. "If they get even a fraction of what they are trying for, it will be very useful."

Unlike the earlier Human Genome Diversity Project, condemned by some groups as "biocolonialism" because scientists may have profited from genetic data that could have been used to develop drugs, the Genographic Project promises to patent nothing and to avoid collecting medical information. The project has designated half the proceeds from the sale of kits to the public for programs designed to preserve traditional cultures and language.

In May, project officials held a stormy meeting in New York with the indigenous rights group Cultural Survival while protestors carried signs reading "National Geographic Sucks Indigenous Blood." Shortly after, the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues recommended suspending the project.

On the ground, every region has its challenges. To make scientific progress, the project's geneticists are finding they must first navigate an unfamiliar tangle of political, religious and personal misgivings.

Pierre Zalloua, the project director in the Middle East, faces suspicion that he is an emissary of an opposing camp trying to prove their lineages are not important. Himla Soodyall, the project's South African director, finds herself trying to explain to people who worship their ancestors what more her research could add. In Australia, some aboriginal groups have refused to cooperate.

But among the 10 geneticists the society has given the task of collecting 10,000 samples each by the spring of 2010, Theodore G. Schurr, the project's North American director, is in last place. Fewer than 100 vials of DNA occupy a small plastic box in his laboratory's large freezer at the University of Pennsylvania, where he is an assistant professor of anthropology. And at the request of the Alaska review board, he has sent back the 50 or so samples that he collected in Alaska to be stored in a specimen bank under its care until he can satisfy their concerns.

American Indians, Dr. Schurr says, hold the answer to one of the more notable gaps in the prehistoric migration map. Although most scientists accept that the first Americans came across the Bering Strait land bridge that connected Siberia and Alaska some 20,000 years ago, there is no proof of precisely where those travelers came from, and the route they took south once they arrived.

Comparing the DNA of large numbers of American Indians might reveal whether their ancestors were from a single founding population, and when they reached the Americas. And knowing the routes and timing of migrations within the Americas would provide a foundation for studying how people came to be so different so quickly.

But almost every federally recognized tribe in North America has declined or ignored Dr. Schurr's invitation to take part. "What the scientists are trying to prove is that we're the same as the Pilgrims except we came over several thousand years before," said Maurice Foxx, chairman of the Massachusetts Commission on Indian Affairs and a member of the Mashpee Wampanoag. "Why should we give them that openly?"

Some American Indians trace their suspicions to the experience of the Havasupai Tribe, whose members gave DNA for a diabetes study that University of Arizona researchers later used to link the tribe's ancestors to Asia. To tribe members raised to believe the Grand Canyon is humanity's birthplace, the suggestion that their own DNA says otherwise was deeply disturbing.

When Dr. Schurr was finally invited to a handful of villages in Alaska, he eagerly accepted. But by the time he reached South Naknek, a tiny native village on the Alaska Peninsula, to report his analysis of the DNA he had taken on an earlier mission, the Alaska review board had complained to his university supervisors.

The consent form all volunteers must sign, the Alaska board said, should contain greater detail about the risks, including the fact that the DNA would be stored in a database linked to tribal information.

Dr. Schurr's latest attempt at a revised form is to be reviewed this month by the board in Alaska and the by University of Pennsylvania board supervising the project.

In the meantime, his early results have surprised some of the Alaskans who gave him their DNA. In South Naknek, Lorianne Rawson, 42, found out her DNA contradicted what she had always believed. She was not descended from the Aleuts, her test results suggested, but from their one-time enemies, the Yup'ik Eskimos.

The link to the Yup'iks, Ms. Rawson said, only made her more curious. "We want them to do more research," she added, offering Dr. Schurr more relatives to be tested.

But she will have to wait.

Subpoena May Signal A Wider Corruption (ANCHDN)

GRAND JURY: Head of seine group says records touch Ben Stevens, marketing board.

The director of a Juneau-based salmon fishing group said last week he has been ordered by a federal grand jury investigating Alaska corruption to turn over lobbying and consulting records involving state Senate President Ben Stevens and former congressional aide Trevor McCabe, an Anchorage lawyer.

The grand jury subpoena, issued last month, also seeks records on the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, a nonprofit federal-grant distribution corporation set up by Ben Stevens' father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The executive director of the Juneau salmon group responding to the subpoena, Robert Thorstenson Jr., serves on the marketing board. Thorstenson said he and a partner, Juneau and Seattle lawyer Rob Zuanich, rent space to the board for its Juneau office.

In a telephone interview Thursday from Seattle, Thorstenson said the subpoena to Southeast Alaska Seiners Association arrived last month after he was contacted by agents from the FBI and the National Marine Fisheries Service. The subpoena said the grand jury was investigating felony crimes, Thorstenson said.

The subpoena appears to document a widening of the federal corruption investigation in Alaska, which burst into public view in August with dramatic raids of the offices of six legislators, including Ben Stevens. Agents returned to search Stevens' offices Sept. 18.

On Wednesday, a federal grand jury indicted Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, on seven counts charging extortion, bribery, conspiracy and money laundering. The charges describe a scheme in which money was allegedly funneled to Anderson through a shell company in 2004 in exchange for actions he took as a legislator to benefit a private prison company. He pleaded not guilty Friday.

In the August legislative office searches, subpoenas and search warrants indicated the government's focus was on the relationships between legislators, oil and gas legislation, and the politically active oil field service and construction company Veco and its chairman, Bill Allen.

The material seized from Stevens in September, including documents related to the seiners association and the marketing board, suggested a widening of the probe into his lucrative fishing consulting business, though the government has not cited any specific crimes it is investigating.

Both the marketing board's creation and the seiner organization lobbying directly involve earmarks inserted into federal legislation by Ted Stevens. There is no indication that agents are investigating Ted Stevens, the senior Republican in the U.S. Senate. Stevens himself has declined to comment on the investigation.

Ben Stevens was the board's initial chairman when it was created in 2003 until he resigned April 19, and McCabe, Ted Stevens' former legislative director, has served on its board of directors also since its creation. The board has distributed millions of dollars of federal funds to fishery companies, including several that paid consulting fees to Ben Stevens. Stevens was recently fined $300 by the Alaska Public Offices Commission for failing to disclose his membership on the commission for two years.

Ben Stevens has reported receiving $775,435 from nine fishing companies and associations since he was appointed to a vacant state Senate seat in 2001. Except to describe his services as those of a business consultant, he has never publicly said what he has done for the money.

That total doesn't include money from the Southeast Seiners. The Alaska Public Offices Commission is investigating a complaint brought by former state legislator Ray Metcalfe accusing Ben Stevens of breaking disclosure law by failing to report income from the group. The matter is on the commission's Jan. 11 agenda.

WORKING ON BUYBACK

Zuanich, Thorstenson's real estate partner and Southeast Seiners' attorney, said in an e-mail to the Sitka Borough Assembly last month that the fishing group paid $56,500 over 19 months for consulting and lobbying on a buyback of commercial fishing permits for Southeast Alaska. The money was paid to Advance North LLC, an Anchorage company owned 50-50 by Ben Stevens and McCabe.

Zuanich wrote that in June 2004, the association began paying Advance North "to provide consulting and lobbying services relating to this proposed legislation" for the buyback. He told the Sitka officials that he has provided documents and sworn testimony on the matter under subpoena from the Public Offices Commission.

The Sitka assembly was evaluating an unrelated application by Zuanich and other partners for a local $350,000 economic development grant.

The Southeast salmon fleet has been devastated by low prices. In 2002, Gov. Tony Knowles declared an economic emergency and directed state government to assist Southeast fishing families. The proposed buyback was part of the effort by the fishermen themselves to increase prices by reducing the number of fishing boats on the water.

In September 2004, three months after the seiners began paying Stevens and McCabe, a federal loan program to reduce the seine fleet passed as a $20 million earmark to a Senate appropriations bill while Ted Stevens was chairman of the Appropriations Committee. When the final version of the appropriations bill passed Congress in December of that year, the buyback measure had expanded to a $50 million program.

Thorstenson said the terms of the loan program, as passed by Congress, were too unfavorable for fishermen to afford. The organization is lobbying now for a smaller total loan package coupled with a grant of about $7 million.

According to state corporation records, McCabe took over Ben Stevens' half of Advance North Oct. 1, 2005. Neither he nor Stevens has disclosed the terms of the takeover. Thorstenson said the organization contracts solely with McCabe now.

Stevens has told the public offices commission he wasn't required to disclose the amount of money he received from the fishermen because he didn't have a controlling interest in Advance North. In a ruling on a related complaint from Metcalfe in September, the commission appeared to agree with Stevens, though it had not sought records from Advance North that might indicate how control was shared by the two owners, according to commission director Brooke Miles.

Thorstenson said duties under the Advance North contract were supposed to be split, with Stevens consulting on how to arrange, manage and promote the buyback among fishermen, and McCabe, a registered congressional lobbyist, talking to Ted Stevens' staff. Thorstenson said he had no idea how the pair divided the fees.

McCabe didn't respond to e-mails or phone calls seeking comment for this story. Ben Stevens' lawyer, John Wolf of Seattle, said, "In light of the investigation currently being conducted by the U.S. attorney's office for Alaska, we are not going to comment on any subject material that might be within the scope of the investigation."

Metcalfe's complaints cited affidavits by former Southeast salmon fisherman Victor Smith, an occasional contributor to fishing journals and blogs. In one sworn statement, Smith said the fishing association clearly planned to hire Ben Stevens, not McCabe, to get the buyback. He cited conversations he had, including some that were recorded, with members and directors of the seiners group. He also said he heard Zuanich talk publicly during a 2003 meeting in Lynnwood, Wash., of the Purse Seine Vessel Owners Association, a group with many of the same members as the seiners', about using "a little convoluted accounting" to get funds to Ben Stevens. Smith is a member of the owners association and Zuanich is its director.

Smith said he met with federal agents in a Seattle hotel Nov. 13.

A CALL FROM THE FEDS

Thorstenson got the call from the FBI and the fisheries agent two days later. When he received the subpoena, he said, "I'm like, 'Wow man, I guess this is like, real.' "

Thorstenson said he was initially directed to provide the material by Dec. 1, but he won a reprieve until Jan. 9 because of the amount of material. He said he has packed 16 boxes of documents in response to the subpoena.

The government sought e-mails, board minutes, contracts, and tax and other financial records related to the buyback, Stevens, McCabe, Advance North, the fisheries marketing board and Ben Stevens' personal consulting firm, Stevens and Associates, Thorstenson said.

Thorstenson said that he doesn't believe any wrongdoing occurred and that he would defend the actions of Stevens and McCabe.

Zuanich wouldn't answer a reporter's questions, saying the APOC was the proper forum for the issue. Thorstenson said Zuanich told him he never made the statement attributed to him by Victor Smith.

Thorstenson said he never portrayed Ben Stevens as the group's lobbyist to Congress, but he can understand why some of his board members might have thought that was the arrangement. Ben Stevens is much better known than McCabe, even though McCabe, as Ted Stevens' fisheries aide, was largely responsible for one of the most significant federal fisheries bills in the last decade, the American Fisheries Act of 1998, Thorstenson said.

DOJ_NMG_0104715

Thorstenson, who is also president of United Fishermen of Alaska, a coalition of several dozen fishing groups, said many fishermen were aware of Ben Stevens' consulting work on the Bering Sea Crab Effort Reduction Fund, a heavily subsidized $100 million boat buyout pushed through Congress by Ted Stevens in 2000. The program, using grants and loans, was designed to eliminate about 25 percent of the vessels in the fleet, leaving more crab for the remaining ones. The crabbers paid Ben Stevens a consulting fee of $42,500 in 2000. A spokesman for the crabbers said at the time that Ben Stevens was hired to plan the strategy for the buyout, not to lobby his father.

"With Advance North, I figured more (board members) believed in Ben. 'Ben Stevens, he'll save the day,' " Thorstenson said.

Federal authorities have said little about the ongoing investigation into corruption involving Alaska lawmakers. But some aspects are clearly known. Other aspects, including how or whether different events or parts of the investigation are connected, aren't clear.

• Summer 2004: FBI records conversations between a lobbyist working for a private prison company and another man working for the same company as they talk about making payments to Rep. Tom Anderson in exchange for actions benefiting the company. The lobbyist and Anderson didn't know it, but the other man was working as a confidential source for the FBI, according to the indictment issued last week against Anderson.

• Aug. 31, 2006: Teams of federal agents execute some 20 search warrants in Anchorage, Juneau, Wasilla, Eagle River and Girdwood, including at legislative offices and the oil services company Veco. Offices of six Alaska legislators -- 10 percent of the Legislature -- are raided. One of the warrants, released to news media by a lawmaker, seeks materials showing contact with Veco executives and documents concerning the proposed natural gas pipeline and petroleum production tax. A warrant to another lawmaker seeks information on corrections issues and an Anchorage developer. Lawmakers searched were Sens. John Cowdery, Donny Olson and Ben Stevens, and Reps. Vic Kohring, Pete Kott and Bruce Weyhrauch. Officials say the investigation is being run by the FBI and prosecutors from the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section.

• Sept. 1, 2006: Agents conduct additional searches in Anchorage and Willow, and interview current and former state lawmakers and others.

• Mid-September: Agents return to Sen. Ben Stevens' office seeking additional material. Among the items taken: information on the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, a memo from Stevens to Veco president Pete Leathard, computer hard drives and phone logs.

• November: Federal grand jury issues subpoena to Robert Thorstenson Jr.

• December: State Rep. Tom Anderson, who represents East Anchorage, is indicted on seven counts of corruption, including an accusation he took $12,000 in bribes. Anderson pleaded not guilty. FBI corruption investigation: a timeline

Religion For A Captive Audience, Paid For By Taxes (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques, Andrew Lehren

The New York Times, December 10, 2006

Life was different in Unit E at the state prison outside Newton, Iowa.

The toilets and sinks — white porcelain ones, like at home — were in a separate bathroom with partitions for privacy. In many Iowa prisons, metal toilet-and-sink combinations squat beside the bunks, to be used without privacy, a few feet from cellmates.

The cells in Unit E had real wooden doors and doorknobs, with locks. More books and computers were available, and inmates were kept busy with classes, chores, music practice and discussions. There were occasional movies and events with live bands and real-world food, like pizza or sandwiches from Subway. Best of all, there were opportunities to see loved ones in an environment quieter and more intimate than the typical visiting rooms.

But the only way an inmate could qualify for this kinder mutation of prison life was to enter an intensely religious rehabilitation program and satisfy the evangelical Christians running it that he was making acceptable spiritual progress. The program — which grew from a project started in 1997 at a Texas prison with the support of George W. Bush, who was governor at the time — says on its Web site that it seeks "to 'cure' prisoners by identifying sin as the root of their problems" and showing inmates "how God can heal them permanently, if they turn from their sinful past."

One Roman Catholic inmate, Michael A. Bauer, left the program after a year, mostly because he felt the program staff and volunteers were hostile toward his faith.

"My No. 1 reason for leaving the program was that I personally felt spiritually crushed," he testified at a court hearing last year. "I just didn't feel good about where I was and what was going on."

For Robert W. Pratt, chief judge of the federal courts in the Southern District of Iowa, this all added up to an unconstitutional use of taxpayer money for religious indoctrination, as he ruled in June in a lawsuit challenging the arrangement.

The Iowa prison program is not unique. Since 2000, courts have cited more than a dozen programs for having unconstitutionally used taxpayer money to pay for religious activities or evangelism aimed at prisoners, recovering addicts, job seekers, teenagers and children.

Nevertheless, the programs are proliferating. For example, the Corrections Corporation of America, the nation's largest prison management company, with 65 facilities and 71,000 inmates under its control, is substantially expanding its religion-based curriculum and now has 22 institutions offering residential programs similar to the one in Iowa. And the federal Bureau of Prisons, which runs at least five multifaith programs at its facilities, is preparing to seek bids for a single-faith prison program as well.

Government agencies have been repeatedly cited by judges and government auditors for not doing enough to guard against taxpayer-financed evangelism. But some constitutional lawyers say new federal rules may bar the government from imposing any special requirements for how faith-based programs are audited.

And, typically, the only penalty imposed when constitutional violations are detected is the cancellation of future financing — with no requirement that money improperly used for religious purposes be repaid.

But in a move that some constitutional lawyers found surprising, Judge Pratt ordered the prison ministry in the Iowa case to repay more than $1.5 million in government money, saying the constitutional violations were serious and clearly foreseeable.

His decision has been appealed by the prison ministry to a federal appeals court and fiercely protested by the attorneys general of nine states and lawyers for a number of groups advocating greater government accommodation of religious groups. The ministry's allies in court include the Bush administration, which argued that the repayment order could derail its efforts to draw more religious groups into taxpayer-financed programs.

Officials of the Iowa program said that any anti-Catholic comments made to inmates did not reflect the program's philosophy, and are not condoned by its leadership.

Jay Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, said the Iowa decision was unfair to the ministry and reflects an "overreaching" at odds with legal developments that increasingly "show favor to religion in the public square."

And while he acknowledged the need for vigilance, he said he did not think the constitutional risks outweighed the benefits of inviting "faith-infused" ministries, like the one in Iowa, to provide government-financed services to "people of faith who seek to be served in this 'full-person' concept."

Crossing a Bright Line

Over the last two decades, legislatures, government agencies and the courts have provided religious organizations with a widening range of regulatory and tax exemptions. And in the last decade religious institutions have also been granted access to public money once denied on constitutional grounds, including historic preservation grants and emergency reconstruction funds.

In 2002, the Supreme Court ruled that public money could be used for religious instruction or indoctrination, but only when the intended beneficiaries made the choice themselves between religious and secular programs — as when parents decide whether to use tuition vouchers at religious schools or secular ones. The court emphasized the difference between such "indirect" financing, in which the money flows through beneficiaries who choose that program, and "direct" funding, where the government chooses the programs that receive money.

But even in today's more accommodating environment, constitutional scholars agree that one line between church and state has remained fairly bright: The government cannot directly finance or support religious evangelism or indoctrination. That restriction typically has not loomed large when public money goes to religious charities providing essentially secular services, like job training, after-school tutoring, child care or food banks. In such cases, the beneficiaries need not accept the charity's religious beliefs to get the secular benefits the government is financing.

The courts have taken a different view, however, when public money goes directly to groups, like the Iowa ministry, whose method of helping others is to introduce them to a specific set of religious beliefs — and whose success depends on the beneficiary accepting those core beliefs. In those cases, most of the challenged grants have been struck down as unconstitutional.

Those who see faith-based groups as exceptionally effective allies in the battle against criminal recidivism, teen pregnancy, addiction and other social ills say these cases are rare, compared with the number of programs receiving funds, and should not tarnish the concept of bringing more religious groups into publicly financed programs, so long as any direct financing is used only for secular expenses.

That concept has been embodied most prominently since 2001 in the Bush administration's Faith-Based and Community Initiative, a high-profile effort to encourage religious and community groups to participate in government programs. More than 100 cities and 33 states have established similar initiatives, according to Mr. Hein.

The basic architecture of these initiatives has so far withstood constitutional challenge, although the Supreme Court agreed on Dec. 1 to consider a case on whether taxpayers have legal standing to bring such challenges against the Bush administration's program.

Defenders of these initiatives say they are necessary to eliminate longstanding government policies that discriminated against religious groups — to provide a level playing field, as one White House study put it.

But critics say the "level playing field" argument ignores the fact that giving public money directly to ministries that aim at religious conversion poses constitutional problems that simply do not arise when the money goes elsewhere.

Converting Young People

Those constitutional problems sharpen when young people are the intended beneficiaries of these transformational ministries. In recent years, several judges have concluded that children and teenagers, like prisoners, have too few options and too little power to make the voluntary choices the Supreme Court requires when public money flows to programs involving religious instruction or indoctrination.

That was the conclusion last year of a federal judge in Michigan, in a case filed by Teen Ranch, a nonprofit Christian facility that provides residential care for troubled or abused children ages 11 to 17.

In 2003, state officials imposed a moratorium on placements of children there, primarily because of its intensively religious programming. Lawyers for the ranch went to court to challenge that moratorium.

"Teen Ranch acknowledges that it is overtly and unapologetically a Christian facility with a Christian worldview that hopes to touch and improve the lives of the youth served by encouraging their conversion to faith in Christ, or assisting them in deepening their pre-existing Christian faith," observed a United States District judge, Robert Holmes Bell, in a decision released in September 2005.

Although youngsters in state custody could not choose where to be placed, they could refuse to go to the ranch if they objected to its religious character. As a result, the ranch's lawyers argued, the state money was constitutionally permissible.

The state contended that the children in its care were "too young, vulnerable and traumatized" to make genuine choices. The ranch disputed that and added that the children had case workers and other adults to guide them. Judge Bell rejected Teen Ranch's arguments. "Regardless of whether state wards are particularly vulnerable, they are children," he wrote.

The ranch in Michigan has discontinued operations pending the outcome of its appeal, said Mitchell E. Koster, who was its chief operating officer. "We are confident that our argument will win," Mr. Koster said. "It's just a question of at what level."

In another case early last year, a federal judge struck down a federal grant in 2003 to MentorKids USA, a ministry based in Phoenix, to provide mentors for the children of prisoners. In a case filed by the Freedom From Religion Foundation in Madison, Wis., the judge noted that the exclusively Christian mentors had to regularly assess whether the young people in their care seemed "to be progressing in relationship with God." In a program newsletter offered as evidence, its director said, "Our goal is to see every young adult choose Christ."

The federal government had been clearly informed in advance of the nature of the MentorKids ministry, said John Gibson, chairman of the group's board. "The court's decision meant that there were 50 kids we could have served that we were not able to serve."

In another case, more than $1 million in federal funds went to the Alaska Christian College in Soldotna, Alaska, which says it provides "a theologically based post-secondary education" to teenage Native Americans from isolated villages. But an investigator from the Education Department who visited the school last year found a first-year curriculum "that is almost entirely religious in nature."

The Freedom From Religion Foundation sued to block the financing. The school promised to use government money only for secular expenses, and federal financing resumed last May, according to Derek Gaubatz, of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, which represents the college.

A number of government grants to finance sexual abstinence education have been successfully challenged. For example, the Louisiana Governor's Program on Abstinence gave federal money to several religious groups that used it for clearly unconstitutional purposes, a federal judge ruled in 2002, in a case filed by the American Civil Liberties Union.

One grant went to a theater company that toured high schools performing a skit called "Just Say Whoa." The script contained many religious references including one in which a character called Bible Guy tells teenagers in the cast: "As Christians, our bodies belong to the Lord, not to us."

The federal judge said the grants were so poorly monitored that the state missed other clear signs of unconstitutional activity — as when one Catholic diocese sent monthly reports showing that it had used federal money "to support prayer at abortion clinics, pro-life marches and pro-life rallies." Gail Dignam, director of the abstinence program, said that state contracts now emphasize more clearly that no grant money may be used for religious activities.

The Programs in Prisons

Programs like the one at the Iowa prison are a rare ray of hope for American prisoners, and governments should encourage them, their supporters say.

"We have 2.3 million Americans in prison today; 700,000 of them will get out of prison this coming year," said Mark L. Earley, a former attorney general of Virginia. Many inmates come out of prison "much more antisocial than when they came in," he added. He said he saw faith-based groups as essential partners in any effective rehabilitation efforts.

Mr. Earley is the president and chief executive of Prison Fellowship Ministries, based in Lansdowne, Va. With almost $56 million a year in revenue, the ministry oversees the InnerChange Freedom Initiative, which operates the Iowa program.

Since its birth in 1976, Prison Fellowship has been most closely associated with one of its founders, Charles W. Colson, who said in a 2002 newsletter that the InnerChange program demonstrates "that Christ changes lives, and that changing prisoners from the inside out is the only crime-prevention program that really works."

In early 2003, Americans United for Separation of Church and State joined with a group of Iowa taxpayers and inmates to challenge the InnerChange program in federal court.

In ruling on that case, Judge Pratt noted that the born-again Christian staff was the sole judge of an inmate's spiritual transformation. If an inmate did not join in the religious activities that were part of his "treatment," the staff could write up disciplinary reports, generating demerits the inmate's parole board might see. Or they could expel the inmate.

And while the program was supposedly open to all, in practice its content was "a substantial disincentive" for inmates of other faiths to join, the judge noted. Although the ministry itself does not condone hostility toward Catholics, Roman Catholic inmates heard their faith criticized by staff members and volunteers from local evangelical churches, the judge found. And Jews and Muslims in the program would have been required to participate in Christian worship services even if that deeply offended their own religious beliefs.

Mr. Earley said Judge Pratt's decision was sharply inconsistent with current law and his standard for separating secular from religious expenses was so extreme that it would disqualify almost any faith-based program. He acknowledged that inmates, whatever their own faith, are required to participate in all program activities, including worship, but he insisted that a religious conversion is not required for success. InnerChange uses biblical references only to illustrate a set of universal values, such as integrity and responsibility, and not to exclude those of other faiths, he said, adding that it was "unfortunate" if any inmates felt the program denigrated Catholicism or any other Christian faith. Corrections officials in Iowa declined to comment on the case.

Not all programs in prisons are so narrowly focused. Florida now has three prisons that offer inmates, who must ask to be housed there, more than two dozen offerings ranging from various Christian denominations to Orthodox Judaism to Scientology. But at Newton, Judge Pratt found, there were few options — and no equivalent programs — without religious indoctrination.

"The state has literally established an Evangelical Christian congregation within the walls of one of its penal institutions, giving the leaders of that congregation, i.e., InnerChange employees, authority to control the spiritual, emotional and physical lives of hundreds of Iowa inmates," Judge Pratt wrote. "There are no adequate safeguards present, nor could there be, to ensure that state funds are not being directly spent to indoctrinate Iowa inmates."

InnerChange, which has been widely praised by corrections officials and politicians, operates similar programs at prisons in Texas, Minnesota, Kansas, Arkansas and, by next spring, Missouri. Officials in those states are monitoring the Iowa case, but several said they believed their programs were sufficiently different to survive a similar challenge.

A government-financed religious education program at a county jail in Fort Worth was struck down by the Texas Supreme Court more than five years ago, and more lawsuits are pending. Corrections Corporation was among those sued last year by the Freedom From Religion Foundation, which is challenging a Christian residential program at a women's prison in Grant, N.M. The foundation has also sued the federal Bureau of Prisons over its faith-based rehabilitation programs. And Americans United, the Iowa plaintiff, and the American Civil Liberties Union have sued a job-training program run by a religious group at the Bradford County Jail near Troy, Pa.

Prison Fellowship Ministries is one of about a half-dozen Christian groups that operate programs at jails and prisons run by the Corrections Corporation. The company's lawyers are studying the Iowa decision, said a spokeswoman, Louise Grant. "But we are not, at this time, changing or altering any of our programming based on that, or any other ruling."

Inadequate Monitoring

Government agencies have been criticized repeatedly for inadequately watching these programs. Besides the criticism in various court decisions, the Government Accountability Office has twice raised questions about cloudy guidelines and inadequate safeguards against government-financed evangelism.

In its most recent audit released in June, the G.A.O., which examined faith-based organizations in four states, found that some were violating federal rules against proselytizing and that government agencies did not have adequate safeguards against such violations.

The problem is not that none of these programs are audited. Every group that gets a federal grant worth more than $500,000 has to pay a private auditor to examine its books and report to the government. Many federal programs, like those that provide Medicaid services or help the government allocate arts grants, require additional audits.

But no supplemental audits are required under the faith-based initiative — indeed, it would probably violate the Bush administration's new regulations to do so, said Robert W. Tuttle, a professor of law and religion at George Washington University and co-director of legal research, along with Ira C. Lupu, for the Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy, a project of the Rockefeller Institute.

"The rules can be read to prohibit special audit requirements because that would be considered a stigma, which would be discriminatory," Professor Tuttle said. "But that flies in the face of constitutional logic, because religion is special, and that special quality has to be reflected in program guidelines and audit rules."

The G.A.O. also says the government cannot easily or accurately track either how much money is flowing to groups or whether they are using the funds in unconstitutional ways.

The Bush administration is already studying whether these constitutional problems can be resolved by reshaping many government grants into voucher programs under which the beneficiary decides where the money goes. But vouchers are a limited solution because most social service agencies need to know that a certain amount of money is assured before they can begin operations.

DOJ_NMG_0104720

Mr. Hein, the White House official, agreed that vouchers could clarify the legal landscape. But even where they are not practical, he said, the Bush administration remains committed to keeping the doors to government financing open for as many religious groups as possible.

ANTITRUST:

American Steel's Hot (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, December 10, 2006

Sparrows Point and Weirton, W.Va., mills might attract bids by foreign steelmakers eager to get a foothold in the U.S. market

Five years ago, there would have been few takers for the steel plants in Sparrows Point and Weirton, W.Va.

Bethlehem Steel Corp., which owned Sparrows Point at the time and was once the largest steelmaker in the world, was in its death throes, joining the list of Rust Belt companies that buckled under the weight of high costs and fierce competition.

But if either plant goes up for sale early next year, there could be multiple bids for each. And there's a good chance the buyer won't be American.

After years of bankruptcy and rampant consolidation, American steel is suddenly hot. Foreign companies have the cash, and are looking to get a foothold in the American market, where they can charge a premium for their product.

It started with Mittal Steel Co. NV chief executive Lakshmi N. Mittal's quest to build the largest steelmaker in the world. Two years ago, he bought International Steel Group, which itself had been built on the carcasses of defunct companies, including Bethlehem's Sparrows Point complex and Weirton. This year, Netherlands-based Mittal successfully waged a hostile takeover of the world's second-largest steel company, Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA.

The combined company, Arcelor Mittal, will control 10 percent of the world's steel production, with more than 110 million tons this year. The $33.5 billion deal, which is expected to be completed in the spring, is the largest to date.

Following Mittal's lead, steel companies from Europe, Russia, South America and Asia in recent weeks have been circling U.S. companies.

"Arcelor Mittal is not an aberration, it's just the beginning," said steel analyst John Anton, with Washington-based Global Insight.

In the past, foreigners stayed away from American companies because they had higher costs and unionized work forces.

But now, after an industry shakeout, American steel companies are more efficient than ever. For example, Sparrows Point's nearly 2,500 workers produce 3 million tons of steel a year. That's more output per worker than in 1969, when 26,500 workers produced 5 million tons a year.

And, many no longer carry "legacy costs," having shed their health care and pension obligations for retirees during bankruptcy, as was the case with Bethlehem Steel.

Companies in Russia, India and Brazil have access to iron ore at home, where labor is cheaper. They want entry to the American market, where they can charge customers in the auto, construction and appliance industries a premium for finished products.

"The United States is one of the most attractive markets in the world," said steel analyst Christopher Plummer. "[Foreigners] are looking to these companies to lock in this market."

Look elsewhere They can't go as easily to China, the world's biggest consumer of steel and largest exporter, because the country prevents foreigners from taking a controlling stake in its companies.

"They've all got ambitious growth plans in their region and have gone as far as they can," Plummer said. "They need to look elsewhere."

Late last month, Luxembourg-based Evraz Group SA, the largest domestic steelmaker in Russia, signed a deal to buy Oregon Steel Mills in Portland for $2.3 billion.

Russian-owned OAO Severstal made a play for Arcelor but ultimately was beaten out by Mittal. It owns Rouge Steel in the Detroit area and is building a plant in Mississippi.

DOJ_NMG_0104721

A Moscow newspaper has reported that Severstal is interested in Weirton and in Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp.

Cash offer CSN Brazil wanted Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., but appears to have been outgunned by Chicago-based Esmark Inc., which won a proxy battle to install a board of directors that favors a merger with the American company. Esmark has said it would make a cash offer for Weirton, if the Justice Department allows Mittal to sell it.

German steelmaker Thyssen Krupp AG is still pining for Dofasco, Mittal's Canadian subsidiary. Mittal promised to sell it to ThyssenKrupp to settle U.S. Justice Department antitrust concerns about tin production in North America, if its merger with Arcelor succeeded. But a Dutch trust that controls Dofasco has blocked a deal. If that holds, the Justice Department will force Mittal to sell Sparrows Point or Weirton, and it will decide which one will be sold and to whom.

One way or the other, the German steelmaker is determined to get into the market here. It has said it will spend $2.9 billion to build two plants in the South if it is unable to buy Dofasco, though steel analyst Charles Bradford of New York City-based Bradford Research Inc. believes Thyssen Krupp may consider buying an existing steel mill because to do so is cheaper.

The company is building a mill in Brazil capable of churning out 4.4 million tons of steel annually beginning in 2008, and intends to ship the slab to North America and Europe for finishing. Sparrows Point's location on the East Coast led some to speculate that the Germans might be interested, especially after ThyssenKrupp officials toured the Sparrows Point plant in May. But the company declined to comment on it.

While just a few hundred miles apart, Sparrows Point and Weirton are quite different. Sparrows Point produces steel slabs and galvanized sheet for appliance manufacturers and the construction industry. Weirton is a niche manufacturer of tin plate for the food industry. Each has its strengths, but they probably wouldn't attract the same type of buyer, said Plummer, who as managing director of Metal Strategies Inc. in West Chester, Pa., has evaluated both plants for clients.

Sparrows Point has the biggest, most efficient blast furnace in North America, Plummer said, while Weirton has the most expensive, which is why Mittal shut it down shortly after buying the company. Unlike landlocked Weirton, the Baltimore County plant is the only integrated steel plant with ocean access, which would make it attractive for foreign companies looking to ship cheap iron ore, coal or slab for finishing. Yet it is located far from quality customers, such as automakers and appliance manufacturers, which are predominantly in the Midwest, he said.

And, Plummer said it would be a difficult decision for someone to turn Sparrows Point into a finishing mill and idle its blast furnace when it performs so well -- which is what CSN Brazil determined five years ago, he said, when that company looked at it.

"You need to make the plant lower-cost and more efficient than it was before you bought it," he said.

Plummer said both plants have failed to attract serious interest in the past 20 years, but the dynamics of the steel industry have changed. Weirton would be an attractive purchase for an investor group or an American company looking to expand its offerings to include tin, he said. Sparrows Point could be a flagship for a foreign company looking for an American portal.

In a presentation this summer, Mittal said it had identified 10 potential buyers for Weirton if the government gives the nod. It's something the workers fully support, after Mittal shut down the company's steelmaking operations and let 1,000 workers go.

"Normally when companies consolidate, there are synergies between them," said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents workers at Weirton. "But we haven't seen any benefit to it."

Glyptis hopes a buyer will invest in the plant and bring the workers back. A former International Steel Group executive has reportedly expressed interest in Weirton, but Glyptis said he does not know if the investor, Mitchell Hecht, has had serious talks with Mittal.

Sparrows Point has fared far better under Mittal, which pits its plants against each other to compete for work and, ultimately, jobs.

Weirton lost such a competition to Sparrows Point last year. Mittal idled Weirton's blast furnace and sent the hot work to the Baltimore County plant.

Sparrows Point has been profitable, and the union avoided mass layoffs by working with management to scale back production through market downturns using voluntary layoffs.

No big investments Bethlehem spent more than $600 million to build a cold mill there and relined the huge blast furnace two years before its bankruptcy filing in 2001. But Mittal isn't likely to put significant money into Sparrows Point. General Manager

Thomas Russo said this year that Mittal had no plans to make investments in the plant, other than for a couple of environmental upgrades to comply with government regulations.

Anton, the Global Insight analyst, doubts that any American steelmaker would be a buyer for the Sparrows Point plant. "People like picking up these things on the cheap, and Sparrows Point will not be cheap," he said.

Last week, Lakshmi Mittal painted a rosy picture for 2007, with strong demand and increased profit. He said prices will recover and consolidation will continue.

Unlike during Bethlehem's waning days, there is no shortage of interested investors who see the empire Mittal has built and want their own.

Target mills Bradford said he has identified 13 American companies -- mostly smaller, privately owned mills -- that are acquisition targets. And he said potential buyers include private equity firms, which believe they can pick up American steel mills cheap and make money off them, similar to what Wilbur Ross did when he bought the assets of Bethlehem Steel and sold them a year later to Mittal for a $267 million profit.

Bradford points to Claymont, Del., where a Miami-based investment group bought CitiSteel USA Inc. last year for almost $75 million. Less than three months later, H.I.G. Capital LLC paid itself back -- plus a $109 million dividend to shareholders -- by refinancing the company's debt. In August, the investor group filed to go public with the intention of paying off most of the debt.

"When you see people making money, it's going to attract a lot of interest," Bradford said.

EU Begins Antitrust Probe Of Universal-BMG Deal (AP)

By Aoife White, Associated Press

AP, December 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- EU regulators have opened an antitrust probe of Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for about $2.1 billion, saying the deal could damage "the already concentrated music publishing market."

Officials in Brussels said Friday that they would issue a final decision about whether to block or allow the deal by April 27.

BMG - owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG - has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers.

Paris-based Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group is the world's largest music company. Its publishing arm controls the rights to songs by artists such as 50 Cent, Mary J. Blige and Chamillionaire.

If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs, giving them a 22 percent market share and scraping ahead of current market leader EMI.

European Union approval was the last hurdle for the deal, which the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department in the United States cleared last month.

The EU rarely blocks deals, but it can, and often does, demand that companies under investigation sell units or make binding promises to change the way they do business.

New York-based Universal said it believed the EU would eventually bless the deal.

"We understand why, in the current environment, the European Commission has sought more time for its review," it said.

The company was referring to a July court ruling that said EU regulators were not careful enough when they cleared a 2004 deal between the music units of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG. The Sony-BMG deal must now be re-examined.

Bertelsmann spokeswoman Liz Younge refused to comment.

But independent record label group Impala said its 2,500 members believed that regulators will identify more problems and refuse to clear the deal.

"These mergers are bad news for artists and music," said Martin Mills, chairman of Impala and the British record company Beggars Group.

Augusta Frets Airline Future (AJC)

By Dave Hirschman, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0104723

A marriage of Delta Air Lines and US Airways would be a setback for Augusta, say business and civic leaders who fear putting all local airline service in the hands of a single carrier.

"Limited competition is better than no competition," said Diane Johnson, marketing director at Augusta Regional Airport. "When you have no competition, fares rise and reliability goes down the tubes."

Augusta, along with Fayetteville, Wilmington and Jacksonville, N.C.; Lynchburg, Va.; Wilmington, Del., and Florence, S.C., could go from two airlines to one if US Airways succeeds in its $8.4 billion bid to acquire Delta.
